WHITTIER v. VISSCHER et al. (L. A. 7117.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1922.)

1. Judgment ⊜714(1)—Conclusive in subsequent action involving same question, though different subject-matter.

Though action by the makers of a nonnegotiable note against D., the payee, and W., assignee, thereof, to avoid it on the ground of fraud, was begun after W. had assigned the note to C., so that the judgment for defendants therein would not be available as res judicata of the issue of fraud in a subsequent action on the note by C. against the makers, yet, the original action having been also to re-establish W.'s liability as indorser on another note released as part of the same transaction and dependent on the same issue of fraud, W., subsequently taking a reassignment of the note given to D. and suing the makers thereon, could by reason of his own privity with the original judgment plead it as res judicata of the defense of fraud; a former judgment between the same parties being conclusive, not only as to the subject-matter in controversy in the action on which it is based, but also in other actions involving the same question.

2. Parties ⊜59(2)—No abuse of discretion to allow subsequent assignee of note sued on to be substituted as plaintiff.

Where, after action is begun on a note, it is assigned, it is not an abuse of discretion to allow the assignee to be substituted as plaintiff in the action.

3. Corporations ⊜247—Stockholder's liability on corporate note held not affected by sale of her stock to payee.

A stockholder's liability on a corporation's note was not affected by a sale of her stock to the payee, who as part consideration released her from liability as indorser, but did not otherwise release the corporation or its prior stockholders from liability thereon.

4. Set-off and counterclaim ⊜34(1) — Stockholder's liability arises on contract.

Relative to right of counterclaim under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, subd. 2, a stockholder's liability on account of note of the corporation is one arising on contract.

5. Limitation of actions ⊜129 — Running against counterclaim stopped by commencement of main action.

A counterclaim, not barred at commencement of the action in which it is interposed, is unaffected by subsequent running of the statute before it is pleaded.

6. Set-off and counterclaim ⊜44(1)—Claim of either defendant proper subject of counterclaim in action on joint and several note.

A valid claim of either defendant is proper subject of counterclaim in action on joint or several liability of makers of a note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Henry F. Whittier against Mrs. W. E. Visscher and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants, other than Mrs. E. M. Dixon, appeal. Reversed.

C. E. McDowell and Frederick Gros, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bicksler, Smith & Parker and Arthur G. Baker, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This action was originally begun by one Eva B. Clark, as plaintiff, to recover on a promissory note. The note, conceded to be nonnegotiable, was for the sum of $4,750, and was executed by appellants and defendants Mrs. W. E. Visscher and Hugo Kraght Visscher to defendant Mrs. E. M. Dixon. Before suit was instituted, the note had been indorsed by the payee, Mrs. Dixon, to Henry F. Whittier, the present plaintiff and respondent, and by him indorsed without recourse to the original plaintiff, Eva B. Clark, who thereafter brought this action to recover from the Visschers, the makers of the note, and from Mrs. Dixon, the first indorser. Mrs. Dixon having failed to appear and answer, her default was regularly entered.

The Visschers answered, and by way of defense set up fraud, misrepresentation, and failure of consideration in the procurement of the note sued on. The undisputed facts show that the note was given as part of the consideration for 924 shares of the capital stock of a corporation existing under the name of Brinks Express Company. The defendant Mrs. E. M. Dixon owned 921 of the 924 shares, and the remaining 3 belonged to other directors of the corporation. The total corporate stock consisted of 1,392 shares. The corporation was at the time indebted to defendant Mrs. W. E. Visscher in the sum of $5,000, evidenced by a promissory note for that amount executed by the corporation, upon which note the respondent Whittier was liable as an indorser. The entire consideration for the 924 shares of stock received by the Visschers was the note sued on and the release of respondent Whittier from liability as indorser on the $5,000 note of the corporation. The liability upon the $5,000 note itself does not seem to have been released as to the corporation or any of its stockholders, other than the respondent.

The fraud alleged in the transaction need not be set out in detail. It is sufficient to say that it consisted of alleged representations by the owners of the stock with regard to the value, character, and extent of the business of the corporation, which, if shown to be false and fraudulent, and if available to the appellant defendants under their answer, would constitute a sufficient defense to recovery in this action. The appellant defendants also set up by supplemental answer as a cross-demand their claim against Mrs. E. M. Dixon, the original payee of the note in suit, for her stockholder's liability on the indebtedness of the corporation evidenced by the $5,000 note held by Mrs. Visscher. These defenses were denied and excluded from the evidence by the trial court, and the judgment appealed from, for the full amount of the note sued on, was given for the respondent, who, pending the trial, had procured a reassignment of the note to himself, and was substituted as plaintiff in place of his former assignee, Eva B. Clark, the original plaintiff. It is upon the rulings of the trial court, defeating the special defense and the counterclaim of appellants, that the controversy arises on this appeal.

[1] The respondent plaintiff interposed as a plea in bar to the defense of fraud in procurement of the note a judgment in another action in which the same issue of fraud had been tried and determined adversely to the same averments contained in their answer in this action. It was stipulated between the parties on the trial that the plaintiffs in the former action were the same persons as the defendants prosecuting this appeal, and that the defendants in the former action were the respondent Whittier and the defendant Mrs. E. M. Dixon in this case. The cause of action was for rescission of the contract under which the corporate stock was obtained, and to cancel the note in suit, and re-establish the liability of the respondent as indorser of the corporation note. The allegations of fraud, misrepresentation, and failure of consideration were identical with the averments of the answer before us. Judgment was for the defendants, negativing the allegations of fraud, and upholding the validity of the note. On appeal the judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal, and a rehearing in this court was denied. Visscher v. Whittier, 188 Pac. 1029.

It is the contention of appellants, however, that the bar of the judgment is defeated by reason of the fact, which is disclosed by the record here, that the action in which the judgment was obtained was begun some 10 days after the note sought to be avoided had been assigned to Eva B. Clark, and Eva B. Clark was never made a party to the action. The court at no time acquired jurisdiction of the real party in interest in the note, and was clearly without power to give a judgment which would affect the status of the note owned by a stranger to the record, who took the assignment before the commencement of the suit. Had Eva B. Clark remained the plaintiff in the present suit and the owner of the note, this earlier judgment could not be pleaded as an estoppel to a retrial of the issue of fraud as against her. Does the fact that respondent, Whittier, took a reassignment of the note and was substituted as plaintiff in this case pending trial, give any greater vitality to the earlier judgment than it would have had for or against his assignor?

Assuming that this might not be the case, if the only interest of the respondent in the former action had been in connection with the ownership of the note, it must be borne in mind that such action involved the rescission of the entire contract for the purchase and sale of the corporation stock, for which the note was only part of the consideration. The release of respondent from his liability as indorser of the $5,000 note of the corporation held by Mrs. Visscher was also one of the considerations for the shares of stock, and the action for rescission had for one of its purposes the restoration of respondent's liability as such indorser. He was therefore a proper and necessary party to the action for rescission for that reason, quite independently of any interest in the note sought to be cancelled, and the judgment was conclusive as to this defense of fraud upon respondent's liability as indorser of the corporation note.

Conceding, then, that respondent could not be brought into privity with the former judgment by a reassignment from Eva B. Clark, who was not a party to the first suit, we are of the opinion that, when his right to enforce payment on the reassigned note was questioned on the ground of this alleged fraud in its procurement, he could plead a former adjudication of that issue by virtue of his own relation to the suit in which the adjudication was made. The relief sought against respondent to re-establish his liability as indorser of the corporation note depended upon precisely the same state of facts as to the alleged fraud as would the cancellation of the note, the fraud in the transfer of the stock, which transfer was the consideration for both the note in suit and the release of respondent's liability on the other note. A former "judgment between the same parties is conclusive, not only as to the subject-matter in controversy in the action upon which it is based, but also in all other actions involving the same question." Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 177, 68 Pac. 597; Southern Pac. Co. v. Edmunds, 168 Cal. 418, 143 Pac. 597; Curtis v. Upton, 175 Cal. 331, 165 Pac. 935; Koehler v. Holt Manfg. Co., 146 Cal. 337, 80 Pac. 73; Kinderman v. Shipley (Cal. App.) 190 Pac. 472. It follows, then, that the operation of the judgment pleaded in bar in favor of respondent does not rise upon any privity in such action, dependent upon the reassignment of the note. While such assignment may not invest respondent with any right to plead the former adjudication which Eva B. Clark, his assignor, did not possess, it did not deprive him of the right to rely upon his own privity with the judgment pleaded.

[2] We do not think there was any abuse of discretion in the permission of the court for a substitution of respondent as plaintiff in this action upon his becoming owner of the note in suit. When the substitution was made, there was some suggestion in the discussion between court and counsel to the effect that the change in parties plaintiff would not affect appellants' defenses; but this conversation seems to have been on the theory that respondent had no privity in the litigation pleaded, other than through ownership of the assigned note.

[3] We will consider next the cross-complaint set up in appellants' supplemental answer. As already pointed out, when appellants became the owners of the 924 shares of the stock of the corporation, there was no release or extinguishment of the liability of the corporation or of its prior stockholders on the indebtedness evidenced by the corporate note for $5,000 already held by Mrs. Visscher. We do not think that there is any merit in the contention of the respondent that the transactions under which the Visschers purchased this stock in any way affected liability under the $5,000 note, other than as to respondent's liability as an indorser. Mrs. Visscher, then, at the time of the commencement of this suit to recover against her and Hugo K. Visscher, had a valid cause of action against Mrs. Dixon, the original payee of this nonnegotiable note sued on, for her stockholder's liability on the corporation note upon which a separate judgment might have been obtained by her.

[4] Respondent further objects, however, that a stockholder's liability, which, as in this case, does not arise out of the transaction sued upon, is not a proper matter of cross-complaint or counterclaim; that it is not a cause of action "arising on contract" as specified in subdivision 2 of section 438 of the Code of Civil Precedure, but is purely a liability imposed by statute. While it is true that it is the authority of the statute which creates the general liability of the stockholder on the corporation indebtedness, in a case like this, it is the contract of the corporation which creates the indebtedness. In assuming the status of a stockholder, each owner of shares of stock in effect empowers the corporation by its act to bind him by its obligations. It is a separate independent liability, but it is created by and arises on the contract. There is nothing that we can discover in the creation of the stockholder's liability or in its enforcement, where it arises on a contract of the corporation, to differentiate it from a direct contract by the individual so far as concerns the remedy of the parties. The following decisions in situations analogous to that presented here have held the stockholder's liability to be contractual in its nature: Dennis v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. 548, 27 Pac. 1031; Kennedy v. Calif. Sav. Bank, 97 Cal. 93, 31 Pac. 846, 33 Am. St. Rep. 163; Royal Trust Co. v. MacBean, 168 Cal. 642, 144 Pac. 139; Lininger v. Botsford, 32 Cal. App. 386, 163 Pac. 63; Miller & Lux v. Katz, 10 Cal. App. 576, 102 Pac. 946; Platt v. Wilmot, 193 U. S. 603, 24 Sup. Ct. 542, 48 L. Ed. 809; Bank v. Farnum, 176 U. S. 640, 20 Sup. Ct. 506, 44 L. Ed. 619; Whitman v. Oxford, 176 U. S. 559, 20 Sup. Ct. 477, 44 L. Ed. 587. We are therefore of the opinion that such an existing liability of a plaintiff to the defendant may be pleaded by way of counterclaim.

[5] It is next contended that the claim in this case is barred by the statute of limitations. It is conceded that it was not so barred when the original action was begun, and the authorities in this state seem to be agreed that, if the right of action relied on was alive at the commencement of the suit, the statute does not run against it, when, as in this case, the full statutory period has expired thereafter during the pendency of the action and before the claim is pleaded as a cross-complaint. Lyon v. Petty, 65 Cal. 322, 4 Pac. 103; Perkins v. West Coast Lumber Co., 120 Cal. 27, 52 Pac. 118; McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 154, 64 Pac. 278; Bliss v. Sneath, 103 Cal. 43, 36 Pac. 1029; Id., 119 Cal. 526, 51 Pac. 848; Maryland Casualty Co. v. Shafer et al. (Cal. App.) 208 Pac. 197. The same rule is stated in 24 R. C. L. § 43, as declarative of the common law, as follows:

"If, however, a counterclaim or set-off is not barred at the commencement of the action in which it is pleaded, it does not become so barred afterward during the pendency of that action, and in pleading the statute of limitations to a counterclaim it must be shown that the bar of the statute had matured when the original action was commenced, and it is not sufficient to aver a bar when the counterclaim was filed."

[6] Respondents' remaining objection to this cross-complaint, that it cannot be maintained in this action because it only runs as a set-off in favor of one of the defendants is not tenable. This is an action on a joint and several liability of the makers of a promissory note. Payment by either would extinguish the right of action of the plaintiff against both. It naturally follows that the set-off of a valid claim of either may be interposed with the same result. Miller v. Murphy, 186 Cal. 344, 199 Pac. 525; Austin

v. Feland, 8 Mo. 309; Ruby v. Baker, 106 Kan. 859, 190 Pac. 6, 10 A. L. R. 1247.

By reason of error in the exclusion of evidence of appellants' counterclaim, the judgment is reversed.

We concur: SHAW, C. J.; LENNON, J.; WASTE, J.; RICHARDS, Justice pro tem.; MYERS, Justice pro tem.

OGILVIE v. ÆTNA LIFE INS. CO. OF HARTFORD, CONN. (L. A. 6502.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 14, 1922. Rehearing Denied Sept. 11, 1922.)

1. Evidence ⟸318(4), 333(1)—County surgeon's unsworn report of autopsy findings hearsay, and not admissible as a public record.

In action by beneficiary on an insurance policy, an unsworn written report of autopsy findings, made by the county surgeon to the coroner on insured's death, was hearsay, and not receivable as a public record.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1050(1)—Error in admitting unsworn report of autopsy findings held not cured by subsequent testimony.

In an action on an insurance policy, error in admitting, for plaintiff, surgeon's unsworn written report of autopsy findings held not cured by his testifying as to the report at the instance of defendant, where plaintiff by another witness made use of the report to the detriment of defendant.

3. Evidence ⟸220(1) — Lack of denial does not show an admission.

Where persons not under duty to speak are merely shown to have made no denials, an admission is not thereby shown, especially where the authority of such persons to make admissions is doubtful.

4. Insurance ⟸449—"Accidental death" and "death by accidental means" defined.

Where death results from an act, but was not designed and not anticipated by deceased, though it be in consequence of some act voluntarily done by him, it is "accidental death"; where death is caused by some act of deceased not designed or intentionally done by him, it is "death by accidental means."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accident —Accidental.]

5. Insurance ⟸669(11) —Instruction improper, under policy against death by accidental means, which failed to distinguish accidental result to insured and means producing result.

In an action on a policy against "death by accidental means," as distinguished from "accidental death," an instruction was improper which told the jury that, if death of insured was due to a rupture caused by a strain, but was an unexpected result thereof, plaintiff could recover, since this fails to distinguish between the result to insured and the means by which that result was brought about.

6. Insurance ⟸669(11) — Defendant insurer entitled, under policy against death by accidental means, to instruction on ordinary incidents of plowing, whereby deceased met accident.

In such action, where there was evidence that insured's death was caused by lurching of a plow he was using in hard ground, insurer was entitled to an instruction that, if there was no more lurch to the plow than was ordinarily incident to the plowing which insured was doing, it was not an accident for which insured could recover.

7. Trial ⟸235(2) — Instruction that theory cannot be established, where facts are consistent with contrary theory, properly refused.

An instruction that a theory cannot be established in a civil case, where facts consistent with it are also consistent with a contrary theory, was properly refused, since the theory the jury deemed most probable would be established by a preponderance of evidence.

8. Insurance ⟸646(6)—Trial ⟸296(7)—Error to instruct that defendant must prove that disease was proximate cause of death, in suit on policy against death by accidental means.

In an action on a policy against death by accidental means, it was error to instruct that defendant must prove by a preponderance of evidence that disease was the proximate cause of death, and to refuse insurer's requested specific instructions to the contrary; nor was this error cured by conflicting instructions that plaintiff must prove that death resulted from injuries effected solely through external and accidental means.

9. Insurance ⟸669(11) — Instruction as to disease being proximate cause of death, in action on policy insuring against death by accidental means, held error.

In an action on a policy against death by accidental means, it was error to instruct that the presence of disease as a proximate contributing cause of insured's death would be immaterial, unless it was also found that the disease itself would have caused death at approximately the same time without the accident having occurred.

10. Evidence ⟸20(1)—Court could judicially notice that plowing was not incident to occupation of real estate and investments.

The court should judicially notice that plowing was not incident to the occupation of "real estate and investments," notwithstanding that men in this business have been known to plow.

11. Insurance ⟸531 —Proviso reducing amount, if injury received while doing act pertaining to more hazardous occupation, covers isolated and casual acts, where occupation is not actually changed.

Under a policy insuring against death by accidental means, which provides that the amount recoverable shall be reduced if insured is injured doing acts pertaining to an occupation more hazardous than that for which insured, it is not necessary, in order for the proviso to become operative, to show that insured had actually changed his occupation; that is, that the act in which he was engaged when injured was "habitual," as distinguished from "casual."

12. Insurance ⟸646(8) — Insurer has burden of proving accident occurred in more hazardous occupation than that for which insured.

Where insurer seeks to reduce amount recoverable, because insured met accident in an occupation more hazardous than that against which insured, the burden is on insurer to show certain occupations are in fact more dangerous than others, and not merely that he so classifies them.

13. Trial ⟸37—Omission to assume burden of proof waived by proceeding as if issues were properly presented.

Right to object to omission to assume burden of proof may be waived by proceeding throughout trial as if the particular issue had been properly presented.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Hattie L. Ogilvie against the Ætna Life Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles (Henry F. Prince, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MYERS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action as beneficiary under a policy issued by the defendant insuring plaintiff's husband "against disability or death resulting directly and independently of all other causes from bodily injuries effected solely through external, violent, and accidental means." Defendant appeals from the judgment on verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of the policy. It is conceded that the evidence is legally sufficient to support the verdict, and the appeal is predicated solely upon claimed errors of law in the admission and rejection of evidence and the giving and refusal of instructions.

The allegation of the complaint was to the effect that the assured, while assisting a Japanese in doing some plowing, met with an accident, "in substance, that the said plow which the said James G. Ogilvie was using at said time, came in contact with a root or other obstruction unforeseen, causing said plow and its plow handle to be given a severe wrench, thereby causing the said James G. Ogilvie to be given a severe wrench and strain," as a result of which his heart was ruptured, and he died therefrom five days later. Defendant denied that assured sustained any injury from accidental means, and alleged that his death was caused and was contributed to by disease.

The issues, so far as the right of recovery is concerned, may be stated as follows: (1) Did Mr. Ogilvie sustain an injury through accidental means? (2) If so, did such injury solely cause his death, or was his death contributed to by a pre-existing condition of disease? The evidence was amply sufficient to support a finding in favor of the defendant upon each of these issues, and as such a finding, upon either issue, would have precluded recovery, it becomes important to consider the claimed errors.

[1] Upon the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence the written report of his findings made by Dr. Wagner, the county autopsy surgeon, to the coroner, and filed with the county clerk. It was received in evidence over the objection of the defendant on the ground that it was hearsay and incompetent, and that Dr. Wagner was then present in court and available as a witness. Counsel for defendant stipulated that Dr. Wagner was the duly qualified and acting autopsy surgeon, and that the examination and the report were regularly made by him in the performance of his official duties. This is the only basis suggested to us for its admissibility in evidence, and it should have been excluded as hearsay. It was an unsworn statement, not subject to cross-examination, made by a stranger to this action, and made in the course of a proceeding to which this defendant was neither party nor privy. Various sorts of public records are made receivable as prima facie evidence by virtue of express provision of statute, but we have been cited to no such statute as applicable to this report.

[2] It is claimed that this error was rendered harmless by the fact that the defendant afterward called Dr. Wagner as its witness, and proved by him the same facts embodied in his report, as to the physical findings. We would be inclined to adopt this view, if the use made by the plaintiff of this report had gone no further. But the plaintiff then called Dr. Pallette as her witness, and, after defining and explaining to the jury the meaning of certain technical words found in the report, he testified that the expression, "moderate degree of senile changes," as used in the report, had no definite and fixed meaning in the medical profession. He was then asked "whether or not that report shows any disease or diseased condition of the heart"? This question was objected to upon the grounds, among others, "that the statement itself is not admissible"; "that it is not permissible for this witness to explain what is meant by another surgeon in making the report"; and that "it is not shown that this witness was present at the examination, or has any knowledge or means of knowing what the autopsy surgeon meant." The objection was overruled, and the witness answered, "No."

Plaintiff's counsel do not attempt to justify this ruling, but assert that it was harmless. We cannot agree. The question of a diseased condition of the heart was one of the vital issues in the case. Defendant produced much evidence tending to establish such diseased condition. In the words of its counsel:

"Since respondent could not establish an undiseased condition of the heart by the testimony of the coroner's physician, she introduced his written report, and was permitted to have another doctor interpret that report as not showing a diseased condition, although the terms used admittedly had no definite meaning in medical parlance."

But it is said that this error was "cured" by the fact that the defendant afterward called Dr. Wagner as a witness, who testified that he did find a diseased condition of the heart. We fail to see how this cured the error. It still left in the case the incompetent testimony on the side of the plaintiff, to which it is to be added that Dr. Wagner, as a witness, was apparently impeached in the eyes of the jury by his own report as interpreted by Dr. Pallette.

The report as first admitted was limited to the portion thereof which stated the physical and pathological findings. Dr. Wagner, in his direct examination by defendant, mentioned that "there was a history of plowing that I had to embody in the notes." He was then asked upon cross-examination if that history formed a material part in his examination and opinion. He replied, "I had to take it into consideration." Plaintiff thereupon offered in evidence the entire report, containing the following recital: "There was a history of a severe strain while plowing and striking a large root." The court overruled defendant's objection that it was hearsay, and admitted it in evidence. It was hearsay "twice removed," and should have been excluded. It was not admissible for the purpose of impeaching the witness, because it did not tend to contradict or modify what he had testified to.

[3] It was shown at the trial that after the autopsy an examination of the body was made by two physicians in behalf of the plaintiff and two others in behalf of the defendant by stipulation "under the terms of the policy." As part of her case in chief, and before any witness had testified for defendant, plaintiff was permitted to show by her said two physicians that neither of defendant's physicians, at the time of the examination, made any statement to the effect that there was a diseased condition of the heart. This was over defendant's objection, and without showing that any conversation whatever took place at said time between any of said physicians. There was nothing, other than is here stated, to indicate that either of the physicians had any authority to make any admission binding upon the defendant. There was a provision in the policy giving the defendant the right to examine the person of the assured at any time after injury. If this be regarded as indicating that the physicians had authority to make admissions in behalf of the defendant, nevertheless it was not shown that they had made admissions. It was merely shown that they made no denials, without showing any condition or circumstance which called upon them to say anything.

[4] In considering the instructions given and refused, it is necessary to keep in mind the fact that the policy here sued upon did not insure against accidental death. It insured only against death as the result of accidental means. The distinction is well recognized in this state.

"Where the death is the result of some act, but was not designed, and not anticipated by the deceased, though it be in consequence of some act voluntarily done by him, it is accidental death; but where death is caused by some act of the deceased, not designed by him, or not intentionally done by him, it is death by accidental means." Olinsky v. Railway Mail Ass'n, 182 Cal. 669, 189 Pac. 835, 14 A. L. R. 784.

[5] The trial court instructed the jury that:

"The term 'accident,' as used in the policy here in question and in these instructions, denotes an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation, * * * or is an unusual effect of a known cause, and therefore not expected. * * * It is an event happening unexpectedly or undesignedly."

This instruction, together with plaintiff's instruction No. V, which followed it, tells the jury in effect that, if the death of the assured was due to a rupture caused by a strain naturally incident to the exertion of plowing, but was an unexpected result thereof, the plaintiff could recover. It should not have been given, because—

"It fails to give effect to the plain language of the policy, in that it does not distinguish between the result to the insured and the means by which that result was brought about. As we have already pointed out, the insurance is not against accidental injury or death, but is against death resulting from injuries effected by accidental means." Rock v. Travelers' Insurance Co., 172 Cal. 462, 467, 156 Pac. 1029, 1031 (L. R. A. 1916E, 1196).

[6] The court refused the defendant's request to instruct the jury to the effect that if the assured received a strain or wrench as a result of the sway or swinging of the plow, and there was no more lurch or sway or swing to the plow than is usual and ordinarily incident to the character of plowing that the assured was doing, it was not an accident for which recovery could be had under the terms of the policy. One of plaintiff's witnesses had testified that the ground where the assured was plowing had not been plowed for at least five years, and "was so hard you could not keep the plow in the ground"; that "the plow was jumping in and out of the ground." Under such circumstances we think the defendant was clearly entitled to have this instruction, or the substance thereof, given to the jury. For like reasons, defendant's requested instruction No. XIX, or the equivalent thereof, should have been given.

[7] Complaint is made of the court's refusal to give either of several instructions requested by defendant to the effect that:

"A theory cannot be said to be established in a civil case, where the facts and circumstances from which it is sought to establish such theory are consistent with it, and are also consistent with a contrary theory."

It is true that a verdict may not lawfully be predicated upon mere conjecture or speculation, and that, when two opposite conclusions appear equally probable from all of the evidence, neither of them can be said to be proven; but, from the mere fact that both conclusions or theories are consistent with the facts proven, it does not necessarily follow that both are equally probable. If to the minds of the jury, under such circumstances, the one fairly appears more probable than the other, it is established by preponderance of the evidence. These instructions were properly refused.

[8] The trial court erroneously instructed the jury to the effect that the burden rested upon the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that disease was a proximate cause of the death of the assured (Kellner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 180 Cal. 326, 181 Pac. 61, 63), and refused the specific instructions to the contrary which were requested by the defendant. This error was not cured by the giving of a conflicting general instruction to the effect that the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the death resulted "from bodily injuries effected solely through external, violent, and accidental means." Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 248, 253, 107 Pac. 309, 311.

[9] The court further instructed the jury, in effect, that the presence of disease as a proximate contributing cause of the death of the assured would be immaterial, unless they also found that the disease itself would have caused the death of the assured at approximately the same time without the accident having occurred. This was in plain disregard of the terms of the policy, and substantially identical with an instruction which was expressly disapproved by this court in Kellner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., supra. See, also, Clarke v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co., 180 Cal. 76, 179 Pac. 195.

Enough has been shown, we think, to make it apparent that this verdict was predicated upon an erroneous conception of the law, and to necessitate a reversal, even if we could assume that the verdict was not influenced by the admission of the incompetent testimony to which we have referred.

Inasmuch as this case must be sent back for retrial it is proper that we consider the assignments of error relating to the amount recoverable under the policy. In the schedule of warranties attached to and a part of the policy, the assured stated his occupation as "Real estate and investments," with the duties "usual thereto." He further stated therein:

"I understand that risks are classified according to occupation, and that my occupation above described is classified preferred."

Section 20 of the policy provided:

"If the insured is injured after having changed his occupation to one classified by this company as more hazardous than that herein stated, or is injured while doing any act or thing pertaining to any more hazardous occupation," the amount recoverable should be reduced in inverse proportion to the premiums charged for the respective risks. (Italics ours.)

The defendant conceded at the trial that the assured had not changed his occupation, but its contention was that the manual labor of plowing is not incident to the occupation of "real estate and investments," but is an act incident to the occupation of "farmer," "farm laborer," and "common laborer," each of which was classified by it as "hazardous," and required a premium 2½ times larger than was paid by the assured, and that the amount recoverable under the policy was thereby reduced from $7,500 to $3,000.

[10] Defendant contended at the trial that the court should take judicial cognizance of the fact that plowing is not incident to the occupation of real estate and investments, but is incident to the other occupations above named, and should have so informed the jury. The learned trial judge might well have done so. Courts have taken judicial notice of the general character of business of a crematory, of building and loan associations, of the lumber industry, of a barber shop and shoe-shining parlor, of a mercantile agency, and of professions generally.

"The judicial notice which courts take of matters of fact embraces those facts which are within the common knowledge of all, or are of such general notoriety as to need no evidence in their support." People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 618, 625, 45 Pac. 860, 862; Edson v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 144 Cal. 182, 189, 77 Pac. 894.

It must be conceded to be a matter of common knowledge that the manual labor of plowing is not ordinarily incident to the occupation of real estate and investments in large cities, but is an act incident to at least the occupations of farmer and farm laborer; and this is no less a fact because of the circumstance that men in the real estate business have been known to plow.

[11] The question of the legal effect of the italicized words above quoted from the policy has not been adjudicated by the courts of this state. Some reliance is placed by plaintiff upon the line of decisions of which the case of Berliner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 458, 53 Pac. 918, 41 L. R. A. 467, 66 Am. St. Rep. 49, is an example, holding that the assured must have actually changed his occupation in order that such a proviso should become operative. But the language here relied upon by the defendant was not in the policy which was before this court in the Berliner Case. It is in fact asserted with apparent reason that the language here relied upon was embodied in defendant's policies in response to the suggestion found in the opinion in the Berliner Case of a means by which the insurer might have avoided the result which there followed. That suggestion was in the following language:

"If the company intended to say to the assured that if he did any act which did not strictly belong to his own occupation, but was embraced more properly in some other business, and if thereby any harm to him accidentally resulted, that in such event he could claim nothing under his policy, it was easy for them to do so in plain language."

"That," says the defendant, "is precisely what we have done, except that we have provided for a reduction of the amount, instead of a forfeiture of the policy."

The United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, having before it a policy containing a provision identical with that here under consideration, as applied to a situation substantially analogous, held that the proviso would be inoperative unless the act in which the assured was engaged at the time of injury was "habitual," as distinguished from "casual," and that the case should have been submitted to the jury to determine which of these it was. Inasmuch as the court said in its opinion, "It does not appear that Reading [the assured] ever ran the elevator before," we are left in some doubt as to just what question it deemed should have been submitted to the jury. Gotfredson v. German Commercial Accident Co., 218 Fed. 582, 134 C. C. A. 310, L. R. A. 1915D, 312. The Supreme Court of Iowa, in the case of Holiday v. American Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 103 Iowa, 178, 72 N. W. 448, 64 Am. St. Rep. 170, held an identical policy provision to be inoperative as applied to the case of an assured who was injured by the accidental discharge of his gun while hunting. The Texas court, in a case presenting an exactly similar situation, refused to follow the Holiday Case, saying:

"The decision is in the very teeth of language that is plain and simple, and had the effect of destroying the contract made by the parties and of substituting therefor one made by the court." Lane v. General Accident Ins. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 113 S. W. 324.

The Washington court, in a similar case, disapproved and refused to follow the Holiday Case, saying:

"It seems to us that the holding in the Iowa case practically reads out of the contract that clause" (the one here under consideration). Green v. National Casualty Co., 87 Wash. 237, 151 Pac. 509.

To the same effect are Montgomery v. Continental Casualty Co., 131 La. 475, 59 South. 907; Loesch v. Union Casualty & Surety Co., 176 Mo. 654, 75 S. W. 621, and Ridgely v. Ætna Life Ins. Co., 160 App. Div. 719, 145 N. Y. Supp. 1075 (affirmed in 217 N. Y. 720, 112 N. E. 1073). We are of the opinion that the better reason, as well as the weight of authority, is in support of that rule which gives effect to the plain intent of the language used by the parties in their contract.

[12, 13] In view of what we have said above, it is unnecessary to review the numerous errors claimed to have been committed in the trial of this branch of the case. It should be pointed out, however, that the burden rests upon the defendant, in order to make good its claim in this behalf, to allege and prove that the occupation of "farmer," or "farm laborer," or "common laborer," as the case may be, was in fact more dangerous than that of "real estate and investments," not merely that it was so classified. Such is the plain intendment of the language used, construing it strictly, as we must, against the insurer. This the defendant did not do in the trial below, but the plaintiff waived this omission (so far as that trial was concerned) by proceeding throughout the trial as if the issue had been properly presented.

PRUITT v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

1. Master and servant ⟹414—Service of application for compensation before hearing held waived.

Where one made a party to a workmen's compensation proceeding at the hearing had actual knowledge of filing of application, was present at the hearing, and when made a party immediately became an actor therein by personally recalling and cross-examining witnesses and submitting the matter for decision, and in all subsequent proceedings was represented by counsel, his conduct amounted to a waiver of the requirement of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 17a, for the service of a copy of the application for compensation, with notice of the time and place of hearing.

2. Master and servant ⟹417(1)—Person aggrieved by want of service in compensation proceeding must apply to commission for relief.

A party to a workmen's compensation proceeding, contending that no service was made on him, or claiming to be aggrieved by want of notice of pendency of proceeding, should, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 18b, apply to the Industrial Accident Commission for relief substantially in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 473, relative to relief against judgments, etc., taken through mistake, inadvertence, etc.

3. Master and servant ⟹414—Rehearing in compensation proceedings may be limited to hearing of additional testimony.

Where one applying for rehearing in workmen's compensation proceeding, though made a party during the first hearing, was present at the hearing, heard all of the testimony, cross-examined all of the witnesses, testified himself, and was fully apprised of the claim for compensation, the commission had power, in view of the broad powers conferred by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 64e, to limit the rehearing to the hearing of additional evidence introduced by such party, without again hearing any evidence to establish the claim.

4. Master and servant ⟹361 — One hiring truck and driver to another not liable for compensation, if exercising no control over the driver.

Where owner of truck hired driver, under agreement that he should receive 25 per cent. of the earnings of the truck and nothing when idle, and hired the truck and driver to a third person, the theory of general and special employment did not apply, and an award of compensation against him was unauthorized, unless he exerted some degree of control over the driver in connection with his employment in the service of the third person.

5. Master and servant ⟹417(7) — Commission's findings in compensation proceeding binding on reviewing court, if supported by evidence.

Findings of the Industrial Accident Commission in a workmen's compensation proceeding stand on the same footing as the finding of a judge or verdict of a jury, and are not to be set aside if there is any substantial evidence on which they can rest; but a review may be had on the theory that the commission had no jurisdiction to make a finding, where there was no evidence to support it.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Luceille Conklin and another for compensation for the death of Paul R. Conklin, opposed by W. L. Pruitt and others. Compensation was awarded, and Pruitt brings a writ of review. Affirmed in part, and annulled and set aside in part.

Clock, McWhinney & Clock, of Long Beach, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Petitioner, W. L. Pruitt, seeks in this proceeding, on a writ of review, to have set aside and annulled an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, upon the ground that, as to him, the commission acted in excess of its powers and was without jurisdiction in the matter. Two questions are presented for consideration. The first concerns the procedure followed in the hearing on the original application out of which the award arose. The second relates to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of the commission, in so far as it imposes a liability upon petitioner.

It appears from the record returned by the respondent that Luceille Conklin and Eunice G. Conklin, a minor, by her guardian ad litem, instituted a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission against Graham Bros., a copartnership, and its insurance carrier, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, for compensation for the death of Paul R. Conklin. Petitioner was not made a party defendant in such application. When the matter came on for hearing before the referee of the commission, Pruitt was present as a witness. When considerable testimony had been taken, it appeared to the referee that, by reason of his interest in the proceeding and his apparent relationship to the deceased employee, Conklin, Pruitt should be joined as a defendant in the proceeding, subject to the right of said Pruitt to request and have granted a further hearing, and an order to that effect was made. The referee thereupon inquired of Pruitt if he wished to have the hearing continued to a future date, in order that he might make any preparation for further hearing. Pruitt stated that he was willing to proceed forthwith. He further stated that, having been present and having heard all of the testimony and proceedings thus far had, he would like to question the witnesses. The witnesses were thereupon recalled and were cross-examined by him. He also took the stand and testified. At the conclusion of the testimony, in answer to a question of the referee, Pruitt stated he was willing to submit the matter, which was done.

The commission thereafter made its findings and award, holding Pruitt liable for compensation as a joint employer with Graham Bros., and awarded the applicants compensation in the sum of $5,000. In due time Pruitt applied for a rehearing before the commission, and subsequently filed a supplemental petition, in which he set forth an outline of certain evidence which he desired to present in his own behalf. Upon this petition the commission granted a rehearing. When the matter came on again, Pruitt was present in person and was represented by an attorney. The record does not disclose that any objection was made by any of the parties to the proceeding. Although the petitioner now contends that he demanded that he be furnished with a copy of the testimony taken at the previous hearing, the record does not bear him out in that behalf. Pruitt appears to have been permitted to present any and all the testimony he desired in support of his defense. A number of witnesses were called and examined by him. The matter was thereupon submitted without objection or protest from him. The commission made its decision after such rehearing, finding that the testimony produced thereon was not sufficient to change or modify the facts set forth in the findings made upon the first hearing. It accordingly affirmed the findings and award theretofore made.

[1, 2] In seeking to have such award annulled, the petitioner contends that the Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction to make any award against him, for the reason, first, that no copy of the original application for compensation, with the notice, of the time and place of the hearing thereof, was served upon him at the time he was joined as a defendant before the commission, or at any time. There is nothing in this contention. Petitioner had actual knowledge of the filing of the application, and was present at the original hearing. When made a party to the proceeding, he immediately became an actor therein by personally recalling and cross-examining the witnesses who had testified in his presence and hearing, and submitting the matter for decision. In all subsequent proceedings he was represented by counsel. His conduct in the matter amounted to a waiver of the requirements of the act (St. 1917, p. 846, § 17a) as to service and notice. It was substantially the same as that of one who appears in court proceedings under similar circumstances, and must be held to have had like effect. Massachusetts, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 176 Cal. 491, 492, 168 Pac. 1050. Furthermore, a party subsequently contending that no service was made upon him, or claiming to be aggrieved by want of notice of the pendency of the proceeding, should apply to the commission for relief substantially in accordance with the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 18b.

[3] Petitioner next complains that no evidence, testimony, or stipulations of any kind were introduced by or on behalf of the applicants for compensation upon the rehearing; that the attorneys for petitioner objected to such procedure, but the referee proceeded to hear only the evidence introduced by the defendant Pruitt; that there was not at that time any evidence introduced establishing the applicants' claim against Pruitt, the contention being that Pruitt never at any time has had an opportunity to object to the stipulations which were previously offered in evidence, to cross-examine the witnesses on behalf of the applicants, nor to object to the testimony introduced against him, and that the final proceedings did not actually amount to a rehearing; that all that was done was to open the case as it stood in the first instance and allow Pruitt to offer additional matters that he had by way of defense. There is no merit in this contention. Pruitt, having been present at the first hearing, at which he was made a party defendant, having heard all of the testimony, having in person cross-examined all the witnesses who were called at that time, and having himself testified, was fully apprised of the claim of the applicants for compensation. Upon the rehearing he proceeded without objection, was accorded every opportunity to offer such testimony as he desired, and to seek such stipulations as he or his counsel might feel would be material in presenting his defense. In seeking such rehearing he had set forth an outline of the new evidence he desired to present in his behalf.

Under subdivision (e) of section 64 of the Workmen's Compensation Act the commission has very broad powers in the matter of rehearings. If it considers that the issues raised by an application for a rehearing have theretofore been adequately considered, it may determine the matter by confirming, without a rehearing, its previous findings. If a rehearing is deemed necessary to determine the issues raised, or any one or more of such issues, it may order a rehearing thereon and consider the matters raised by such application. If at the time of granting such rehearing it shall appear that no sufficient reason exists for taking further testimony, the commission may reconsider and redetermine the original cause, without even setting a time and place for such further hearing. The case of Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 572, 158 Pac. 218, so urgently relied upon by the petitioner in support of his contention, is not in point. All the evidence in that case tending to show that Carstens was in any way related to the matter in hand was taken before he had received any notice of the application. It was not repeated after he had received such notice, and no evidence indicating any relation whatever between him and the other parties to the proceeding, or to the applicant, was introduced after the notice was served upon him. Carstens never appeared, was never represented, and took no part in the proceedings. In the present case the petitioner was accorded ample opportunity to present his defense in opposition to the claim of the applicants.

The commission found that the decedent, Conklin, was at the time of his injury in the joint employment of both the defendants, Pruitt and Graham Bros., that both of the employers and employee were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, and that the defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company was the insurance carrier for the defendant Graham Bros. It accordingly made its award in favor of the applicants and against this petitioner, Pruitt, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, and each and either of them, in the total sum of $5,000, and medical expenses in the sum of $174.95. It ordered that Graham Bros. be released from all liability in the premises.

[4] The finding and award of the commission, which can only be predicated upon an application of the theory of a general and a special employment of Conklin, is not controverted by the respondent insurance carrier of Graham Bros. It does not dispute the liability of the partnership in the premises. The petitioner, Pruitt, is here alone contending that there was a want of sufficient evidence to sustain the finding that he was liable, and that therefore the award is, as to him, without support. This contention must be sustained. While it has been held that in some cases where, at the time of the accident, both the general and special employer exerted some measure of control over the injured employee, both should be held liable, and that under such circumstances an employee may look either to the general employer or to the special employer, or to both, for compensation for injuries due to occupational hazards (Employers' Liability Assurance Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 179 Cal. 432, 438, 439, 177 Pac. 273), the facts here under review do not bring the case within the application of the rule.

That Conklin's death was the result of injuries he received when the truck he was driving was struck by a train, while he was in the discharge of his duties and while acting within the scope of his employment, is not disputed. Graham Bros., copartnership, was engaged in the general contracting business. For the purpose of hauling broken rock, gravel, and sand the firm used a great many motor trucks which the partnership did not own. It was its custom to hire these trucks promiscuously, without being concerned as to who the owners might be, paying at the rate of $3 per hour for their use, including the services of the driver. Robert Graham, a member of the copartnership, had general control of the operation of these trucks during working hours through a foreman, who gave orders as to when, where, and how the materials were to be hauled and the trucks otherwise used. For some time Conklin, who appears to have had an interest in a truck, was employed by Graham Bros. at the rate of $3 per hour for his own services and the use of the truck. About two weeks before the accident this arrangement was changed. Pruitt, who already had two trucks in the service of Graham Bros., bought the truck Conklin was using, and thereupon notified Graham Bros. that Conklin was working for him. He arranged with Conklin, however, that Conklin should continue to use the truck in the service of Graham Bros. as before, and on the same terms. He agreed with Conklin "to give him 25 per cent. of his wages—what he earned from Graham Bros." If for any reason the truck was laid off, Conklin received nothing for the time he was idle. He was charged with the care of the truck, which he kept at his own home when it was not in use. Pruitt paid the bills for its upkeep, and for the oil and gasoline used in its operation. He agreed to pay Conklin the usual wages of a mechanic for his time when he made any repairs to the truck. Having made these agreements with Graham Bros. and Conklin, Pruitt did not thereafter give any orders, or directions, to either, and exerted no measure of control over the truck or its driver. On this evidence the commission correctly found that at the time of the injury Conklin was operating the truck "in the service of Graham Bros." under the above arrangement, and that "during all of said time said Paul R. Conklin was subject to the control and direction of said defendant Graham Bros. in the operation and movement of the truck." These findings support the claim for compensation against Graham Bros., and justify the award against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, its insurance carrier, but utterly fail to establish any liability on the part of Pruitt.

[5] There is neither evidence nor finding to show that petitioner ever exerted, or had the right to exert, the slightest degree of control over Conklin in connection with his employment in the service of Graham Bros. Yet to uphold an award against him it must so appear. Employers' Liability Assurance Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; De Noyer v. Cavanaugh, 221 N. Y. 273, 275, 116 N. E. 992. If it be contended that a further finding of the commission, that "at the time of said injury the said Paul R. Conklin was in the joint employment of both the defendants W. L. Pruitt and Graham Bros." should be construed to have that effect, there is no evidence in the record to support it. Ordinarily, in cases such as this, the reviewing court is bound by the decision of the triers of fact. The finding of the commission in such matters stands upon the same footing as the finding of a judge, or the verdict of a jury, and is not to be set aside if there is any substantial evidence upon which it can rest. Pigeon's Case, 216 Mass. 51, 52, 102 N. E. 932, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 737; Massachusetts, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra. A review of the findings in such cases may be had, however, on the theory that the commission has no jurisdiction to make a finding where there is no evidence to support it. Dearborn v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 203 Pac. 112; Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 378, 380, 170 Pac. 822. The last-mentioned finding falls squarely within this category and may be disregarded.

The finding of facts made in this proceeding fails to support the award as to the petitioner, W. L. Pruitt. The award against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company is affirmed, and the award against W. L. Pruitt is annulled and set aside.

AGNEW v. DAUGHERTY, State Commissioner of Corporations. (S. F. 10355.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1922.)

1. Licenses ⟸18½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Interests in trust and mining options held "securities," which could not be sold without permit from commissioner of corporations.

Where one having a lease and option on mining property was selling interests therein, and in a trust under which it was to be operated, evidenced by certificates and each representing 1/3000 part of the property and assets of the trust, such interests were "securities," within Corporate Securities Act, especially in view of section 2, providing that the singular includes the plural, etc., and a permit from the commissioner of corporations for their sale was necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Security.]

2. Licenses ⟸18½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Commissioner can impose only such conditions on sale of securities as are necessary to safety and security.

The Corporate Securities Act, providing that, if the commissioner of corporations finds that a proposed plan of business is not unfair, unjust, or inequitable, etc., he shall issue a permit for the sale of securities on such terms and conditions as he may provide, attacked as violating Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and Const. Cal. art. 1, § 11, authorizes the commissioner to impose only such conditions as are necessary to secure safety and security, and it cannot be assumed in advance that he will impose any other conditions.

Original petition by Francis E. Agnew for a writ of prohibition, directed to Edwin M. Daugherty, Commissioner of Corporations of the State of California. Petition denied.

Westervelt & Ball, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

SHAW, C. J. The applicant has filed a petition for a writ of prohibition, directed to Edwin M. Daugherty, commissioner of corporations of the state of California, to prohibit and enjoin him from proceeding in the matter of the trust described in the petition, and to require the petitioner to discontinue the sale or negotiation of the trust certificates and other securities mentioned in the trust set forth in the petition, until he has received a certificate of the corporation commissioner authorizing him to do so. The petition sets forth that he has acquired a lease and option of certain mining property, and that he has conveyed the same to certain persons as trustees under a contract in writing with them defining the trust.

The terms of the trust are not set forth, as such, but in his declaration, which is made a part of his petition, he states that he has created a trust, designating it as the "La Plata Smelting Company," has appointed William H. Test, H. E. Williams, and W. C. Randall as trustees thereof, and has empowered them as such trustees to receive all payments that may be due to him for interests in the lease, and to hold the same and all funds received from the sale of the product or the operation of said lease, as a trust fund for the holders of the several interest certificates, and disburse, use, and manage the same as such trustees. When they have received a sufficient amount from the sale of interests they shall start operations, including the work and development of the mines on the property. The "interests" are 3,000 in number. When 1,500, or so many of that number as may be necessary, are sold, he is to execute to the said trustees a proper assignment of said lease. The remaining 1,500 of the "interests" are to be retained, and petitioner reserves the right to hold them for himself and his associates as a consideration for the transfer of the property to be conveyed in trust, namely, of the lease and option aforesaid. Share certificates, conveying to the holder thereof 1/3000 part of the said property and assets of said trust, are to be issued by the petitioner to each purchaser of an "interest," and they shall have equal rights to the profits of the enterprise, and are to be entitled to equal benefits therein. Certificates may be transferred only upon the books of the said Agnew until enough of the "interests" are sold to justify him in conveying to said trustees the lease and options and the proper license to operate under certain letters patent in connection with said lease. Thereafter the trustees agree to keep such transfer books.

All this is set forth in his declaration. He proposes to begin the sale of such "interests" at once, and a form is set forth of the terms of the sale proposed to be made, embodying all the preceding provisions of the trust. The commissioner of corporations, it is alleged, is interfering with his business, and has informed him that the certificates of interest issued by him are "securities," as that term is defined in the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673, and amendments thereto [St. 1919, p. 231; St. 1921, p. 1114]), that a sale or issuance thereof without having a permit to do so, as provided in the act, is a public offense punishable by fine and imprisonment, and has demanded that he apply for such permit before proceeding further.

[1, 2] It will be seen from the foregoing that the commissioner of corporations is right in his contention. The certificates of interest which he proposes to issue under his trust scheme are "securities" within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act. "The singular number includes the plural, and the plural the singular," according to the opening clause of section 2 of the act, and so the fact that the assignor, so called, namely, Mr. Agnew, is the person who alone is to issue and sell the "interests," is of no moment. Their effect is the same as if they were issued and sold by trustees, consisting of two or more. The terms of the trust are to govern the rights of the holder in all cases. They are much the same as the "unit shares" or "unit interests" that were to be sold under the scheme set forth in the case of In re Girard, 186 Cal. 722, 200 Pac. 593, which were held to be subject to the same law. All the objections to the validity of the law urged by the petitioner here were considered and determined in that case to be without merit, except the following, namely, that said act allows the commissioner to issue a permit by the following clause:

"If he finds that the proposed plan of business of the applicant is not unfair, unjust or inequitable, that it intends to fairly and honestly transact its business, and that the securities that it proposes to issue and the methods to be used by it in issuing or disposing of them are not such as, in his opinion, will work a fraud upon the purchaser thereof, the commissioner shall issue to the applicant a permit authorizing it to issue and dispose of securities, as therein provided, in this state, in such amounts and for such considerations and upon such terms and conditions as the commissioner may in said permit provide. Otherwise he shall deny the application and refuse such permit and notify the applicant in writing of his decision."

He claims that this gives power to the commissioner to act arbitrarily and authorizes him to deny the applicant the equal protection of the law, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and to section 11, article 1, of our Constitution, requiring that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." The passage in the above quotation from the statute which allows the commissioner to issue a permit authorizing the applicant to sell his securities "upon such terms and conditions as the commissioner may in said permit provide" must be read in connection with the context, which provides that the commissioner must inquire into the method of doing business, and shall ascertain if the same is fair, just, and equitable, and that the methods used in disposing of them would not work a fraud upon the purchasers thereof. The terms and conditions to be prescribed in the permit must not be such as would make a greater burden than is consistent with safety and security. The condition imposed must be such as could fairly be said to be necessary to accomplish that purpose. If the commissioner should refuse to issue a permit, except upon conditions which would be unjust, unfair, or inequitable to the applicant, doubtless he would have the right to have such permit revised and reformed so as to make it equitable and fair, but we cannot assume that he will impose such conditions in advance of his action. He is proposing now to proceed in accordance with the law, and until he has exceeded his powers it is not proper for this court to interfere with him in performing them. The law is designed to secure fair dealing on the part of those who propose to sell corporate securities, and it should be observed by all who come within its terms. We think the petitioner is one of those who are to be controlled by the provision of the act.

The petition is denied.

DOMENIGONI v. IMPERIAL LIVE STOCK & MORTGAGE CO. (L. A. 7095.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1922. Rehearing Denied Sept. 28, 1922.)

1. Licenses ⟸18½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Subscriptions to stock held not to comply with permit of corporation commissioner under Blue Sky Law.

Under the Blue Sky Law and Civ. Code, §§ 1550, 1668, a permit issued by the corporation commissioner, authorizing the licensee to sell shares of its capital stock at par "upon subscription agreements providing for the payment of 25 per cent. of the subscription price in cash, and the execution of promissory notes bearing interest at 6 per cent. by the subscriber for the balance," was not complied with where the licensee's agent took a note to the corporation for 75 per cent. of a subscription, and another note for 25 per cent. thereof due in six months, payable to "myself" and indorsed by the purchaser, though the agent immediately thereafter converted the smaller note into cash by discounting it at a bank, the evidence being insufficient to show that the purchaser authorized the selling agent to make the discount as the agent of the purchaser, and the fact that the subscription contract recited that 25 per cent. of the price was paid in "cash," was immaterial.

2. Licenses ⟸39 — Neither party to illegal transaction in violation of Blue Sky Law entitled to relief.

Where a permit under the Blue Sky Law and Civ. Code, §§ 1550, 1668, authorized the sale of stock by the licensee "upon subscription agreements providing for the payment of 25 per cent. of the subscription price in cash," a transaction by which a purchaser of stock gave his note to the corporation for 75 per cent. of the subscription price and a smaller note for the balance to the sales agent, payable in six months to "myself," and indorsed by the purchaser to the agent, who immediately discounted the note at a bank, was merely a device to evade the law, and neither of the parties was entitled to relief in a court of equity, and the purchaser of the stock could not maintain an action to cancel the notes, though defendant did not interpose the defense of illegality.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; W. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Angelo Domenigoni against the Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Thomas T. Porteous, of Riverside, for appellant.

Marshall Stimson and Noel C. Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. This is an action to cancel and have delivered up to the plaintiff certain promissory notes delivered by plaintiff to the defendant, and also certain agreements by plaintiff with defendant for the purchase of stock of said defendant. The right of the plaintiff depends upon the provisions of the law for the regulation of corporations, approved May 18, 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 673), usually known as the "Blue Sky Law." His contention is that the notes and agreements were made in violation thereof, and that therefore they are against the policy of the law (Civ. Code, §§ 1550, 1668) and void.

This statute provides that no corporation shall sell its capital stock, except for a delinquent assessment, until it has secured from the commissioner of corporations a permit authorizing it to do so (section 3), and that the permit, when issued, shall authorize the corporation to issue and sell its "securities * * * in such amounts and for such considerations and upon such terms and conditions as the commissioner may in said permit provide" (section 4). The word "security," as defined in section 2, includes shares of the capital stock of the corporation which makes such sale. The act also provides that every corporation "which shall directly or indirectly issue or cause to be issued any security contrary to the provisions of this act, * * * or in nonconformity with a permit of the commissioner authorizing the same," is punishable by a fine not exceeding $10,000 (section 13); also that any agent of such company who does the like is guilty of a felony (section 14).

In pursuance of this act the corporation commissioner on December 30, 1919, issued to the defendant a permit granting it the right to sell 190,000 shares of its capital stock, at par, "upon subscription agreements providing for the payment of 25 per cent. of the subscription price in cash, and the execution of promissory notes bearing interest at 6 per cent., by the subscriber, for the balance," at the price of $10 per share; that being its par value. Under this permit the defendant sold to the plaintiff 2,000 shares of its stock at the price of $10 per share, by four separate sales; the first being a sale of 250 shares on June 10, 1920, the second for 250 shares on July 10, 1920, the third for 500 shares on October 19, 1920, and the fourth for 1,000 shares on November 17, 1920.

The plaintiff claims that each of these sales were made in consideration of his note for one-fourth of the price, made payable to himself, indorsed by him, and delivered by him to the agent of the defendant, and another note for three-fourths of the price payable directly to the defendant, and that in neither instance did he pay the one-fourth of the price in cash. The defendant, on the other hand, claims that on each occasion the plaintiff agreed to pay one-fourth of the price in cash, executed his note for a sum equal to such one-fourth, payable to himself, and indorsed and delivered the same to one

W. B. Lawrence; that he thereupon authorized Lawrence, in his behalf and as his agent, to sell said note at a bank for cash to raise the money necessary to make the cash payment by Domenigoni, and for him to apply such cash in payment of the one-fourth part of the purchase price of the stock then sold, and that Lawrence, in accordance therewith, made the sale and paid the money to the defendant in satisfaction of that part of the purchase price. The court made findings in favor of the defendant on this proposition, stating specifically therein with respect to each sale that:

"The plaintiff made the said W. B. Lawrence his agent and authorized him to cash the said note, * * * for the purpose of paying the first installment of the subscription agreement of even date with said note, which plaintiff executed at said time."

The judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

[1] The only question arising upon the appeal is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding of the court just quoted. The issuance and sale by the defendant of its capital stock, or an agreement for such sale, in a manner not in conformity with the permit issued to it by the commissioner of corporations, would be illegal and void. The permit so issued required that the agreement of sale of the stock should provide "for the payment of 25 per cent. of the subscription price in cash" and for the execution of notes by the purchaser for the balance. A sale made in consideration of a price, all of which was represented by notes given by the purchaser to the defendant or its agents, would be contrary to the permit. The sufficiency of the evidence to support this finding depends upon its sufficiency to show that the note for one-fourth of the price of each sale, given at the time thereof, was a note given to an agent of the defendant corporation in consummation of the sale, or a note executed by the plaintiff to his own agent, authorized to sell the note for its face value and apply the proceeds upon the cash payment by transmitting the same for plaintiff to the defendant.

The facts bearing on this question are in the main not contradicted. One C. H. McPhail was employed by the defendant as its exclusive agent to sell the 190,000 shares of stock above mentioned. The agreement provided that the defendant was to furnish McPhail with all statements and literature for any advertising campaign that McPhail should undertake in selling said stock, and that McPhail should use and make no statements or representations to any prospective purchaser, other than those contained in the literature so furnished. C. W. Francis was the manager for McPhail in selling said stock. Three agents appointed by McPhail or Francis were instrumental in negotiating the sales to the plaintiff, namely, W. B. Lawrence, Charles O. Harding, and James W. Lynch. Lawrence was present at the time each of the sales was made, Harding at the first two, and Lynch at the third and fourth. Harding and Lawrence first saw the plaintiff some time in April, 1920, and suggested to him the purchase of this stock. The plaintiff then expected to sell his farm for a considerable sum of money and expressed his desire to make an investment in case he sold it. The transactions with respect to each sale, as the evidence discloses, were precisely similar in all essential particulars, and the relation of one will suffice for all. On June 10, 1920, Lawrence and Harding visited the plaintiff at his residence. They had been furnished by McPhail with a supply of forms for the transaction then entered into. These included notes payable to "myself," payable in six months, other notes payable to the defendant by name and forms of authorization as hereinafter shown. They also included a form of subscription agreement providing for the payment of the price "not less than one-fourth cash accompanying this application, and the balance thereof as evidenced by promissory note of even date herewith, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum," and a form of receipt to the purchaser as hereinafter given.

On that occasion they obtained from the plaintiff his signature to an agreement in the form above stated for the purchase of 250 shares of stock and his note payable to the defendant for $1,875; also his note payable in six months to himself on one of the "myself" forms and his indorsement thereon, which note he then delivered to said Lawrence; also his signature to one of the authorization agreements aforesaid in the following words:

"June 10, 1920.

"To Any Bank or Banker:

"You are at liberty to purchase my note of this date for $625, given to W. B. Lawrence, if you desire.

"There are no offsets or conditions against this note. Angelo Domenigoni."

They also executed to him a receipt as follows:

"Receipt to be Given Subscriber.

"June 10, 1920.

"Received of Angelo Domenigoni, of Winchester, Calif., the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars. Cash, $625; notes $1875.

"Payable to Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company as payment for two hundred and fifty (250) shares of the capital stock of the Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company, as set forth in this subscription contract, numbered the same as the receipt and bearing even date herewith.

"(Not valid unless signed.)

"Imperial Live Stock & Mortgage Company,
"Harding & Lawrence, Special Agents."

The only evidence in regard to the proposition that the plaintiff then appointed Lawrence as his own agent to obtain the money for him on the "myself" note and make payment of one-fourth of the price therewith is the testimony of Lawrence, Harding, and Lynch, together with the contents of the documents aforesaid. Lawrence testified that the plaintiff read the agreement of subscription and the two notes, that he then explained to the plaintiff that it would be necessary for him to pay one-fourth cash, that the balance could be taken in notes, which could be carried by the company as long as he desired, provided he paid the interest, and that he (Lawrence) would "renew his original first payment note, if he so desired," referring to the "myself" note for one-fourth, of the price. His testimony as to his authorization to act as agent for plaintiff consisted of the following questions and answers:

"Q. Did you tell him by what method you expected to raise the money on his 'myself' notes? A. I told him, in lieu of cash, it was necessary for us to discount all notes.

"Q. Did you tell him that you would have to act for him in cashing that note? A. I told him I would discount these notes."

Harding testified on this subject that all the details were explained to the plaintiff, and that he was told that if he wanted this stock:

"We could arrange it so that he would make a cash payment, and that would be upon making this 'myself' note, which was different entirely from the note which was part of the application. Then his 'myself' note was supposed to cover the first payment, and be converted into cash through discount at a bank by Mr. Lawrence and myself.

"Q. Acting for whom? A. Acting for ourselves or for him. It was simply a case of getting him the money to make the first payment."

The plaintiff testified that he gave the two notes for the entire purchase price of the stock, and that he paid nothing in cash at the time of either purchase. Immediately after the purchase on each occasion the two agents departed with all the papers, except the receipt. The "myself" notes of June 10 and July 10 were both sold on July 12, 1920, for their face values to the First National Bank at Hemet by Lawrence, and he thereafter in due course transmitted the money to McPhail, together with the subsequent agreements and the other notes for the remainder of the price. The money obtained from the bank in Hemet was reported to the defendant's main office by McPhail or Lawrence, or both, as cash paid on the price of the stock sold on each occasion.

From the foregoing statement of the facts proven, it is plain that the transactions in question were planned and executed in the endeavor to circumvent the statute and evade the requirements of the permit allowing the defendant to sell this stock. McPhail was the exclusive and general agent of the defendant. It had agreed to make no sales thereof save through his agency. In carrying out his duties as agent it was necessary for him to have solicitors and salesmen to procure purchasers and make sales. He had appointed Lawrence, Harding, and Lynch as such salesmen, and had furnished them with a supply of the forms aforesaid, to enable them to carry out the plan in the manner here exhibited. He must be deemed to have intended they should do so, and to have authorized them to carry out the plan. These salesmen were the agents of the defendants for that purpose. The legal results are, therefore, the same as if the transaction had been carried out directly between Domenigoni on the one side and the managing agent of the defendant on the other, which was the same in effect as if it had been done by the defendant through the board of directors.

The permit authorized agreements of sale of the stock only upon the condition that one-fourth of the price was paid in cash at the time of its execution. The written agreements made in this case did, in form, declare that one-fourth should be paid in cash, but this provision was not fulfilled nor intended to be fulfilled. The cash was not paid. Instead, the plaintiff executed a note payable six months afterward to himself, indorsed it in blank, and delivered it to Lawrence, one of the defendant's agents engaged in negotiating the sale. The first payment, so far as Domenigoni, the payor, was concerned, was not made in cash, and would not be made by him until the six months expired. The permit did not specify that the defendant could accept a note, instead of the cash payment, or that it would be allowed to do so, provided it could negotiate the note and procure the cash by that means. Yet the latter is precisely what was done. Domenigoni's note was accepted by defendant's agents, and it was not until a month later that the cash was obtained on it.

To say that Lawrence was appointed by Domenigoni as his own agent to take his note to some bank and there obtain the cash, if he could, and then use it, for Domenigoni to pay for him the cash necessary to complete the transaction, would sanction a mere pretense of conformity to the statute and the permit. The transaction with Domenigoni was complete when the agents, after giving him a receipt for "cash $625," departed with his note for that sum due in six months, and no cash. There is no substantial evidence that he authorized Lawrence to cash the note for him, or that he ever supposed that to be the relation between them, even if so plain an evasion could be tolerated by the courts. The agreement of sale and the receipt each bears the signature "Harding & Lawrence, Special Agents," subscribed thereto. They were the active agents for the defendant, the seller, in the matter. Neither of these agents was willing to testify that he undertook to act also as the agent of the buyer, or that any suggestion to that effect was made to the buyer. When Lawrence was asked if he told Domenigoni that he would "have to act for him in cashing that note," his answer was: "I told him I would discount these notes." This was a plain evasion of the question, and it shows that the statement embraced in the question was not made. The statement that he would "discount the notes" does not imply that he said he would do so for Domenigoni, but, especially when made in answer to such a question, clearly implies that he made no such statement. Harding's testimony does not go as far as that of Lawrence. His testimony that, in converting the "myself" note into cash to cover the first payment, he and Lawrence would be "acting for ourselves or for him," is entirely noncommittal, and scarcely rises to the dignity of a conclusion, much less a statement of fact.

The plain facts were that in each case Domenigoni made an agreement to subscribe for stock which upon its face stated that one-fourth of the price was to be paid in cash, but in fact he gave his note, due six months thereafter, for the one-fourth, and another note for the balance, payable in installments at later dates, and the agents of the defendant thereafter sold the six-months notes and thereby obtained the cash wherewith and whereby the transaction might appear on the books of the defendant as a sale for one-fourth cash. The agents accepted the six-months note on behalf of themselves as agents for the defendant, and the subsequent sale thereof by them was in legal effect a sale by defendant, whether its directors and managing officers were aware of the details of the transaction or not. Its general agent, McPhail, is charged with full knowledge of it, for he prepared the papers required for its execution. If such subterfuges were permitted, the statute would soon become a dead letter, and the object it was designed to accomplish would be frustrated by the very persons against whose practices it is directed.

Therefore the court below erred in its findings. As to each case the court found that the plaintiff delivered the "myself" note to W. B. Lawrence as his agent, that defendant received from Lawrence the amount of said "myself" note in cash at the time said note was so delivered to Lawrence, that the defendant did not agree with plaintiff that if plaintiff would purchase the stock he could give notes for the full amount of the purchase price thereof, that it is not true that the whole purchase price of said stock was paid in promissory notes of the plaintiff, and that plaintiff made said Lawrence his agent, and authorized him, as such, to cash the said "myself" notes for the purpose of paying the first installment of the subscription agreement of the same date, and that defendant received the sum of 25 per cent. of each installment of such stock sold to plaintiff in cash. The court should have found that when each stock sale was made the plaintiff agreed to execute notes for the full price, three-fourths of the purchase price by the notes payable to defendant and the other one-fourth by the "myself" notes, and that said last-mentioned notes, though made to himself and indorsed in blank by him, were also delivered to plaintiff through the medium of Mr. Lawrence, who was the defendant's agent to receive them, and obtain the money on them, and not the agent of the plaintiff.

[2] But it does not follow that the plaintiff was entitled to any relief. The entire transaction was an attempt to circumvent the law. The notes and agreements were each of them made in violation thereof, and are therefore against the policy of the law, as he claims, and void. He was a party to them and is equally guilty with the defendant. In such a case the court will give no relief even if the point is not raised by either party. In Kreamer v. Earl, 91 Cal. at page 118, 27 Pac. at page 737, the court said:

"It may be suggested that the appellant has never questioned the legality of the contract, and that we ought not to make the point for him. * * * A court of equity will not allow itself to become a handmaid of iniquity of any kind. It intervenes, not for the sake of the party who is benefited by the intervention, but for the sake of the law itself. It matters not that no objection is made by either party; when the court discovers a fact which indicates that the contract is illegal and ought not to be enforced, it will, of its own motion, instigate an inquiry in relation thereto."

To the same effect, see Valentine v. Stewart, 15 Cal. 404; Abbe v. Marr, 14 Cal. 211; Davis v. Mitchell, 34 Cal. 89–90; Prost v. More, 40 Cal. 348; Bulson v. Moffat, 173 Cal. 686, 161 Pac. 259; Colby v. Title, etc., Co., 160 Cal. 640, 117 Pac. 913, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 515; Ripperdan v. Weldy, 149 Cal. 676, 87 Pac. 276; Los Angeles v. City Bank, 100 Cal. 24, 34 Pac. 510; McGregor v. Donnelly, 67 Cal. 149, 7 Pac. 422; 14 Cor. Jur. p. 492.

It follows that the court erred in its findings, and the judgment must be reversed, in order that proper findings may be entered; and the judgment should not carry costs in favor of the defendant. Each party should be left to pay his own costs.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. CASSELLA. (Cr. 632.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 18, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 14, 1922.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⟹236(13)—Evidence held to show that wine contained more than permitted percentage of alcohol.

Evidence that witness bought wine from defendant which had a kick to it held sufficient to show that the liquid sold contained more than 1 per cent. of alcohol, in violation of the Wyllie Law.

2. Criminal law ⟹1175—Failure to state in verdict each offense on which defendant was convicted held not prejudicial.

Where defendant was prosecuted under three counts, and the court instructed the jury that, if they found defendant guilty under all three counts, to return a verdict of guilty as charged, and they returned such a verdict, defendant was not prejudiced by a failure to literally comply with Pen. Code, § 954, providing that each offense on which defendant is convicted must be stated in the verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Louis Cassella was convicted of violating the Wyllie Local Option Law, and he appeals. Affirmed.

M. H. Iversen, of Ukiah, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted on two counts of selling alcoholic liquor and on one count of conducting a place where alcoholic liquor was sold, served, and distributed, and kept for the purpose of sale and distribution, all contrary to the provisions of the Wyllie Law (St. 1911, p. 599). He was sentenced to imprisonment for three months on each of counts 1 and 2, to run concurrently, and to pay a fine of $300 on the third count. The defendant appealed from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

A reversal is asked on two grounds: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to show that the liquor sold or kept for sale contained one per cent. or more of alcohol; (2) that the verdict is void for uncertainty.

[1] A witness for the prosecution testified, in support of the first count, that he purchased from the defendant "so-called wine" at 20 cents a glass and "so-called jackass" at 35 cents a glass; that the liquor had a kick to it; that he could feel it; that "they called it wine"—referring to the "so-called wine." In support of the second count the witness testified that he purchased from the defendant two glasses of wine at 20 cents a glass. The testimony produced in support of the third count is conclusive against the defendant. In People v. Mueller, 168 Cal. 521, 528, 143 Pac. 750, 751 (L. R. A. 1915B, 282) the court said:

"Wine is a well-known form of vinous liquor, and it is common knowledge that it contains alcohol. * * * Its character is so well known that the court takes judicial notice of these qualities, and also that it contains considerably more than 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol, that it is intoxicating when taken into the stomach and that it may be used as a beverage. Black on Intoxicating Liquors, § 5; 23 Cyc. 61. We are not aware of any case holding specifically that judicial notice will be taken of the fact that ordinary wine contains more than 1 per cent. of alcohol, but we do not doubt that it will."

[2] The verdict of the jury is as follows: "We the jury find the said defendant guilty as charged in the indictment." Section 954 of the Penal Code provides that "each offense upon which the defendant is convicted must be stated in the verdict." It is contended that "the jury in casting their votes could have reached the verdict as rendered with a portion of the jury voting on count 1, while another portion had in mind count 2 and still another portion of the members had in mind count 3," in other words, that the jurors may not all have agreed as to the defendant's guilt on any one count. The court gave the jury eight forms of verdict, among them the one rendered. The court instructed the jury as follows:

"The court has had prepared forms of verdicts one of which you will endeavor to find. * * * One verdict will read, 'We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty.' If you find * * * he is not guilty of either or any of the three counts, your foreman will sign that verdict and return into court. The next verdict, * * * 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment.' If you find the defendant guilty of all three counts, your foreman will sign that one and return into court. Another one reads, 'We, the jury, find the said defendant guilty as charged in count 1 of the indictment and not guilty as charged in counts 2 and 3.' Now in case you find the defendant guilty of the first count of the indictment, and not guilty in the last two counts, you will return that verdict."

In a similar manner the court instructed as to other possible verdicts. If the jurors followed the plain instructions of the court, and it must be presumed that they did, then the verdict is not uncertain. It is not in literal compliance with the provisions of section 954 of the Penal Code, but under the circumstances disclosed the defendant could have suffered no prejudice therefrom. Had the jury expressly found the defendant "guilty on all counts as charged in the indictment," it would hardly be contended that the verdict was uncertain, and, in effect, this is what the jury did. In Ballew v. United States, 160 U. S. 187, 16 Sup. Ct. 263, 40 L. Ed. 388, in considering a similar question, where the trial court had instructed the jury, "that, if they considered the defendant guilty on one count and innocent on the other, they should so find, and, if they found him guilty on both counts, that they should return a general verdict," and the jury had returned a general verdict of guilty, the court said:

"The verdict was a general verdict. That in a case such as this a general verdict is proper, and imports of necessity a conviction as to both crimes, is settled."

In view of the uncertainty apparently existing as to the correct form of verdict in such cases, it is deemed not improper to suggest that, where two or more offenses are charged, it would be a full compliance with the statute to furnish the jury a single form of verdict. In this case the following form would have been sufficient, with instructions to insert the words "guilty" or "not guilty" in the blank spaces in accordance with the finding of the jury on each count:

"We, the jury, find the defendant ——— as charged in the first count of the indictment; we find him ——— as charged in the second count; and we find him ——— as charged in the third count."

See State v. Blunt, 110 Mo. 322, 339, 19 S. W. 650.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

FAHEY v. MADDEN et al. (Civ. 2472.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 17, 1922.)

1. Highways ⇐184(3)—Pedestrian, walking on left side of road and turning to left, held not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

A pedestrian, walking on the left side of a highway and turning to the left in trying to avoid an automobile, which struck him, held not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

2. Highways ⇐175(1)—Rule of care as between pedestrian and automobilist stated.

An automobilist and a pedestrian must make reasonable use of all of their senses for the prevention of accidents, and exercise such reasonable caution as ordinarily careful and prudent persons would exercise under like circumstances.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by T. H. Fahey against Winfield Madden, Robert Boen, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Robert Boen appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 206 Pac. 128.

Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, for appellant.

W. H. Morrissey, of San Francisco, and P. B. Lynch, of Vallejo, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an appeal by Robert Boen from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, based upon the verdict of a jury for $8,000 against both defendants, allowed as damages for personal injuries. It was alleged in the complaint that Madden was the owner of a certain automobile and—

"that the said defendant Boen at the time of the accident herein complained of was driving said motor vehicle with the permission, consent, and approval of said defendant, Madden, and while so driving said motor vehicle on the 14th day of December, 1917, negligently and carelessly drove the said motor vehicle into and over the plaintiff, knocking him to the ground with great force and violence, breaking his leg, and bruising and injuring him to such an extent that it was necessary to amputate his right leg just above the knee, and plaintiff's leg was in fact by reason of said negligence and carelessness amputated just above the knee."

[1] The only contention of appellant is that his motion for nonsuit should have been granted, for the reason that the only rational conclusion that could be drawn from the testimony for plaintiff is that he was chargeable with contributory negligence. As we view the record, the position is utterly untenable. The testimony of plaintiff is to the effect that, when the accident occurred, about 7 o'clock in the evening, he was walking in an easterly direction along the state highway just east of Fairfield, in Solano county. He was returning from Suisun to his work at Cement, and was traveling on the left-hand side of the road, about the width of an automobile off of the concrete pavement. When he first saw the automobile, it was traveling on said highway in a southerly direction, and was then about a mile away. The highway makes a right angle turn from the northerly and southerly direction to the easterly and westerly direction just before the point where the accident occurred, according to the testimony of Fahey, and the automobile had rounded this turn and had traveled about 25 or 30 feet, when it swerved to the north of the concrete part of the highway and collided with plaintiff, inflicting the very serious injuries that are described in the complaint. When plaintiff saw the imminence of the danger, in his own language, he "made an effort to get over there to the left, to get out of the way of the machine; it caught me before I could get out of the way."

Appellant would have the court hold that contributory negligence should be imputed to plaintiff by reason of each of the two circumstances, that he was walking on the left-hand side of the road, instead of the right, and that he turned to the left, rather than the other direction, when he tried to avoid the machine. As to the former, there is no law and no established criterion of conduct that attributes negligence to one who walks on the left side of a highway. In Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 482, 143 Pac. 747, it is said:

"As to foot passengers, the old common-law freedom of use of the king's highway has not been modified in this state by any positive enactment; so that it still remains the law that foot passengers have the right to use and traverse the highway at all its points, being chargeable only for the exercise of a due amount of care, which due amount of care, in its quantum, is governed by the circumstances attending the use which the pedestrian actually makes. Thus in this state, even in populous streets of cities, pedestrians are not restricted to the crossings in traversing a street, but may cross it at any point. And the same is true of their right to walk along the road bed of a highway."

[2] Of course, the general rule applies that the person having the management of the automobile and the traveler on foot are both required to use such reasonable care, circumspection, prudence, and discretion as the circumstances require, an increase of care being required where there is an increase of danger; "and both are bound to the reasonable use of all their senses for the prevention of accident, and the exercise of all such reasonable caution as ordinarily careful and prudent persons would exercise under like circumstances." 2 Elliott on Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) p. 667. But it cannot be said that plaintiff by traveling as he did failed to meet this requirement. Indeed, there is room for the opinion that "it is safer," in the language of respondent, "to walk along the highway on the side of the road facing the oncoming traffic rather than take the chance of walking on the opposite side and of being struck by unseen automobile from behind." It is further declared that the soldiers of the United States army, when not marching in formation, are required to walk on the side of the road facing the oncoming traffic. At any rate, for a pedestrian to walk on that side cannot be said as a matter of law to constitute negligence. Moreover, it is to be remembered that plaintiff testified that he was walking a machine's width from the paved highway. Assuredly, that could not be considered a place of danger, and he would not be chargeable with negligence in anticipating that an oncoming machine would not leave the pavement, which was constructed for automobile traffic, and to which the operation of machines is ordinarily confined.

Neither can it be said that in turning to the left he was necessarily guilty of contributory negligence. In considering his conduct the excitement and confusion of the moment must be accorded due weight, and under such circumstances, if he made a mistake, the law would hardly hold it against him. Moreover, since he was walking away from the pavement, and might reasonably expect that the driver would attempt to keep his machine thereon, what more natural thing than for the pedestrian to try to get still further away when he found that the machine was bearing down upon him? Manifestly his position upon the highway must be regarded in determining what movement reasonable care would require of him when it appeared to him that he was in danger of being run over. If he had been on the paved portion of the highway a different situation might have presented itself, but, under the circumstances, we think no court could hold that the only rational conclusion is that he acted without due caution and circumspection.

We think the trial court was clearly right in denying the motion for a nonsuit, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

EVANS et al. v. SHOCKLEY.
(Civ. 4137; S. F. 10001.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 3, 1922. Rehearing Denied Aug. 2, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 31, 1922.)

1. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⟸23—Use of trade-name by one not true owner may be restrained.

Under Pol. Code, § 3197, providing for the recording of a trade-name with secretary of state, and section 3199, providing that the one who has first adopted and used a trade-name, whether within or without the state, is its original owner, the rights thus acquired are property rights, and may be protected from invasion by an injunction.

2. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⟸33—Trade-name may be transferred separately from the business.

Under Pol. Code, § 3199, providing for the transfer of trade-names, a trade-name may be lawfully transferred, so as to separate it from the business or commodity to which it pertains.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Suit for injunction by Fanny Riegel Evans and others against Laura M. Shockley. From an order granting an injunction pendente lite, defendant appeals. Affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Charles C. Boynton, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Grove L. Johnson, of Sacramento, and Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant, Laura M. Shockley, from an order awarding plaintiffs an injunction pendente lite restraining defendant from using upon any place of business conducted by her, or in which she might be interested, and in any advertising, or printed, written, or painted matter, or in any linen, table coverings, napkins, or silverware, the name "Mary Elizabeth," or "Mary Elizabeth's," or "Mary Elizabeth of San Francisco," or any colorable simulation thereof. The application for said injunction was heard and determined upon the allegations of the verified complaint and upon certain affidavits filed on behalf of the respective parties.

From the record presented on said application the following facts appear: About the year 1897, in the city of Syracuse, state of New York, one of the plaintiffs, Mary Elizabeth E. Sharpe (formerly Mary Elizabeth Evans), who was then 13 years of age, began making and selling candies to her friends, which soon became known about that city as "Mary Elizabeth's" candies. Because of its good quality the candy soon came into much demand, and in the year 1900 a copartnership was formed between the maker of said candies and the other plaintiffs herein, and a place of business was opened in said city of Syracuse. The business rapidly developed, and during the next few years tea rooms were opened and operated under the name "Mary Elizabeth's" in New York City, Boston, Syracuse, Newport, R. I., and in the city of Hamilton, island of Bermuda, all of which, except the one in Bermuda, were going concerns at the time of the commencement of this action. As a part of that business, confections and pastries of different kinds were made and sold under the name "Mary Elizabeth's," shipments of said products were made to various parts of the country, including California, and plaintiffs claim that said tea rooms and products have acquired a wide reputation in this country and abroad, and that resulting therefrom a business of great value, alleged by plaintiffs to be worth $500,000, has been established under the name "Mary Elizabeth's." Under the terms of the lease, plaintiffs allege that they pay a rental of $40,000 per year for the New York tea room.

In 1914 plaintiffs trade-marked the name "Mary Elizabeth's" in the United States Patent Office, Washington, D. C., for candies, chocolates, jellies, marmalades, preserves, etc.; the same being affixed to these goods with printed labels, etc. In the year 1917 one William E. Harris and wife opened a tea room in Los Angeles under the trade-name "Mary Elizabeth Tea Room," and filed with the secretary of state of this state, in accordance with section 3197 of the Political Code, their trade-name "The Mary Elizabeth Tea Room." Thereafter, upon the objection of these plaintiffs to the use of said name by said Harris and wife, the latter ceased doing business under said trade-name, and assigned said trade-name and the right to exclusive use thereof to the plaintiffs. On May 9, 1921, the defendant, Laura M. Shockley, and a partner (who retired from the firm prior to the commencement of this action) opened a tea room at No. 445 Powell street, San Francisco, near the St. Francis Hotel, under the name of "Mary Elizabeth of San Francisco," and all of the linen used therein was marked and the silver was engraved "Mary Elizabeth." All advertising matter also bore said trade-name.

It appears from the evidence offered that, because of the use of said trade-name, customers, particularly tourists, would occasionally, from day to day, call at said tea room so conducted by defendant, and make inquiries as to whether defendant had on sale the products of the plaintiffs, and that, when reply was made in the negative, several inquirers highly praised plaintiffs' products and advised defendant to secure the agency, which she endeavored to do, but received no reply to her letter. According to plaintiffs' evidence, as soon as plaintiffs learned of the defendant's appropriation of said trade-name they protested, because, it was claimed, the use thereof was a source of confusion to the public and an injury to plaintiffs' business. On June 28, 1921, defendant filed with the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, and thereafter published in a newspaper, a certificate announcing that defendant was doing business under the fictitious name of "Mary Elizabeth of San Francisco" at No. 445 Powell street.

There is a dispute as to the reason why defendant adopted said trade-name, but in this respect defendant admits that she had visited plaintiffs' place of business in New York City and "was agreeably impressed therewith." After plaintiffs had objected to the use of such trade-name by defendant, negotiations were had between the parties for a settlement of their dispute, and defendant finally agreed to accept from plaintiffs $250 to partly cover the expenditure she had been put to in advertising and buying equipment, but plaintiffs declined to pay any greater sum than $100. This action was thereupon commenced. There are, of course, many other facts stated by the affidavits and the verified complaint, but we think the foregoing statement is sufficient for the purposes of considering the law points involved.

[1] We are of the opinion that under the express statutory law of this state the lower court was justified, in view of the facts presented, in granting the preliminary injunction. The evidence shows without dispute that at the time of the commencement of the action plaintiffs were the exclusive owners of said trade-name by reason, first, of the issuance of said certificate of registration by the federal government; and, secondly, by the recordation of said trade-name with the secretary of state in this state and the subsequent assignment thereof to plaintiffs.

Sections 3199 and 3197 of the Political Code provide:

"Sec. 3199. Any person who has first adopted and used a trade-mark or name, whether within or beyond the limits of this state, is its original owner. Such ownership may be transferred in the same manner as personal property, and is entitled to the same protection by suits at law; and any court of competent jurisdiction may restrain, by injunction, any use of trade-marks or names in violation of this chapter."

"Sec. 3197. Any person may record any trade-mark or name by filing with the secretary of state his claim to the same, and a copy or description of such trade-mark or name, with his affidavit attached thereto, certified to by any officer authorized to take acknowledgments of conveyances, setting forth that he (or the firm or corporation of which he is a member) is the exclusive owner, or agent of the owner of such trade-mark or name."

These provisions seem to be clear and unambiguous. By them it is provided that ownership of a trade-name may be acquired, either by a prior adoption within or without the state, or by registering such name with the secretary of state. Here plaintiffs have done both. The statute also expressly provides that such ownership may be transferred. The rights thus acquired under the statute are property rights and may be protected by injunction from invasion. Spieker v. Lash, 102 Cal. 38, 36 Pac. 362; Italian-Swiss Colony v. I. Vineyard Co., 158 Cal. 252, 110 Pac. 913, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439.

[2] Appellant's principal contention on this branch of the case is that the acquisition by plaintiffs of the name "Mary Elizabeth Tea Room" conveyed nothing, as the right to an exclusive use of a name is postulated on the user of the name in connection with some business, and that since plaintiffs did not purchase the business from Harris and wife, nor continue its use, but only purchased the name, that plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief sought. We do not understand that such is the law. It should be borne in mind that in this particular phase of the case we are not dealing with the question of "unfair competition," but with property rights. If plaintiffs were seeking the injunction upon the single theory that it was a case of unfair competition, appellant's point might be well taken.

There is nothing in the Code sections above quoted, we think, to justify appellant's contention in this respect, and certainly we are not allowed to enlarge upon the provisions of the statute. The principle that an assignee of a trade-name, who does not purchase or continue the business, may be protected by an injunction under the provisions of said Code sections above quoted, seems to be recognized in Spieker v. Lash, supra.

Appellant's final contention, to the effect that plaintiffs have no right to an injunction, because it does not appear that they have suffered irreparable injury or damage, is also, we think, without merit. Dealing with the question as we have, from the standpoint of the invasion of property rights, it was a proper case for injunction. Regis v. Jaynes, 185 Mass. 458, 70 N. E. 480, cited with approval in Modesto Creamery v. Stanislaus Co., 168 Cal. 289, 142 Pac. 845. Holding, as we do, that the preliminary injunction was properly issued, under the theory that plaintiff's property rights have been invaded it is unnecessary to discuss the question of "unfair competition."

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for an order that the above-entitled cause be heard and determined by this court after judgment by the District Court of Appeal is denied. In so doing we do not at this time either approve or disapprove that portion of the opinion which holds that a registered trade-mark or trade-name can be lawfully transferred, so as to separate it from the business or commodity to which it pertains. That holding was not necessary to the decision, because the order appealed from is sufficiently supported by the showing made in the trial court in support of the claim of unfair competition.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 11, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 7, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜874(5)—Authority to change judgment not reviewable on appeal from grant of new trial.

Right of court, on defendant's motion to vacate joint judgment for plaintiffs and enter judgment for each of different amounts, aggregating the amount of the first, cannot be considered on appeal from order granting new trial for excessive damages, any more than it could have been considered on the motion.

2. New trial ⊜163(2)—Judgment falls on granting of new trial.

Whatever judgment is legally in force prior to order for new trial falls with the order.

3. Appeal and error ⊜933(4)—Relative to presumption, statement in order that new trial was granted for excessive damages tantamount to specification of insufficiency of evidence.

Statement in order for new trial, that it is made on the ground of "excessive damages," is tantamount to specification that it is granted on insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, obviating the presumption, otherwise obtaining on appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, as amended by St. 1919, p. 141, that the order was not based on that ground.

4. Death ⊜97—Award of damages not exempt from interference by trial judge.

Provision of Code Civ Proc. § 377, that, in action for death by wrongful act, "such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just," does not make amount of award exclusively a matter for the jury, with which the trial judge may not interfere.

5. Appeal and error ⊜979(5)—Grant of new trial for excessive damages disturbed only for plain abuse of discretion.

Order granting new trial on the ground of excessive damages will be disturbed only in case it clearly appears that the trial judge abused his discretion; every intendment being indulged in support of his action.

6. Appeal and error ⊜1015(3)—Weight of uncontradicted evidence of damages for trial judge on motion for new trial.

Though there be no conflict in the evidence as to the nature and extent of plaintiffs' pecuniary losses from deceased's death, the probative force and effect is ultimately for the trial judge's determination on motion for new trial.

7. Appeal and error ⊜837(7)—Answers to special interrogatories looked to in determining how verdict was arrived at.

Though, in action for death of an adult by wrongful act, Code Civ. Proc. § 377, gives the heirs a single joint cause of action, and the verdict, if against defendant, should be for a single lump sum, the jurors' answers to special interrogatories may be looked to, in order to determine how they arrived at the amount of their general verdict.

8. Death ⊜85—Damages limited to pecuniary loss to beneficiaries.

The damages recoverable under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, for wrongful death, are limited strictly to pecuniary loss to the beneficiaries caused by the death.

9. Death ⊜58(2)—Evidence of competency and disposition of deceased adult child to aid parents necessary.

To show damages to a parent from death of an adult child, by way of deprivation of direct financial assistance or services, there must be at least some evidence tending to show competency and disposition of the child to render service to, or contribute to the aid of, the parent.

10. Death ⊜95(3)—Expectancy of life of parent considered in fixing damages for death of adult child.

In estimating, as an element of a parent's damages from wrongful death of an adult child, the present value of financial assistance or service which could reasonably have been expected, the life expectancy of the parent, and not of the child, is to be considered.

11. Death ⊜86(1)—Accommodations furnished by parent considered in estimating damages from death of adult child.

In estimating the pecuniary value to a parent of services of an adult child as an element of damages from the child's wrongful death, the value of board, lodging, and other accommodations furnished to the child by the parent, with whom the child was living, is to be considered.

12. Death ⊜88—Only "pecuniary" value of deceased's society recoverable as damages.

It is only the "pecuniary" value of deceased's society, comfort, and protection which his beneficiaries can recover as an element of damages for his wrongful death.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Pecuniary.]

13. New trial ⊜76(4)—No abuse of discretion shown in grant for excessive damages.

Evidence in action by husband, father, and mother for wrongful death of adult woman held to show no abuse of discretion in granting a new trial on the ground of excessive damages.

14. New trial ⊜76(4)—Properly granted in death action, where loss of any heir is assessed too high.

The heirs having but a single joint cause of action for wrongful death, and the verdict being required to be for a single lump sum, it is properly set aside and new trial granted, where it appears from answers to special interrogatories that an excessive award was made in assessing loss of any of the beneficiaries.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Roy B. Griffey and others against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From an order granting defendant a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and W. R. Millar, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order granting defendant a new trial in an action wherein plaintiffs, as the heirs of Gladys Rhodes Griffey, a married woman, sue defendant, under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to recover damages for the death of Mrs. Griffey, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. The plaintiff Roy Griffey is the surviving husband, and the plaintiffs Fred Rhodes and Margaret Rhodes are, respectively, the father and mother, of the deceased. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $10,000, and likewise made answer to certain special interrogatories which had been submitted to them. The questions submitted and the jury's answers thereto were as follows:

"(1) Q. How much pecuniary damage, if any, do you find that Roy B. Griffey suffered by reason of the death of his wife? A. One thousand [dollars].

"(2) Q. How much pecuniary damage, if any, do you find that Fred Rhodes suffered by reason of the death of the deceased? A. Eight thousand [dollars].

"(3) Q. How much pecuniary damage, if any, do you find that Margaret Rhodes suffered by reason of the death of the deceased? A. One thousand [dollars]."

On the same day that the general verdict was rendered and the answers to the special questions were returned, the clerk entered a judgment against defendant for $10,000. This judgment made mention of the general verdict only. Within 24 hours after the rendition of the verdict, the trial court, on defendant's motion, vacated that judgment and entered a judgment against defendant which, after reciting the general verdict, the special interrogatories, and the jury's answers thereto, adjudged that the husband of the deceased, Roy B. Griffey, recover of defendant the sum of $1,000, that the father, Fred Rhodes, recover the sum of $8,000, and that the mother, Margaret Rhodes, recover of defendant the sum of $1,000. Thereafter, and in due time, defendant moved for a new trial upon all of the statutory grounds. The order granting the motion states that it is granted "on the ground of excessive damages."

[1, 2] It is objected that the court had no authority to set aside the first and direct the entry of the second judgment. Whether the court possessed the right to vacate the first judgment and cause the second to be entered was not a question which could be agitated on the motion for a new trial, and it is not a matter which can be considered on this appeal from the order granting the new trial. Whichever judgment was legally in force prior to the time when the new trial was ordered fell with the granting of the new trial.

[3] Because the order granting a new trial did not state in so many words that it was granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, it is claimed that it must be presumed, on this appeal, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict for the full amount thereof—$10,000. This claim is based upon that provision of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure which, since the amendment of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 141), reads:

"When a new trial is granted upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from such order, it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground."

By subdivision 5 of section 657, "excessive damages, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice," is made one of the grounds for a new trial, and by subdivision 6 "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict" is made another ground for a new trial. An order granting a new trial on the ground of "excessive damages" necessarily is made under one or the other of these two subdivisions. Whether the order in the instant case was made under subdivision 6—that is, whether it was made on the ground that, irrespective of the influence of any passion or prejudice, the evidence fails to show that the pecuniary loss suffered by plaintiffs amounted to $10,000—or whether it was made under subdivision 5 on the ground that the verdict was influenced by passion and prejudice, in either case the statement in the order that it is made on the ground of "excessive damages" is tantamount to a specification that the new trial was granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict for $10,000. If a new trial on the ground of "excessive damages" be granted under the sixth subdivision, it necessarily is granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict for the amount awarded by the jury. If it be granted under the fifth subdivision, it is equally true that it is granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict for an amount as great as that returned by the jury; for, as our Supreme Court has pointed out, to say that a verdict has been influenced by passion or prejudice is but another way of saying that it exceeds any amount justified by the evidence. Doolin v.

Omnibus Cable Co., 125 Cal. 144, 57 Pac. 774; Graybill v. De Young, 140 Cal. 327, 73 Pac. 1067; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 254, 116 Pac. 513. See, also, Meinberg v. Jordan, 29 Cal. App. 762, 157 Pac. 1005, 1007. For these reasons there is no merit in the claim that on this appeal we are precluded from determining whether the trial court abused its discretion in granting a new trial on the ground that the damages are excessive.

[4] Because it is declared by section 377 that, in actions of this character, "such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just," it is claimed that the amount of the award is exclusively a matter for the jury, with which the trial judge may not interfere. There is not even the faintest semblance of merit in this point. There is no reason to believe that the Legislature intended to place cases of this character in a special class with respect to the right of the trial court to grant a new trial upon any of the grounds enumerated in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The right of the trial judge to grant a new trial in this class of cases when he deems the damages awarded by the jury to be excessive has received the sanction of our Supreme Court in a number of cases. See, for example, Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 Pac. 1019. In Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 285, 113 Pac. 372, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50—an action by a mother to recover damages for the death of her son alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant—Mr. Justice Shaw, speaking for the court, says:

"With regard to the danger of excessive verdicts, * * * we can only say that the remedy is practically committed entirely to the judge who presides at the trial in the court below. If he does his duty, he will carefully weigh the evidence himself, and will not allow a verdict to stand for its full amount, if he believes it gives more damages than the pecuniary loss that it may be reasonably supposed the plaintiff will actually suffer by being deprived of the services, earnings, society, comfort, and protection of the child. * * * Juries should be insistently cautioned not to allow compensation for the sorrow and distress which always ensues from such a death, nor for a pecuniary loss which is remote or conjectural in the particular case. The trial court should be vigilant to set aside verdicts where there is reason to believe this has been done, or that passion, prejudice, or sympathy has influenced the jury to give more than the facts reasonably warrant."

[5, 6] For the foregoing reasons, the order granting a new trial must be affirmed unless we can say that the trial court abused its discretion. When the action of a trial judge in granting a new trial on the ground of excessive damages comes before an appellate court, the order will not be reversed, unless it plainly appears that the trial judge abused his discretion. Every intendment is to be indulged here in support of his action, and it will not be disturbed if the question of its propriety is open to debate. Doolin v. Omnibus Cable Co., supra; Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., supra. And even though there be no conflict in the evidence as to the nature and extent of the pecuniary losses suffered by the plaintiffs, nevertheless the probative force and effect of the evidence upon that phase of the case is ultimately for the determination of the judge of the trial court upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial. Meinberg v. Jordan, supra.

[7] That the evidence in this case warranted the court in granting a new trial is clearly apparent. We know from the answers to the special interrogatories that the jury assessed the father's pecuniary loss at $8,000, the mother's at $1,000, and the husband's at $1,000. It is true that in this class of cases the Code gives to the heirs a single joint cause of action, and that the verdict, if against the defendant, should be for a single lump sum (Robinson v. Western States Gas Co., 184 Cal. 401, 194 Pac. 39); but this is no reason why we may not look to the jurors' answers to the special interrogatories in order to determine how they arrived at a total of $10,000.

Nowhere in the record can we find anything to warrant the conclusion that the father suffered a pecuniary loss of $8,000, or that the mother's actual loss was as great as $1,000. The sole evidence bearing upon the matters which were proper subjects for consideration in estimating the pecuniary damages resulting to plaintiffs from the death of Mrs. Griffey was the evidence given by the father, the plaintiff Fred Rhodes, whose testimony in that regard, stated in narrative form, is substantially as follows:

I am 58 years old. I have lived in Los Angeles county a year. I did not do any business here until last February, when I went into a variety store on American avenue in Long Beach. Gladys Rhodes Griffey was my daughter. She was married to the plaintiff Roy B. Griffey. My wife, the plaintiff Margaret Rhodes, and I separated about 15 years ago. At the time of the accident my daughter was living with me. Her husband was a salesman for the Cadillac automobile people. My daughter was 24 years old at that time. She had been married 4 years. She had no children. She was not employed at the time of the accident. She was keeping house for me. Her husband, who was the agent for the Cadillac automobile at Santa Ana, was always at my house in Long Beach on Sundays. He came to the house for Saturday night and Sunday. Except that she kept house for me, my daughter had never worked. Oh, yes; she did some moving picture work once at a studio, but she did not work there regularly; they called her at times. She had a friend that had a studio, and that friend called her occasionally, and she would go over and appear in pictures and then come back. It was not steady. She didn't depend upon that at all. It was more a fancy, I guess, than anything else. It was just a notion. She was not earning any money. She was the only housekeeper I had. I depended on her, and her husband was there with us when he was at home. I did not pay her anything for keeping house for me, and she paid no board. Her only heirs are myself, her mother, and her husband. At the time of the accident my daughter's health was perfect. She had never been sick in her life, and was perfectly strong, healthy, and normal.

[8] The general rule in this class of cases is that the damages must be limited strictly to the pecuniary loss to the beneficiaries caused by the wrongful death. Bond v. United Railroads, supra, 159 Cal. 279, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50. Since the amount recoverable is the pecuniary loss sustained by the beneficiaries of the statute, and since the elements which go to make up the value of a decedent's life to the designated beneficiaries are necessarily personal in each case, in the very nature of things the assessment of damages does not admit of mathematical precision, but is left to the sound discretion of the jury, which, however, is subject to the supervisory power of the court, and must be exercised in accord with the rules established for the assessment of damages in cases of this character.

The rules applicable to the instant case may be formulated substantially as follows: No damages can be given for the pain or anguish suffered by the person who is killed; the damages, as we have stated, being limited to the pecuniary loss suffered by the person or persons for whose benefit the right of action is given by reason of the death of the victim. Bond v. United Railroads, supra, 159 Cal. 277, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50. This pecuniary loss may be a loss arising from a deprivation of something to which the statutory beneficiary would have been legally entitled if the person had lived, or it may be a pecuniary loss arising from the deprivation of something which, from all the circumstances of the particular case, it could reasonably be expected such beneficiary would have received from the deceased had his life not been taken—even though the obligation resting on the deceased to bestow such benefit may have been but a moral obligation. Sneed v. Marysville Gas., etc., Co., 149 Cal. 710, 87 Pac. 376; Bond v. United Railroads, supra. Thus, there might be a reasonable expectation that, if the life of a deceased had continued, he might have accumulated a greater estate, and that the increased estate would have been inherited by the statutory beneficiaries as his heirs; or there might be a reasonable expectation that, if the life of a deceased had not been taken, the statutory beneficiaries, or some of them, would have continued to receive from the one who was killed financial assistance, or services having a financial value. These are illustrations of direct financial benefits for the loss of which damages may be awarded. In addition to the direct financial benefits which heirs may reasonably expect to receive from the continuance of the life of the deceased, there is that less tangible, and not so immediate, but nevertheless real, pecuniary benefit which often may reasonably be expected from a continuance of the "society, comfort, and protection" of the deceased. Of the principles by which the jury is to be guided in determining the damages due to the pecuniary loss arising from the deprivation of the "society, comfort, and protection" of a deceased, we shall speak presently.

[9] There is a distinction between the injuries resulting to a parent from the death of a minor child and those resulting from the death of an adult child. In the case of the former the law gives to the parent the right to the child's services and the proceeds of his labor; and the probability that the minor would remain in the service of the parent during minority, or would have permitted the parent to have the proceeds of his labor, is said to be unimportant. But this rule does not apply in the case of injuries resulting from the death of an adult child, to whose services the parent has no legal right. In a suit to recover damages occasioned by the death of an adult child the plaintiff should show that there was a reasonable expectation that the parent would receive a benefit had the life of such child continued; and in the absence of a legal right to his services, such reasonable expectation of benefit to be received by the parent would depend upon the ability and will of the adult child to confer the benefit upon the parent. Winnt v. International, etc., R. Co., 74 Tex. 32, 11 S. W. 907, 5 L. R. A. 172. In Calumet, etc., M. Co. v. Gardner, 21 Ariz. 206, 187 Pac. 563, the court says:

"The measure of damages, where the child is an adult, as here, is the reasonable expectation of the parent of pecuniary benefit from the continuance of the life of the child. Dooley v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 163 N. C. 454, L. R. A. 1916E, 185, and note. * * * The expectation must be based upon some fact or facts aside from the relationship. When a child becomes of age, all his earnings and accumulations are his to use as he sees fit. The laws of this state do not require an adult child to contribute his services or his earnings to his parents' support."

See, also, Fordyce v. McCants, 51 Ark. 509, 11 S. W. 694, 4 L. R. A. 296, 14 Am. St. Rep. 69; Hines v. Nicols (Ind. App.) 130 N. E. 140, and 17 C. J. title "Death," par. 202.

And while it may not always be necessary to show that the adult child, after coming of age, had ever done anything for his parent, since the reasonable expectation may exist, even though the parent, not being in need, had never received anything from the child after the latter had reached majority (Dooley v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 163 N. C. 454, 79 S. E. 970, L. R. A. 1916E, 185), nevertheless, to entitle the parent to recover for the death of an adult child, there must be some evidence showing, to a reasonable certainty, a pecuniary loss, and, with some reasonable probability, the amount thereof; that is, there must be evidence showing the competency and disposition of the adult child to respond to the parent's needs. Fordyce v. McCants, supra; Andrezejewski v. Northwestern Fuel Co., 158 Wis. 170, 148 N. W. 37. The rule that there must be some evidence tending to show the competency and the disposition on the part of the child, after reaching his majority to render service to the parent or to contribute to his aid, is generally satisfied by a showing that the deceased child, after having reached his majority, had been accustomed to aid his parent by the rendition of valuable services, performed in recognition of a filial duty and not under contract, or by the contribution of money, or its equivalent, toward the support of his parent. McCord v. Schaff, 279 Mo. 558, 216 S. W. 320; Fordyce v. McCants, supra; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Vester, 47 Ind. App. 141, 93 N. E. 1039. See, also, L. R. A. 1916E, 197, 198, note to Dooley v. Seaboard Air Line Ry Co., supra; 17 C. J. 1331; and Parsons v. Easton, 184 Cal. 770, 195 Pac. 419.

[10, 11] Though one of the elements of damage which may be suffered by the parent of an adult child is the present value of such future financial assistance as the parent might reasonably expect from a continuance of the child's life, or the present value of such future services as the parent could reasonably expect to have received, had the child lived, still, in estimating the amount of such damages, it is the expectancy of life of the parent, not the life of the child, which is to be taken into consideration; for, as is usually the case, the child's expectancy of life exceeds that of the parent. Fordyce v. McCants, supra. See, also, Parsons v. Easton, supra. And in estimating the pecuniary value to the parent of the services of an adult child, the jury should take into account the value of any board and lodging or other accommodations which the parent may be furnishing to the adult child, if the latter is living with his parent.

[12] Besides the pecuniary loss arising from the deprivation of direct financial assistance or from the deprivation of services, there may be, as we have said, a pecuniary loss arising from the deprivation of the "society, comfort, and protection" of the decedent. Beeson v. Green Mountain Co., 57 Cal. 38; Parsons v. Easton, supra. But while loss of society, comfort, and protection may be an element of the injury sustained by the statutory beneficiaries, it is only the pecuniary, and not the sentimental, value of such loss which may be taken into consideration in the assessment of damages. Nothing can be recovered as a solatium for wounded feelings. If the society of the deceased was of no financial value to the statutory beneficiaries, no damages can be awarded for its loss. Dickinson v. Southern Pacific Co., 172 Cal. 730, 731, 158 Pac. 183. In Wales v. Pacific Electric M. Co., 130 Cal. 523, 62 Pac. 933, the court, holding that damages may not be awarded for the mere loss of society not involving some element of actual pecuniary loss, employed this language:

"We have been cited to no case where the law says 'damages may be awarded for the loss of society.' As we read and understand the law, it says directly to the contrary. It is essentially and alone pecuniary loss to the parent which he may recover in damages for the death of his child."

What is meant by the "pecuniary" value of the society, comfort, and protection which may be lost through the untimely death of a spouse, parent, or child is fairly indicated by what was said in the Beeson Case, where the court employed this language:

"The loss of a kind husband may be a considerable pecuniary loss to a wife; she loses his advice and assistance in many matters of domestic economy." 57 Cal. 38. (Italics ours.)

See, also, Parsons v. Easton, supra, 184 Cal. 774, 195 Pac. 419.

[13] Without doubt, the evidence in this case, if tested by the foregoing rules, shows that there was no abuse of discretion in granting a new trial on the ground of excessive damages. There is no evidence that the father had any reasonable expectation of direct financial benefit from a continuance of his daughter's life. In the first place, there is no evidence that the daughter possessed any property or that there was any reasonable probability that she ever would acquire any property. Nor is there any evidence from which it might be inferred that the father would probably have outlived his daughter, if she had not been killed in the accident. On the contrary, the probability is that the daughter, who was strong and healthy and 34 years younger than her father, would have outlived him, but for the fatal accident. There is no evidence, therefore, to justify a reasonable expectation that, if the life of the deceased had continued, any pecuniary advantage would have accrued to the father, or, for that matter, to any of these plaintiffs, as an heir or possible legatee or devisee of the deceased. In the second place, there is no evidence to warrant a reasonable expectation that, if the life of the deceased had continued, she would have bestowed upon her father, or upon any of these plaintiffs, at any time during the remainder of her life, any direct financial assistance in the way of gifts of money or property. She was not earning any money, and there is nothing to show that there was any probability that she ever would be a wage-earner or the recipient of an income. Nor is there any evidence that she ever was accustomed to giving money or making presents to any of her family.

The only other possible source of direct financial benefit that the father might reasonably have expected from a continuance of his daughter's life lies in the fact that she kept house for him. But the evidence upon this phase of the case is so extremely fragmentary that it affords no substantial basis for the proper estimate of the pecuniary value of the daughter's services as a housekeeper. There is no showing as to the size of the house of which she took care. So far as the evidence discloses, the house may have contained few or many rooms. There is nothing to show how much of her time the daughter gave to her household duties. It does not appear whether she cooked all or any of her father's meals. No showing was made respecting the contemplated duration of the arrangement. The deceased, as a married woman, was in duty bound to follow her husband to any reasonable fit abode which he might select. Mayhap the arrangement to which the father testified was but temporary. For aught that appears to the contrary, the deceased and her husband may have contemplated a change of residence. In these matters the jury may not be permitted to roam the field of fancy, and draw upon their imagination for facts not disclosed by the evidence. The several elements of damage, where they exist, must be based on facts furnished by the evidence, and not upon surmise and conjecture. Moreover, the food and lodging which the father furnished his daughter during all of the time that she was in his house, together with the food and lodging which was furnished the husband during a part of that time, had some financial value. For aught that appears to the contrary, what the daughter received from the father in the way of food and other accommodations may have equaled or exceeded in value all that she rendered in return in the way of housekeeping. It is quite possible that it might have been more profitable for the father, viewing the situation from a purely financial standpoint, to have hired an experienced professional housekeeper. These considerations will suffice to disclose how far short the evidence falls of showing that the father's expectation of a benefit from his daughter's services was worth anything like $8,000.

Unless, therefore, the daughter's society had a very considerable pecuniary value for the father, the award of $8,000 was grossly excessive. It is true that in estimating the damage which a surviving spouse, parent, or child may have sustained by being deprived of the society, comfort, and protection of the deceased, some latitude must be allowed to the discretion of the jury; for it is not possible to measure in exact terms of money the damage resulting from a loss of that character. But it must never be forgotten that, in fixing the amount, the jury is always bound by the fundamental rule that the pecuniary value of the society, comfort, and protection is the limit of recovery for a loss of that character, and the amount allowed therefor must have some reasonable relation to the pecuniary value shown by the evidence. In this case the father doubtless dearly loved his daughter; but—> "It is pecuniary loss only, and not the loss of an object of love and affection, that the law recognizes as ground for allowing damages to the heirs of one whose death has been caused by the negligence of a third person." Parsons v. Easton, supra.

The evidence before us does not disclose any circumstance indicating that the society and comfort of this married daughter was of any pecuniary advantage to the father, or that there was any reasonable probability that it would be pecuniarily valuable in the future. There is nothing to show that by reason of superior business ability, or because of life's experiences, this young woman had become qualified to give her father valuable business advice or assistance. In short, there is nothing to show that the daughter's society had for the father any particular financial value. Eliminating, as we must, any consideration of the grief and mental suffering occasioned to the father by his daughter's death, it is impossible to conceive how the loss of the society and comfort of the deceased could have had for the father any appreciable money value.

The evidence is likewise lacking in definite substance with respect to the sum which the jury assessed in favor of the mother. We are utterly unable to perceive upon what theory it was supposed that the mother suffered a loss of $1,000. There is no evidence that her daughter ever gave her any sums of money. There is nothing to show that the mother ever received, or that she had any reasonable expectation of ever receiving, any financial aid or personal services from the daughter subsequently to the latter's marriage. And though the deprivation of society, comfort, and protection is an element of loss, it is, as stated, an element of damage only when it has a pecuniary value. Here the mother and father had lived apart for 15 years, and the daughter, at the date of her death, was living in the father's house. Upon what theory, then, can it be said that in the daughter's death the mother suffered a deprivation of society, comfort, and protection having for her a pecuniary, as distinguished from a sentimental, value? We can perceive none whatever.

[14] It is not necessary to determine the reasonableness of the amount which the answers to the special interrogatories show was intended to be awarded to the husband —$1,000. Since a verdict against the defendant in this class of cases must be for a single lump sum, the heirs having but a single joint cause of action (Robinson v. Western States Gas. Co., supra), the verdict should be set aside, and a new trial granted, whenever it can be seen from answers to special interrogatories that the jury has made an excessive award of damages in their assessment of the loss sustained by any one or more of the statutory beneficiaries.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: WORKS, J.; CRAIG, J.

CHARLES NELSON CO. v. PACIFIC WHARF & STORAGE CO. et al.

1. Negligence ⟸134(2)—Direct evidence not required.

Direct and positive evidence of negligence is not required, but circumstances from which it reasonably may be inferred will suffice.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—When evidence conflicting, question of negligence as proximate cause held for trial court.

When the evidence of negligence as a fact is conflicting, or where it consists of circumstances from which inferences may be drawn for or against the alleged negligence, it is the province of the trial court to determine whether the evidence establishes negligence as the direct and proximate cause of the loss.

3. Warehousemen ⟸34(7)—Evidence held to establish negligence of wharfinger as proximate cause of fire.

Evidence that engineer of wharfinger operated mechanism of an oil-burning engine in such manner that oil in fuel tank overflowed and ignited, setting fire to wharf and burning plaintiff's lumber, deposited thereon, was sufficient to warrant finding that negligence of wharfinger was proximate cause of fire.

4. Warehousemen ⟸34(7)—Evidence held to establish assumption of liability by wharfinger for loss of lumber deposited, except as attributable to striking longshoremen.

In an action by a lumber company against a wharfinger for the destruction by fire of lumber rough piled on its wharves, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that defendant assumed liability for loss, except that which might be directly attributable to striking longshoremen.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by the Charles Nelson Company against the Pacific Wharf & Storage Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. N. Goodwin and Goodwin & Morgrage, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Turner & Grainger, of Los Angeles, and Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the destruction of certain lumber, the property of plaintiff, which had been stored on the wharf of the defendant Pacific Wharf & Storage Company, a corporation, and was destroyed by fire, caused, it is alleged, by the negligence of the Pacific Wharf & Storage Company, hereafter referred to simply as the "defendant" or as the "appellant." With the exception of the defendant E. A. Mills, the defendants and appellants other than the Pacific Wharf & Storage Company are the holders of stock in that corporation, and as such are sued upon their stockholder's statutory liability. Mills is not a stockholder, judgment was rendered in his favor, and he is not a party aggrieved. As it is admitted that the defendant stockholders are properly chargeable with their respective proportions of plaintiff's claim for damages, if the defendant corporation is liable, we shall treat the case as though the Pacific Wharf & Storage Company were the sole defendant and appellant.

Defendant, a wharfinger, owns a wharf at East San Pedro—Port Los Angeles. On August 11, 1916, certain lumber, the property of plaintiff, shipped from Oregon, was unloaded from the steamer Daisy Gadsby at East San Pedro and delivered to defendant at the latter's wharf. The lumber had been consigned by plaintiff to a consignee at Miami, Ariz., and was to be forwarded by rail to that consignee by defendant. Through its inability to get the necessary cars, defendant permitted the lumber to remain rough piled on its wharf until it was consumed by fire on August 18, 1916. On the day of the fire defendant, through its employee, an experienced engineer, was operating a traveling crane, which was used by it to handle the lumber and other material piled on its wharf. The crane and the engine which operated it rested upon and were fastened to an ordinary railroad flat car of standard gauge, thus permitting the crane to be run to any spot on defendant's wharf. The engine was operated by steam generated by petroleum, which was conducted by gravity from a fuel tank through a one-inch pipe to an oil burner under the steam boiler. Between the fuel tank and the boiler, which was an upright or vertical boiler, was a space of about 8 inches. The fuel tank was 24 inches wide, 42 inches deep, and 66 inches long. Its bottom was 36 inches above the floor of the flat car. In the top of the fuel tank was a circular hole 18 inches in diameter, through which the fuel oil was replenished when necessary. Inside the fuel tank, and connected with the boiler, was a steam coil, by means of which the petroleum in the fuel tank could be heated when it was too thick to run readily to the burner. In this steam coil was a cut-off valve, which, when closed, prevented the steam from entering the coil. The only cover for the 18-inch hole in the top of the fuel tank was a loose, flat, circular piece of iron a little larger than the hole. The pipe to the steam coil in the fuel tank passed through this iron covering in such a manner as to act as a hinge on which the cover could be turned from side to side without falling off, thus permitting access to the inside of the tank. Under the boiler of the engine was a fire box 48 inches in diameter, lined with fire brick. Its door, oval-shaped, was 12 inches by 9 inches. The burner in the fire box, at the end of a half-inch pipe which entered the fire box through a small hole in the door, was about 2 feet from the door.

The engineer in charge of the crane—and his is the only testimony upon the subject—testified that just before noon of August 18, 1916, he filled the fuel tank with petroleum from a storage tank on the premises; that he filled the fuel tank to within 6 or 8 inches from its top; that he noticed nothing unusual about the oil; that after filling the fuel tank he ran the crane back upon the wharf and ate his lunch; that he operated the crane for about an hour after lunch without noticing anything unusual; that after operating it for about an hour he discovered a fire on the platform of the flat car, covering a space about a foot square immediately under the fuel tank; that he instantly shut off the steam and the oil that was entering the feed pipe to the fire box, and jumped down onto the wharf; that he then looked up and saw the oil running over the fuel tank; that he saw it coming out of the hole in the top of the fuel tank and running down over the side of that tank to the platform of the crane. The engineer further testified that he could not recall having turned any steam that day into the steam coil in the fuel tank.

Plaintiff alleged, and the court found, that defendant negligently failed to provide and use upon the fuel oil tank suitable, proper, and necessary safety devices; that it negligently and carelessly operated the crane and fuel tank without such safety devices; that it operated the crane and used the fuel tank so negligently and carelessly that the fuel oil flooded out of the 18-inch manhole in the top of the tank and ran down the side thereof onto the floor of the crane near the fire box, where it was ignited, and the flames ran therefrom upon the wharf, which thereby caught fire; and that the fire of the burning wharf, spreading to plaintiff's lumber, burned it, and the destruction of the lumber was the direct result of defendant's negligence.

About the 1st of June, 1916, the stevedores —that is, the men, other than the sailors, who were employed by and worked upon the vessels, unloading the lumber therefrom, but who had nothing to do with the lumber after it was unloaded and placed upon the wharf—went on a strike. There began, at the same time, a strike of the longshoremen; that is, the men who worked upon the dock or wharf as lumber handlers, and attended to the handling and moving of the lumber after it was unloaded from the vessels, and who only worked upon the wharf and not upon the vessels. The longshoremen who handled material for the defendant were its employees. This strike of the longshoremen was called off August 1, 1916, and the men voluntarily returned to work on August 3, 1916. The strike of the stevedores continued for a long time thereafter—until long after the burning of plaintiff's lumber. By reason of the situation created by the strike of these two classes of laborers, defendant, at the beginning of the strike in the early part of June, had a verbal agreement or understanding with each of its customers, including the plaintiff here, whereby it sought to limit its liability as a wharfinger. The exact nature of the verbal agreement between defendant and this plaintiff is sharply disputed; defendant claiming for it a much broader scope than is conceded by the plaintiff or found by the trial court.

As an affirmative defense, defendant set up in an amendment to its answer that the lumber in question was discharged from the vessel and piled on the wharf under an express agreement between it and plaintiff that it was to be so discharged and piled "at the sole risk of plaintiff from loss of said lumber or damage thereto arising from fire or theft resulting from any cause whatsoever, so long as said lumber or any part thereof remained on said wharf." The trial court found that plaintiff did not contract to assume all loss of or damage to the lumber arising from fire resulting from any cause whatever. More specifically, the findings are that defendant's business as a wharfinger was interfered with by the strike of the longshoremen; that about the 1st of June, and while plaintiff was discharging certain lumber from the steamer Mukelteo, defendant informed plaintiff that it was having a strike, and that, owing to its inability to move lumber on account of the longshoremen's strike, it would expect plaintiff to assume any loss by fire or damage to material put on the wharf by plaintiff during that strike; that plaintiff understood, from the conversation had between its agent and defendant's agent, that defendant was seeking to have plaintiff "assume all such loss or damage as might be caused by the strikers and for only such material as plaintiff might put on said wharf during said last-mentioned strike [the strike of the longshoremen]; and that the fire in question was not caused by any striker or strikers, but solely by the negligence of said defendant." The court further found that plaintiff never contracted or intended to contract to relieve defendant from its own negligence, but had in mind only the danger of loss or injury to lumber which might be caused by the strikers.

Appellant disputes its liability for the destruction of respondent's lumber, claiming that the evidence is insufficient to sustain either the finding that the fire was caused by its negligence, or the finding that respondent did not contract to assume all loss of or damage to the lumber arising from fire resulting from any cause whatsoever during the time that the lumber was on the wharf.

[1, 2] If there is any evidence to warrant the finding of negligence we cannot review it on appeal. Direct and positive evidence of negligence as a fact is not required. Any circumstances which tend to prove it or from which it reasonably may be inferred will suffice. When the evidence of negligence as a fact is conflicting, or when, as here, the evidence consists of circumstances from which inferences may be drawn for or against the alleged negligence, it is the province of the trial court to determine whether the evidence establishes negligence as the direct and proximate cause of the loss. If these principles be applied to the record before us, it will clearly appear that we cannot disturb the trial court's finding of negligence.

One witness, an inspector of oil for the city of Los Angeles and an expert upon the subject of petroleum oils, testified that in his opinion the fact that the petroleum ran out of the 18-inch manhole in the top of the fuel tank was directly attributable to one of three causes. One of the three possible causes given by this expert is that the oil had water in it, and that, being "wet," it was subjected to heat, thus causing it to foam and overflow. The second of these three possible causes is that the oil, though "dry," was heated to such a degree that it expanded and overflowed the space between it and the top of the tank. The third reason assigned by the witness as a possible cause of the fire was that, when the fuel tank was replenished from the storage tank, oil was permitted to run down the sides of the fuel tank.

[3] Of these three causes, the first seems the most probable. The second seems improbable. The engineer, according to his testimony, filled the fuel tank to a level that brought it within not less than 6 inches from the top. If the oil was "dry," and not nearer the top than 6 inches, as the engineer testified, it is not probable that it would expand by the mere application of heat, so as to fill the 6-inch space between the level of the petroleum and the top of the fuel tank. The expert so testified, in effect. Nor is there probability in the third reason assigned by the expert as one of the possible causes of the fire. The engineer was positive that he had not filled the fuel tank; and if any oil had dripped onto that tank from the filling pipe which extended from the storage tank, and been permitted to run down the side of the fuel tank, it probably would not have been ignited by the fire in the fire box, for it would not have been hot enough to generate the necessary combustible gases. Moreover, if that had been the cause of the fire, it probably would have manifested itself long before the expiration of the hour and more which ensued between the time when the engineer replenished the oil in the fuel tank from the storage tank and the time when the fire was discovered on the floor of the flat car. On the other hand, if, as sometimes happens, the oil in the fuel tank was "wet" with a small percentage of water, and the steam from the boiler had been allowed to flow for a considerable length of time into the coil pipe in the fuel tank, the oil ultimately would foam and flow over the 18-inch hole in the top of the tank.

The trial court, therefore, in spite of the fact that the engineer did not recollect having turned the steam into the coil pipe, so as to heat the oil in the fuel tank to make it flow more readily, was justified in inferring, as the most probable conclusion, that the oil in the fuel tank was not "dry," but "wet"; that is, that it carried a slight percentage of water, and that the engineer, thoughtlessly, had turned the steam into the steam coil and had forgotten to turn it off, and that thus there happened just what the expert said would happen under such circumstances, namely, a foaming and an overflowing of the oil in the fuel tank, which, running over and down the sides of that tank and being hot enough to throw off inflammable gases, took fire from the flame in the fire box and so caused the disastrous conflagration. It thus was a reasonable inference that the negligent manner in which the mechanism was operated by appellant's engineer occasioned the fire, and that, therefore the destruction of respondent's lumber was caused by appellant's negligence in the manner alleged in the complaint. For these reasons, our conclusion is that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the finding of negligence.

[4] The evidence was likewise sufficient to justify the finding as to the character and scope of the agreement or understanding respecting respondent's assumption of the risk of loss by fire. It will be recalled that appellant's answer alleges that the understanding was that respondent was to assume the risk of loss by fire or theft resulting from any cause whatsoever, so long as the lumber was on the wharf, but that the court found that the real understanding was that respondent was to assume the risk of loss by fire or theft caused by the strikers, and only during the continuance of the longshoremen's strike.

If the record supported appellant's claim that the evidence justifies no other finding than one in accord with the allegations of its answer, a reversal of the judgment would be necessary, under the doctrine enunciated in Northwestern Mutual Fire Ass'n v. Pacific Wharf & Storage Co. (Cal. Sup.) 200 Pac. 934. In that case it was held that the general rule is that a depositary or bailee for hire in the course of his ordinary business cannot relieve himself by contract or notice from responding in damages for loss arising from his own negligence or that of his agents or servants; but in the case of a strike, with its attendant disorganization of discipline and system, the depositary, particularly if it be a corporation compelled to act only through its employees, may refuse to accept goods, except on condition of being released from liability for damages traceable to such disorganized conditions. There the trial court had found, in effect, that the wharf company received the lumber only upon the understanding that it would not be responsible for any loss or damage from any cause whatever until the strike was over. In the instant case the trial court has found that the understanding with respect to appellant's liability was much narrower than that which was found in the Northwestern Mutual Fire Association Case; and if in the instant case the court's finding be supported by the evidence, the judgment must be affirmed. That the evidence does suffice to justify the finding is, we think, clearly shown by the record.

Whatever be the understanding which was arrived at by appellant and respondent, it was the result of a conversation between a Mr. Forgie, representing the respondent, and Mr. Mills, representing the appellant. Forgie testified, in part, as follows:

"This whole conversation was with reference to lumber that we were going to discharge during the strike, and the sum and substance of Mr. Mills' conversation was that they [appellant] would not be responsible for loss by fire or damage on any material discharged from the dock during the period of the strike. * * * Q. Was anything said by Mr. Mills as to who he expected might cause a loss to any lumber piled on the wharf? A. He did. It was naturally what he thought, that it would be strikers he was afraid of. Q. Did he in words impress you with that view? A. In substance, yes; that was what he was afraid of, strikers —of any damage that they might cause. * * * The substance of what Mr. Mills said was that he was afraid of the strikers as regards fire or damage of material. * * * We were discussing the strike, and the thing he referred to was the movement of lumber owing to the strike. There was no question about lumber, or anything that was going to happen, other than just the trouble of the strike. Q. Referring to the agreement that was entered into between you and Mr. Mills respecting any lumber that was placed on this wharf by the plaintiff during the period of the strike, what strike was referred to? Do you refer to the men handling the lumber? A. They are called in this port lumber handlers. In every other port I ever heard of they call them longshoremen. The strike ended early in August—about the 1st of August. * * * My understanding was that there were two strikes; there was the stevedores' strike and the lumber handlers' strike. * * * It is my understanding that any one working on the wharves, the term is a longshoreman, and one working aboard a vessel, other than a sailor, is a stevedore. Q. Who employs the stevedores? A. The ship Q. Who employs the longshoremen? A. The wharf company. * * * The Nelson Company had to assume the responsibility of all lumber that was put on the Pacific Wharf & Storage Company's dock owing to the Pacific Wharf & Storage Company being unable to move material, owing to the strike of the men that were in their employ. * * * Q. In other words, you understood from Mr. Mills that it was his intention, or the intention of Pacific Wharf & Storage Company, that the lumber that you rough piled or placed upon that wharf should from that time on be insured by the Nelson Company? A. No; I took it that we had to carry insurance so long as the strike lasted. Q. What I am getting at is what he said, not what you assume. A. I took that from the conversation I had with him. Q. You know the strike lasted there long after the cargo was discharged from the Daisy Gadsby, don't you? A. No; I don't. The strike was over; the strike of the wharfmen was over. * * * Q. With regard to insurance, did you insure for the Charles Nelson Company the lumber unloaded from the Gadsby on defendant's wharf? A. No, sir. Q. Why not? A. Because on account of the strike of the lumber handlers was over, and the occasion for carrying insurance was past. * * * Q. That is your understanding of it? A. My understanding of it. Q. It wasn't anything Mr. Mills said to you not to insure? A. Other than my understanding at the start of the strike."

We think it clear from the foregoing that there was ample justification for the inference that the parties had in mind the danger of loss or injury caused by the strikers, and then only during the strike of appellant's employees—the longshoremen. There was no sharply defined, definite, and explicit verbal agreement between Mills and Forgie. It was from a rather desultory conversation that each received his impression of what the arrangement amounted to, and, since the burden was upon appellant to prove a mutually understood agreement, it follows that, if there was no meeting of minds—that is, if Forgie did not understand the arrangement as Mills did—there was no agreement, and hence no defense to appellant's negligence. From Forgie's testimony the court was warranted in concluding that his understanding of the arrangement was that appellant was to be relieved from responsibility for such loss only as might be directly attributable to the striking longshoremen.

The judgment is affirmed.

TAYLOR v. BERNHEIM et al. (Civ. 4093.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 1, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 28, 1922.)

1. Replevin ⊜72—Evidence held to establish ownership of automobile.

In an action in claim and delivery, evidence that an automobile was purchased by a son for his father, the total purchase money being furnished by the father, the bill of sale executed to him, and the license ultimately transferred in his name, sufficiently established the father's ownership thereof.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⊜37—Use of automobile with consent of owner does not affect title.

Where an automobile was purchased by a son for his father, the total price being furnished by the father, the bill of sale executed to him, and the license transferred in his name, its use by the son in no way tended to destroy the father's title, under Civ. Code, § 3440.

3. Records ⊜9½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Transfer of automobile to plaintiff prior to action established ownership and right to maintain action.

In an action in claim and delivery for an automobile, the required certificate of transfer issued to and signed by plaintiff prior to the commencement of the action, established plaintiff's ownership thereof under Motor Vehicle Act and his consequent legal right to maintain the action, though the license was not transferred until several weeks after purchase.

4. Replevin ⊜10—Lies against persons constructively in "possession" of property at commencement of action.

An action of claim and delivery will lie only against the persons who have the possession of the property in dispute at the time of its commencement; but the term "possession" is construed to mean either actual or constructive.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Possession.]

5. Replevin ⊜10—One liable, if in control of or able to deliver property sought.

In an action of claim and delivery, if it be shown that the property sought to be recovered is under control of a person, or within his power to deliver it, he is liable, although it may not be in his actual possession.

6. Replevin ⊜10—Attaching creditor, indemnifying sheriff, held liable for wrongful detention of property.

Where, in an action in claim and delivery of an automobile, the owner filed a third party claim, and the sheriff holding it under the writ demanded, and plaintiff as attaching creditor furnished, an indemnifying bond, it was always within the power of plaintiff to release the property by so instructing the sheriff, and thus having the ostensible and actual control of the property, he was consequently liable for any damages for its wrongful detention.

7. Replevin ⊜22—Attaching creditor may be joined with attaching officer as defendant.

The attaching creditor may be joined with the attaching officer as parties defendant in replevin.

8. Evidence ⊜260—Held not admissible on theory of fraudulent conspiracy as to ownership of automobile.

In an action for claim and delivery of an automobile, evidence of statements made as to its alleged ownership by plaintiff's son, not made in the presence of plaintiff, were not admissible on the theory that a fraudulent conspiracy existed between the father and son, because, before declarations of one conspirator may be competent evidence against his confederate, there must be independent proof tending to establish the conspiracy, which cannot be established as to either of the alleged co-conspirators by evidence of declarations of the other.

9. Evidence ⊜243(7)—Statements made by agent, after termination of agency, as to ownership of automobile purchased under it, held inadmissible.

In an action in claim and delivery of an automobile, statements made by a son as to its ownership, not made in the presence of his father, for whom he acted as agent in its purchase, were not admissible under the theory of agency, because made after the termination of the agency.

10. Replevin ⊜76—Reasonable rental value of automobile measure of damages for detention.

In action for claim and delivery for automobile, the court was authorized to fix the damages for detention on the basis of its reasonable rental value for the period for which plaintiff was deprived of its use.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Verne W. Taylor against J. H. Bernheim and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Wm. M. Stafford, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. In this action judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, Verne W. Taylor, for the possession of an automobile, or for the sum of $1,000, the value thereof, in the event possession could not be had, and for the further sum of $400 damages against the defendant J. H. Bernheim for the wrongful detention of said automobile. The defendant Bernheim has appealed.

There are two persons named Taylor involved in this transaction, the plaintiff, Verne W. Taylor, and his son, Verne J. Taylor, and for convenience they will be hereinafter respectively referred to as Taylor, Sr., and Taylor, Jr. On October 21, 1920, the defendant Bernheim commenced suit against Taylor, Jr., to collect an indebtedness of $1,850, and a writ of attachment was issued and placed in the hands of the defendant Thomas F. Finn, as sheriff, for service. The latter levied the writ upon the automobile in question, which at the time was stored in the name of Taylor, Jr., in a public garage on Geary street, in San Francisco. The next day Taylor, Sr., claiming to be the owner of said automobile, presented to and filed with said sheriff a verified third party claim, in the form required by section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The sheriff thereupon, pursuant to said Code section, exacted from Bernheim a bond indemnifying him against the claim of ownership asserted by Taylor, Sr. The possession of said automobile was thereafter retained by the sheriff, by virtue of said attachment, and on November 30, 1920, Taylor, Sr., commenced this action, to recover said machine, or its value, and damages for its detention. The main issue before the trial court was the one of the ownership of said automobile, that is, whether it belonged to Taylor, Sr., or to his son, Taylor, Jr.

According to the evidence, Taylor, Sr., who was a traveling salesman, was in need of an automobile for use in his business. On account of his absence from San Francisco he was unable to purchase one personally, so he told his son that, if the latter found a suitable machine, to buy it. A few days prior to July 20, 1920, Leon Leboire, the former owner of the car in question, advertised it for sale, and in answer to that advertisement, Taylor, Jr., called upon him for the purpose of examining said car. After some negotiations they came to terms, and Taylor, Jr., so reported to his father. The latter thereupon gave his son $1,400 with which to buy the car, of which $800 was in cash and the balance consisted of a check for $600. That check was produced at the trial. Taylor, Jr., deposited the check in his personal account in the bank, and on July 26, 1920, purchased the car, by delivering to Leboire a certified check, drawn by himself on his personal account for $1,400. At the request of Taylor, Jr., the bill of sale for the car was made out by Leboire to Taylor, Sr. The car was delivered to Taylor, Jr., and remained in his possession, and was used by him, substantially all of the time until it was attached on October 21, 1920. During that period Taylor, Sr., only drove the car on two or three occasions, and then around San Francisco, and at one time drove it on a hunting trip with his son for a period of about 15 days. The automobile license certificate accompanying the car was transferred direct from Leboire to Taylor, Sr., but the transfer was not completed until October 8, 1920.

[1, 2] Upon substantially the foregoing evidence the trial court found that Taylor, Sr., was the owner of said automobile. There are, of course, other circumstances shown by the record, which appellant urged before the trial court, in support of his theory that Taylor, Jr., was the owner of the car in question. But, at best, those circumstances merely raise a conflict, and we therefore deem it unnecessary to relate them here. Appellant now attacks the finding of ownership upon the ground that it is not supported by the evidence. It is obvious, however, we think, that, inasmuch as the trial court placed faith in the credibility of the Taylors, as witnesses, and believed their testimony, their evidence is sufficient in law to support the court's finding. It shows that, while Taylor, Sr., did not personally make the purchase, nevertheless the car was purchased at his request and with his money, and he became the owner thereof. The use of the car by Taylor, Jr., as shown by the evidence, with the consent of his father, tended in no way to destroy the title of Taylor, Sr. If Taylor, Jr., had acquired ownership of the car in the first place, and thereafter transferred the title to his father, then the use of the car thereafter by Taylor, Jr., in the manner and to the extent shown by the evidence, would present a different situation, and would have been sufficient to invoke the provisions of section 3440 of the Civil Code concerning fraudulent transfers. But that is not this case. Here the title to the car never did vest in Taylor, Jr., and, as above stated, title could not vest in him merely by allowing him to drive the car with the permission of the rightful owner.

[3] On this question of plaintiff's ownership, and his consequent legal right to maintain the action, appellant has sought the aid of the Motor Vehicle Act of California (St. 1915, p. 397, as amended by St. 1917, p. 382), upon the ground that the automobile license was not legally transferred to Taylor, Sr., for nearly three months after the purchase. In this respect said Motor Vehicle Act provides that, until the transferee of an automobile has received a certificate of registration and has written his name upon the face thereof, delivery of said automobile shall be deemed not to have been made, and title thereto shall be deemed not to have been passed, and said intended transfer shall be deemed incomplete, and not to be valid for any purpose. We are of the opinion that this point is not available to appellant for the reason that, while said license was not transferred for several weeks after the purchase, the required certificate of transfer was issued to and signed by plaintiff on October 8, 1920, almost two months prior to the commencement of this action. Plaintiff's title was therefore complete, so far as the Motor Vehicle Law was concerned, at the time of the commencement of this action. In the case of Boles v. Stiles, 35 Cal. App. 721, [1] relied upon by appellant, the required certificate was neither issued by the motor vehicle department nor signed by the new owner at the time of the commencement of the action. The case is therefore not in point.

[4, 5] Appellant further contends that there is no evidence to sustain the judgment against Bernheim for the recovery of the car or for damages, for the reason that it was the sheriff, and not Bernheim, who seized the car and detained it from the possession of plaintiff. We are of the opinion that the point is without merit. It may be conceded that it is the general rule that an action of claim and delivery will lie only against the persons who have the possession of the property in dispute at the time of its commencement. Richards v. Morey, 133 Cal. 437; [2] Home Payment Jewelry Co. v. Smith, 24 Cal. App. 488, 141 Pac. 933. But the term "possession," as used in this class of cases, has been construed to mean either actual or constructive. 34 Cyc. 1396–1400; Eastern Outfitting Co. v. Myers, 39 Cal. App. 316, 180 Pac. 669. And if it be shown that the property sought to be recovered is under the control of a person, or if it be shown that it is within the power of such person to deliver the property, such person is liable, although the property be not in his actual physical possession. This latter rule is recognized in Richards v. Morey, supra, cited, and is relied upon by appellant. It is there said:

"But the finding shows that the property sought to be recovered was not in the possession of the defendant when the action was commenced, nor within his power to deliver, and therefore said finding would not have sustained a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the delivery. * * *" (Italics are ours.)

[6] In the instant case the evidence shows that the sheriff was acting merely as the agent of appellant, and had no interest in the matter other than as an officer, and that he was holding the property subject to the direction of appellant. Under the provisions of said section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, he was not bound to hold the property in the face of the third party claim, unless Bernheim, as the attaching creditor, furnished an indemnifying bond, which he did. Thereafter it was always within the power of appellant to cause the release of the property, if he cared to do so, by giving the sheriff instructions to that effect. It must therefore be held that appellant was in the ostensible and actual control of the property, and consequently is liable for any damages resulting from its unlawful detention.

[7] That the attaching creditor may be joined as a defendant with the attaching officer, in replevin, is not without precedent, for in the earlier decisions of the New York courts such was held to be the law. In Knapp v. Smith et al., 27 N. Y. 277, it was said:

"A point is made that the defendant Smith, who directed Moore, the constable, to make the levy, is not responsible in this form of action, because, as it is argued, he never had the property in his possession. That precise question was decided against the defendant's position in Allen v. Crary, 10 Wend. 349. The defendant in that case had done nothing but to direct the sheriff to levy upon the property replevied, under an execution against a person who was not the owner, and a levy was accordingly made. The court held, that this was a sufficient taking to enable the owner to bring replevin. * * * We therefore follow the case of Allen v. Crary, and hold that the action was properly brought against both defendants."

Under the rules above stated, we are of the opinion that the evidence fully justified the rendition of the judgment against the appellant.

[8] Appellant complains of the ruling of the trial court striking out, as hearsay, on motion of plaintiff, certain declarations claimed to have been made by Taylor, Jr., to one Samuels out of the presence of plaintiff, concerning the trading of an automobile belonging to Taylor, Jr., for the car in question. We are satisfied that the ruling of the trial court was correct. The declarations were not admissible under the theory that a fraudulent conspiracy existed between the two Taylors, as contended by appellant, for the reason that, before declarations of one conspirator may be competent evidence against his confederate, there must be independent proof tending to establish the conspiracy, and such conspiracy itself cannot be proved as to either of the alleged co-conspirators by the evidence of the declarations of the other. Barkly v. Copeland, 86 Cal. 483, 25 Pac. 1, 405. There was no such independent proof here,

[9] Neither were the declarations admissible under the theory of agency, for the reason that the agency of Taylor, Jr., ended with the consummation of the purchase of the car, and these declarations were claimed to have been made some time thereafter. Declarations of an agent, with respect to a transaction, made after the completion of the transaction, are not provable against the principal. Such statements are merely hearsay, and, like those of any other person, cannot affect the principal. 1 Rul. Case Law, p. 510. In this respect it is said:

"A rule that would allow an agent, after a transaction is closed, to admit away the rights of his principal, would be too dangerous to be tolerated."

It cannot be successfully contended that the declarations were offered as contradictory statements, or for the purpose of impeachment, because the record plainly shows otherwise. The declarations were offered as affirmative proof; the witness who testified to them being called out of order, prior to the time that Taylor, Jr., became a witness in the case.

[10] The final contention of appellant is that there is no legal evidence in the record upon which the award of damages may be based. We are unable to sustain this contention. The measure of plaintiff's damages was the reasonable rental value of the car for the period during which plaintiff was deprived of its use. Tucker v. Hagerty, 37 Cal. App. 789, 174 Pac. 908. The testimony of Taylor, Sr., shows that, owing to the fact that he was deprived of the use of his own automobile, he was required to hire another one for over three months, for which he was obliged to pay a rental of $60 per week. From the description given in the testimony of the car in question, the court may well have inferred that the rental value of such a car would not be less than the one rented. Therefore the amount of damages awarded plaintiff was well within the limit of the rule. True, plaintiff was allowed to testify over appellant's objection as to the amount of financial loss suffered by him in his business by reason of being deprived of said automobile; but there is not the slightest indication in the record that the court used the amount of such losses, or any part thereof, as the basis for fixing the award of damages. It follows that the admission of such evidence, if error, was harmless.

We are of the opinion that no error has been shown, and therefore the judgment is affirmed

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

IMPERIAL VALLEY LONG STAPLE COTTON GROWERS' ASS'N v. DAVIDSON.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 18, 1922.)

1. Factors ⟸45—Entitled to reimbursement for necessary expenses and interest on advancements.

A factor is entitled to reimbursement for necessary expenses in protecting or preserving the property, as for storage, handling, freight, and insurance, and for interest on advancements.

2. Factors ⟸19—As against charge of conversion by pledging, must show it was not for more than owing by principal.

Even if a factor has any authority, as between him and the principal, to pledge principal's property, which he did not have at common law, and which Civ. Code, § 2368, subd. 2, denies, he, having pledged it, must, to relieve himself of the charge of conversion, affirmatively show that it was not for more than the principal owed him.

3. Customs and usages ⟸19(1)—Burden on factor to prove custom or usage, justifying confusion of principal's property with that of others.

If a factor, mixing or confusing his principal's property with that of others, which as a general rule he has no authority to do, depends on custom or usage to justify it, as against charge of conversion, he must prove the custom or usage as any other fact.

4. Factors ⟸38—Delegation of authority to independent broker conversion.

Delegation by a factor of his authority to an independent broker, in contravention of Civ. Code, § 2368, subd. 3, unless authorized by the principal, constitutes a conversion.

5. Trover and conversion ⟸32(4)—Allegation of conversion held sufficient.

The affirmative allegation that plaintiff converted defendant's cotton sufficiently presents the issue of conversion, in the absence of special demurrer.

6. Trial ⟸396(3)—Pleading of conversion and substantial evidence require finding.

The answer presenting the issue of conversion generally necessitates a finding on any facts concerning which substantial evidence was introduced, which, if believed, would support the allegation of conversion.

7. Factors ⟸45—Entitled to reimbursement for money properly advanced or expended before conversion.

Though a factor be guilty of conversion by pledging or confusion of principal's property, or by delegation of authority, he is entitled to reimbursement for money properly advanced or expended before the conversion.

Action by the Imperial Valley Long Staple Cotton Growers' Association against F. J. Davidson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

James L. Allen, of Santa Ana, and Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for appellant.

J. S. Larew, of El Centro, and Dan V. Noland, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The defendant, Davidson, delivered to the plaintiff, as a factor, 145 bales of cotton. As a part of the transaction the plaintiff advanced the sum of $18,406 to defendant. The trial court found that, after receiving the cotton, "the plaintiff, Imperial Valley Long Staple Cotton Growers' Association, commingled and mixed the said 145 bales of cotton belonging to the defendant with other cotton, not being the property of the defendant, F. J. Davidson, but being the property of other persons," and that "prior to the shipment of said cotton by plaintiff, for and on behalf of the said defendant, the said plaintiff hypothecated, mortgaged, and pledged the same, to various and divers persons, for various and divers sums and amounts." Thereafter the plaintiff shipped the cotton, confused with that of other persons, to other independent factors in Galveston, Tex., and New Orleans, La., who sold it for a total sum of $18,634.31. It appears that the plaintiff also paid out for freight, storage, insurance, and handling the cotton an amount found by the court to have been $9,078.94, which finding was probably intended to be for $978.94. Interest on the advances accrued in the sum of $381.19. October 10, 1918, plaintiff demanded payment from Davidson of $1,654.82, which was refused. This action was then instituted. The complaint states a cause of action for money advanced by plaintiff as a factor. The court rendered judgment for the plaintiff for $1,654.82, together with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from October 10, 1918.

[1, 2] A factor has authority to insure (subdivision 1, § 2368, Civ. Code), and he may collect for necessary expenses incurred in protecting or preserving the property as for storage, handling, freight, etc. (25 C. J. 382, 389), and for interest on advancements made over cash received (Heins v. Peine, 29 N. Y. Super. Ct. 420; Howard v. Behn and Foster, 27 Ga. 174). But the answer alleges that the plaintiff converted the merchandise consigned to it. The common-law rule was well settled that the factor has no authority to pledge his principal's goods (Wright v. Solomon, 19 Cal. 64, 79 Am. Dec. 196; Wisp v. Hazard, 66 Cal. 459, 6 Pac. 91); and this was so, even though the factor has a lien for advances (25 C. J. 351; Benny v. Rhodes, 18 Mo. 147, 59 Am. Dec. 293). In Akron Cereal Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 3 Cal. App. 201, 84 Pac. 780, it is said:

"A factor or a mere agent who is in possession of property with power to sell the same has authority to transfer it by way of pledge. Civ. Code, § 2368 (2)."

This language was used in discussing and construing section 2991 of the Civil Code. The case being considered was one in which the contest was between the pledgee and the factor's principal. Section 2368 of the Civil Code was not involved, except as its provisions might supply an element required in order that the defendant might take advantage of section 2991 of the Civil Code. The court held that, in order that the pledgee might claim the benefit of section 2991 of the Civil Code, among other things, it must be shown that the factor's principal had allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of the property in question for the purpose of making any tranfer of it, and that, under section 2368 of the Civil Code, the factor to whom the owner had consigned the goods received such power to sell or transfer them. As between the principal and the factor, the question whether the latter might pledge the goods received by him was not presented, nor was its determination necessary to a decision of the case. The language of section 2368, Civil Code, is not only unambiguous, but is clearly prohibitive against the factor pledging his principal's property. Subdivision 2 of the last-named section, which defines the authority of a factor, reads:

"To sell, on credit, anything intrusted to him for sale, except such things as it is contrary to usage to sell on credit; but not to pledge, mortgage, or barter the same."

Of course, section 2991 has no application in the instant case. It was designed to protect persons who deal with the factor concerning property in his possession. Wisp v. Hazard, supra.

The opinion in Wright v. Solomon makes no reference to the authority of a factor to pledge goods of his principal because of having made advancements. In that case the factor, Darling, had pledged the property for his own debt and without having made any advancements. Darling was not a "technical factor," being engaged in other business as well as that of a factor. The court, after an extended consideration of the matter, overruled certain earlier cases, which limited the application of the rule, that a factor could not pledge, to technical factors, and held that the same principle applies to all factors. It further determined that the authority to pledge might be inferred from acts, and that under certain conditions it must be so inferred; but a careful examination of the case shows that it contains no language even remotely suggesting that a factor might pledge the goods of a principal under any circumstances. This case also holds that the pledge of property is a special transaction not in the usual course of business, and therefore outside of the protection extended to ordinary transactions of commerce. It is true that in some jurisdictions the factor is allowed this right to the extent of his advancements, but, before exercising it, he must demand from his principal the amount of his charges. Merchants' Nat. Bank of Memphis v. Trenholm, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 20. Where, as in the instant case, the factor pledges the goods of his principal, in order to relieve himself from the charge of conversion, he certainly must show affirmatively that the pledge was not for more than the amount that the principal owes. Here there is no finding or proof as to the amount for which the cotton was pledged.

[3] It appears, also, that plaintiff mixed or confused defendant's cotton with that of others and pledged it in a mass along with such other cotton. The general rule is that a factor has no right to do this. 25 C. J. 364. If custom and usage justify such a course, it would be necessary to introduce evidence to prove that fact as any other. This was not done in the instant case.

[4-6] Counsel for appellant contends that the court erred in not finding that the plaintiff delegated its agency as a factor to other brokers. It is claimed that such was the fact, and that such action constituted a conversion. Subdivision 3, § 2368, Civil Code, expressly prohibits the delegations of the factor's authority "to any person in an independent employment." This was the general rule at common law. 25 C. J. 348. However, plaintiff insists that the pleadings as they are framed do not present an issue on this point, and that therefore no finding concerning the delegation of authority was necessary. The answer alleges affirmatively that the plaintiff converted the cotton. Such an allegation sufficiently presents the issue in the absence of special demurrer. Lowe v. Ozmun, 137 Cal. 257, 70 Pac. 87. Hence a finding was necessitated upon any facts concerning which substantial evidence was introduced, and which, if believed by the trial court, would have supported the allegation of conversion. Evidence was presented that the plaintiff delegated its authority to independent brokers. If such evidence had been accepted as true by the trial court, this would have established a conversion. Subdivision 3, § 2368, Civ. Code; 25 C. J. 348. However, the plaintiff alleged in its complaint that the defendant authorized it to sell the cotton as it did. If true, this would relieve it of the charge of conversion; but the court made no finding upon this matter.

[7] We conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff converted the property of the defendant. This being so, the defendant was within his right in setting up that fact as a defense which he did in his answer. The findings do not indicate just what part of the amount for which judgment was rendered was advanced before, and what part after, the conversion took place. The association would be entitled to be reimbursed for money properly advanced or expended prior to the conversion.

WHITWORTH v. JONES. (Civ. 3790.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1012(2)—No right in appellate court to resolve questions as to preponderance of evidence.

Where, in an action for injury to an automobile at a crossing, there was some evidence of negligence of defendant under Vehicle Act, § 20, as amended by St. 1919, p. 215, § 12, providing that at street intersections an automobile approaching from the right should have the right of way, unless the vehicle approaching from the right is further from the point of intersection than the other, any question as to the weight of evidence will not be reviewed.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐705(10) — Records ⇐9½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series —Party, in whose name automobile registered, not deprived of right to maintain action for injury, though purchased with funds of another.

Notwithstanding Vehicle Act, § 8, as amended by St. 1917, p. 391, § 7, providing that, until the transferee of an automobile has received the certificate of registration and indorsed it with his name, delivery shall be deemed not to have been made and the intended transfer incomplete, where a son purchased an automobile with his mother's funds, but registered it in his name, and later it was agreed to be the son's property, the son was not deprived of a right of action for its injury because the technical procedure of the statute had not been complied with.

3. Bailment ⇐21—Bailee may sue for injuries to property by third persons.

Bailees may sue for damages for injuries to property by third persons.

4. Evidence ⇐83(1) — Presumed that father indorsed son's application for automobile operator's license.

Vehicle Act preserves as against a parent liability for negligence of a minor child while operating the parent's automobile, and section 24, as amended by St. 1917, p. 408, § 18, provides that an operator's license shall not be granted to a minor unless his parent shall join in signing the application, and the negligence of the minor shall then be imputed to the person so signing; and where, in an action for injury from an automobile driven by defendant's minor son, the evidence showed that defendant owned the automobile and his son lived with him, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 15, 33, declaring the presumption that official duty had been regularly performed, the trial judge was warranted in assuming that defendant indorsed his son's application.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by John C. Whitworth against Mack B. Jones. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

David R. Faries and J. R. Berryman, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank C. Dunham, of Pasadena, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The judgment in this case was for damages which the court found plaintiff had suffered by reason of a collision which occurred between an automobile driven by a son of the defendant and one belonging to the plaintiff. The defendant, on this appeal, urges several grounds for a reversal of the judgment. There was a plea of contributory negligence in the answer, and a cross-complaint asserting an alleged cause of action for damages in favor of defendant, growing out of the same collision.

[1] Considering first the claim that the evidence failed to establish any negligence on the part of the driver of defendant's machine. Los Robles avenue, in the city of Pasadena, extends in a northerly and southerly direction. Walnut street intersects it at right angles. Walnut street is 30 feet in width; Los Robles avenue is 50 feet wide. At about 7 o'clock in the evening, in November, 1919, a sister of the plaintiff was driving a large coupé westerly along Walnut street. She was accompanied by three other ladies. The three latter were witnesses at the trial; but, as none of them were paying heed to conditions upon the street at the time, their testimony furnishes little aid to a solution of the questions presented. For that reason no further reference will be made to their statements. Plaintiff's sister, who was driving the car, was an adult, and had operated automobiles for a number of years. She testified that, as she reached the intersection of Walnut and Los Robles streets, she looked up and down Los Robles, and saw at the north only a single light located at a point which was afterwards determined to be over 600 feet away; that, having slowed her machine down to a speed of between 10 and 12 miles per hour, she proceeded to cross Los Robles; and that, when beyond the center line of that street, her car was struck on the right-hand rear side by an automobile advancing from the north, which turned out to be one belonging to the defendant and then being driven by the 18 year old son of the latter. The witness further testified that it was nighttime, or "twilight," and an hour when it was necessary to have lighted the lamps on the car. She testified that, while Los Robles avenue was supplied with lights mounted on columns along its sides, she did not notice whether those lights were burning at the time; that she did not observe defendant's automobile, or know of its presence there, until it collided with the machine she was driving.

Chiefly involved in the decision of the trial judge is the question as to which machine had the right of way at the street intersection. Originally the Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 407) provided that at street intersections the automobile approaching from the right should have the right of way. In the Statutes of 1919 (page 215, § 12 [section 20, par. "f"]) the law was amended by adding the proviso:

"Unless such vehicle approaching from the right is further from the point of the intersection of their paths than such first named vehicle."

By the testimony of the defendant's son, it appears that he assumed that he had the right of way and would be permitted to cross Los Robles avenue in advance of plaintiff's machine. He testified that, as he came south on Los Robles avenue, he observed plaintiff's machine, even before it had reached the easterly curb of Los Robles; that, as the latter machine reached the latter point, he was about 50 feet north of the intersection of the two streets. His testimony at different points in the examination as to this fact varied, but the court was entitled to draw its own conclusions therefrom. Other evidence showed that the right-hand wheels of defendant's car were about 4 feet away from the westerly curb line of Los Robles avenue. When it is remembered that the total width of Los Robles avenue from curb to curb was 50 feet, it appears that there was some evidence from which the trial court was justified in concluding that, as between the two machines, that of the plaintiff as it entered Los Robles was nearer the point where the paths of the two would intersect than was that of the defendant. Under the provisions of the Vehicle Act such a condition gave to the plaintiff's machine the right to pass first. There is enough, also, in the evidence to warrant the statement that there was a conflict as to whether the headlights on defendant's machine were burning at the time. It is true that defendant's son testified that they were so burning. Plaintiff's sister had testified that she looked to the north on Los Robles and saw only a single light 600 feet away. Necessarily, considering the fact that the collision followed within two or three seconds of time, defendant's machine was at that time much nearer to Walnut street than was the single light noted. Hence the admissible inference from Miss Whitworth's testimony that, had the headlights been burning on defendant's machine, she would have noticed them. The case presented a close question on the facts, but, as pointed out, there was some substantial evidence tending to establish negligence on the part of the driver of defendant's machine. Once that is determined, this court has not the right to resolve any question as to the preponderance of the evidence or weight of the proof.

[2, 3] Another contention of appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to show that plaintiff owned the automobile which was being driven by his sister. Plaintiff testified that he purchased the automobile in 1919 for his mother, who was then absent, and with her funds; that he caused it to be registered in his own name, and that when his mother returned, a month later, in the course of adjustment of the business affairs of the family, it was agreed that he should have the machine as his own. There was no evidence tending to dispute this state of facts. The objection at this point as made by appellant refers to the automobile law in force at the time of the purchase, which required that, in the event of change of ownership, indorsements be made upon the old registration certificate by the transferor and transferee and a new license be issued. This act (Stats. 1917, p. 391, § 7) provides further that—

"Until such transferee has received such certificate of registration and has written his name upon the face thereof in the blank space provided for said purpose by the department, delivery of said motor vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed, and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose. * * *"

As plaintiff purchased this machine and caused it to be immediately registered in his own name, and as it was agreed by his mother (who owned the funds used in the purchase price), about one month after the purchase, that he should be considered the owner, he ought not be deprived of his right to maintain this action because only that the exact technical procedure prescribed in the automobile law had not been complied with. The original license had been issued in the name of plaintiff, who at once had and continued to have actual control of the vehicle. Defendant's only concern in this regard is to be assured that he may not be subjected to another action for damages. Assuming that, by reason of the restriction of the Vehicle Act, the legal title to the automobile rested in the mother of the plaintiff, plaintiff had acquired the right, by reason of the agreement that title should be transferred to him, to have the mother complete the transaction and make the indorsements of transfer as the law provided should be done. Assuming that the law prevents the passing of title in such circumstances, the mother remained only as the holder of the bare legal title, with no substantial or beneficial interest in the property. There is not concerned here any question as to the rights of creditors of the mother, and, as between the parties mother and son, the mother should be held to be estopped from asserting any right of action for damages as against the defendant. This reasoning applies, regardless of whether it be considered that the original transaction involving the purchase of the machine was properly carried out, so as to vest title in the mother, or that the mother failed to make effectual the transfer of her title in the machine to plaintiff.

There is a second answer to the contention to which the foregoing discussion has been addressed, and that is this: Conceding that the plaintiff did not become the legal owner of the automobile, he did nevertheless, by reason of his having been given possession of the machine and having at all times exercised control over it, acquire the rights of a bailee. Among those rights is that to sue for damages for injuries caused to the property by third persons.

"The bailee is entitled to the possession of the property, * * * therefore has a special right or property in the chattel to the extent of his bailment contract, and can protect it against wrongdoers who occasion loss or injury. * * * In such cases the damages are not confined to the mere interest of the bailee, but in case of injury or loss of the property he may recover its full value, together with any special damage to him, and for all beyond his own interest he would be a trustee for the bailor or owner." Van Zile on Bailments and Carriers (2d Ed.) par. 57.

On the general subject, see, also, 3 R. C. L. pp. 138, 139; also Boles v. Stiles (Cal. Sup.) 204 Pac. 848.

That this right of the bailee to sue for all damages caused by injury to the property in his possession may be restricted by the contract of bailment should be taken as a qualification of the general rule stated. From the facts here shown no such restriction would be implied.

[4] It appeared in evidence that the son of defendant was 18 years of age and that he held a driver's license, authorizing him to operate an automobile on the public ways. It appeared at the time that his father was accustomed to allow the young man to use the automobile for his own purposes, and that, on the evening in question, the son was on his way to some place on a mission which had to do only with his own convenience or pleasure. Under this state of facts, appellant argues that there was no liability on the part of the father to respond in damages for the tort of the son. The case of Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 193 Pac. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083, is cited in support of that argument. That was a case where an adult daughter, operating an automobile for her own convenience, and not for any necessary family purpose, was held to be solely responsible for damages caused through the negligent operation of the machine. The difference between that case and this is that the daughter there was an adult and the Vehicle Act of California expressly preserves as against a parent liability for negligence committed by a minor child while operating an automobile belonging to the former. Section 24 (a) of the act (Statutes of 1917, at page 408, § 18) provides that an operator's license shall not be granted to a minor, unless the parent or parents having the custody of the applicant shall have joined in signing the application, and that the negligence of such minor shall then be imputed to "the person or persons who shall have signed the application of such minor for said license."

Appellant insists that the father cannot be held responsible, because it does not appear that he signed the application for the operator's license which was issued to the son. It is true that the evidence is silent on that question, but certain presumptions may be indulged in in order to sustain the judgment. In the first place, the evidence showed that the father owned the machine, and that the son lived with him. The father was the head of the household, and the son was under his control. Necessarily, then, he would be the proper person to have indorsed the application for the operator's license. There are two pertinent presumptions declared to exist under section 1963, Code of Civil Procedure: (15) "That official duty has been regularly performed;" (33) "that the law has been obeyed." The trial judge was warranted in assuming that the father did indorse the son's application, and that the officers in charge of the motor vehicle department would not have issued the operator's license without such indorsement being supplied.

HANSEN v. NORTHWESTERN PAC. R. CO. et al. (Civ. 4267; S. F. 9837.)

Railroads ⊂⊃443(7)—Evidence held to show negligence as to cows on track.

In an action for the death of cows on a crossing, evidence held to show that the engineer had knowledge of something wrong on the track in time to stop the train and prevent the accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by John Hansen against the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James N. Gillett, of San Francisco, and F. A. Cutler, of Eureka, for appellants.

Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for respondent.

PREWETT, Justice pro tem. It is averred that a train of the appellant company ran over and killed 13 blooded Jersey cows belonging to respondent, for which injury he seeks damages. The jury made an award in his favor, and the appellants bring this appeal.

Respondent maintained a dairy situated about three-eighths of a mile from the railroad track. He knew that the morning passenger train of appellant company was accustomed to pass down the track each morning at about 8:19, and he always waited until it had passed before driving his cows to pasture across the track. After crossing the track at the regular crossing, the cows follow a road along parallel to the track for a distance of about 400 feet before entering the gate to their pasture. This road is separated from the right of way by a wire fence. On the morning in question the respondent heard a train go down the track at about 8:19, and he assumed that this was the regular train. In fact, however, it was a special running on the regular time; the regular passenger train being some 20 minutes late. When the respondent heard the special go by, he started his cows down the lane toward the crossing. He was in the lead of the herd of 115 cows, and his trained dog drove them from the rear. The dog had been at this work for the past six years. After the respondent had crossed the track and had reached a point about 400 feet distant from the crossing (which brought him about opposite the pasture gate), he heard the belated passenger train coming. He sprang over the wire fence and ran along the track, waiving his hat in a futile effort to flag the train. At this time he had reached a point about 500 feet from the crossing. From this point he saw the train rounding a curve and coming into view. It was then distant from him about 450 feet. The engineer was looking along the track, and his engine was then distant from the crossing nearly 1,000 feet. It is not controverted that the train could have been stopped in this distance. The engineer testified that he could not see the cows on the crossing until he reached a point distant therefrom about 432 feet. There is evidence in the record, which the jury may have believed, that the train could have been stopped in this shorter distance.

A number of cows were on the track when the train passed. The train ran over and killed 10 of these outright and severely maimed several others. This 1,000 feet of track describes an arc of a circle. Owing to a slight elevation in the territory within the arc, a person at its farthest extremity could not see objects upon the crossing, though a person about midway between could see both extremities. The engineer admits that he was looking ahead. If this is so, the jury had a right to believe that he could and would have seen the respondent standing on the track and waving his hat. Seeing him, it was his duty at once to stop the train, and it is clear that he had ample space within which to accomplish that result. He knew that his train was behind time, and that a special had just gone down the track on the regular schedule, and that this circumstance was likely to mislead persons near the track. He knew, also, that the respondent had been accustomed for a long period to drive his cows every day across the track to and from pasture.

In the foregoing résumé the only disputed points are the position of the respondent at the time he commenced to wave his hat to the engineer and the position of the latter at that time. The story of the respondent as to these matters sounds reasonable enough, and the jury was justified in believing it. It may be added that the experts did not agree as to the distance within which the train could have been stopped, but none of them insisted that it could not have been stopped in 1,000 feet. This state of facts meets the claim of the appellants that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence. He had been using this crossing for his cows twice a day during the period of 14 years, and this with the knowledge of the engineers of the appellant company. But, even if the respondent had been negligent, the appellants had a space of about 1,000 feet within which to stop after knowledge of something wrong on the track. Under the doctrine of the "last clear chance," the engineer should have brought his train to a stop. No other points are urged.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [1] In denying a rehearing of this cause after decision by the District Court of Appeal we desire to say that we do not approve of the statement in the last paragraph of the opinion that "under the doctrine of the 'last clear chance'" the engineer was required to bring his train to a stop. The last clear chance doctrine, in our opinion, is not involved in the case, and it is not under that doctrine that he should have brought his train to a stop.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

MOORE v. CITY COUNCIL OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 4000.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 18, 1922.)

1. Statutes ⊂=199—"Manner" of doing thing does not ordinarily include time of doing it, and whether it does depends on intent.

Whether the word "manner" in a statute shall be construed as including, not only the way or mode of doing a thing, but also the time of doing it, depends on the intention of the lawmakers, to be gathered from the context, and ordinarily the manner and time of doing the thing are distinct things, and "manner" will not be construed as including the element of time, unless it appears from the context that the lawmakers so intended.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Manner.]

2. Municipal corporations ⊂=46—Constitutional provision requiring advertising of amendments to charter in same "manner" as new charter does not include element of time.

Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that proposed amendments to city charter shall be advertised in the same "manner" as therein provided for the advertisement of a new charter, does not require that the amendment shall be advertised within 15 days after filing, as in the case of a new charter, in view of the further provisions for verifying the signatures to the petition and for submitting proposed amendments only during the six months preceding session of the Legislature, or thereafter and before its adjournment.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂=46—Constitution held to require submission of amendments to charter during six months preceding next session of Legislature, or before adjournment.

Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that proposed charter amendments shall be submitted only during the six months next preceding a regular session of the Legislature, or thereafter and before adjournment, is the equivalent of a mandatory requirement that the amendment shall be submitted during the six months preceding the regular session next succeeding the filing of the petitions, or before adjournment of that session, and, in view of the provision that the election shall not be less than 40 or more than 60 days after the completion of the advertising, sufficiently fixes the time when the amendments are to be advertised.

Original application by A. H. Moore for a writ of mandamus, directed to the City Council of the City of Los Angeles and others.

Alternative writ discharged, and application denied.

Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Jess E. Stephens and Lucius P. Green, both of Los Angeles, and Charles B. MacCoy, of San Diego, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel respondents to advertise, within 15 days from July 5, 1922, a proposed amendment to the charter of the city of Los Angeles. On application made to this court in the first instance an alternative writ of mandate was issued, and thereafter respondents appeared and filed their answer. From the uncontroverted averments of the petition, and the stipulations of the parties, the following facts are made to appear:

On July 5, 1922, a petition, signed by more than 15 per cent. of the registered electors of the city of Los Angeles, requesting the submission of an amendment to the city charter, was filed with the city council, and the signatures thereto were duly certified by the city clerk. On the same day, at a regular meeting of the city council, a motion was made to advertise such proposed amendment within 15 days, but, for lack of the requisite number of votes, the motion failed to carry. Thereafter, on July 13, 1922, at a regular meeting, the city council adopted a resolution whereby it declared it to be its purpose and intention to submit the proposed amendment to the electors of the city not later than the general election to be held next November.

Petitioner claims that by the provisions of section 8 of article 11 of our state Constitution, presently to be quoted, it is the bounden duty of the city council to advertise the proposed amendment not later than 15 days after the filing of the petition by the electors; that is to say, within 15 days after July 5, 1922. Section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution, in so far as it is necessary to an understanding of the question, reads:

"Any city or city and county * * * may frame a charter for its own government, consistent with and subject to this Constitution. * * * Any such charter shall be framed by a board of fifteen freeholders chosen by the electors of such city at any general or special election. * * * The charter so prepared shall be signed by a majority of the board of freeholders and filed in the office of the clerk of the legislative body of said city. The legislative body of said city shall within fifteen days after such filing [italics ours] cause such charter to be published once in the official paper of said city (or in case there be no such paper, in a paper of general circulation), and shall cause copies of such charter to be printed in convenient pamphlet form, and shall, until the date fixed for the election upon such charter, advertise in one or more papers of general circulation published in said city a notice that such copies may be had upon application therefor. Such charter shall be submitted to the electors of such city at a date to be fixed by the board of freeholders, before such filing and designated on such charter, either at a special election held not less than sixty days from the completion of the publication of such charter as above provided, or at the general election next following the expiration of said sixty days. * * * The charter of any city or city and county may be amended by proposals therefor submitted by the legislative body of the city on its own motion or on petition signed by fifteen per cent. of the registered electors, or both. Such proposals shall be submitted to the electors only during the six months next preceding a regular session of the Legislature or thereafter and before the final adjournment of that session and at either a special election called for that purpose or at any general or special election. Petitions for the submission of any amendment shall be filed with the legislative body of the city or city and county not less than sixty days prior to the general election next preceding a regular session of the Legislature. The signatures on such petitions shall be verified by the authority having charge of the registration records of such city or city and county, and the expenses of such verification shall be provided by the legislative body thereof. If such petitions have a sufficient number of signatures the legislative body of the city or city and county shall so submit the amendment or amendments so proposed to the electors. Amendments proposed by the legislative body and amendments proposed by petition of the electors may be submitted at the same election. The amendments so submitted shall be advertised in the same manner as herein provided for the advertisement of a proposed charter [italics ours], and the election thereon held at a date to be fixed by the legislative body of such city, not less than forty and not more than sixty days after the completion of the advertising in the official paper. If a majority of the qualified voters voting on any such amendment vote in favor thereof it shall be deemed ratified, and shall be submitted to the Legislature at the regular session next following such election, and approved or rejected without power of alteration in the same manner as herein provided for the approval or rejection of a charter."

As will be observed, it is provided by the Constitution that the legislative body of any city for which a proposed charter has been prepared by a board of freeholders and filed with the clerk shall, "within fifteen days after such filing," cause the same to be published once in the official paper of the city, or in a paper of general circulation if there be no official paper, and shall likewise cause copies of such charter to be printed in convenient pamphlet form and give notice by advertising in one or more papers of general circulation that such copies may be had upon application; and it will be recalled that it is further provided that all proposed amendments to any such charter shall be advertised "in the same manner as herein provided for the advertisement of a proposed charter." Whether, as petitioner claims, it is the duty of the legislative body of a city having a freeholders' charter to advertise a proposed amendment to the charter within 15 days after the filing of a petition by electors for the submission of such amendment, depends upon the meaning to be given to the word "manner," as that word is used in the provision which declares that all proposed charter amendments shall be advertised "in the same manner as herein provided for the advertisement of a proposed charter." It is urged by petitioner that the phrase "in the same manner" refers, not only to the way or mode whereby the advertising must be done, but also to the time within which it must be done.

Whether the word "manner," or the phrase, "in the same manner," includes the element of time, has been answered by the courts both in the affirmative and in the negative. The Supreme Court of Nevada, in State v. Eureka, etc., M. Co., 8 Nev. 15, held, without discussion, that the word "manner," in the statute under consideration in that case, did not mean time. In United States v. Morris, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815, the word was also construed by the court as not including time. See, also, Bankers' Life Insurance Co. v. Robbins, 59 Neb. 170, 80 N. W. 484. On the other hand, Harris v. Doherty, 119 Mass. 142, and State v. McClure, 91 Wis. 313, 64 N. W. 992, are cases in which the word "manner" was construed as including the element of time.

[1] We think that the question is, in every case, one of intent, and that the true rule may be formulated substantially as follows: Whether the word "manner" shall be construed as including, not only the way or mode of doing a thing, but also the time of doing it, depends upon the intention of the lawmakers, to be gathered from the context; that is, the "manner" of doing a thing and the "time" of doing it are distinct things, and ordinarily the word "manner" will not be construed as including the element of "time," unless it shall appear from the context that the lawmakers intended that it should. Thus, in State v. McClure, supra, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin said:

> "The word 'manner' in a statute may undoubtedly include 'time,' if such seems to have been the intent of the lawmakers."

And in Porter v. Brook, 21 Okl. 885, 97 Pac. 645, a well-considered case, the Oklahoma Supreme Court used this language:

> "We think the language quoted from United States v. Morris, supra, to the effect that the 'manner' of doing a thing and the 'time' of doing it are distinct things, but that 'manner' may embrace 'time' if such was the intention of Congress, states the correct rule." (Italics ours.)

[2] It must be held, therefore, that the word "manner," in the phrase "shall be advertised in the same manner as herein provided for the advertisement of a proposed charter," does not include the element of time, but refers only to the mode or way of advertising a proposed amendment to a freeholders' charter, unless we can see from the context that the time, as well as the mode, of advertising was intended to be included in the word "manner."

Petitioner argues that it was intended that the word "manner," as here used, should include the time as well as the mode or way of advertising, because, as he claims, if the word were not construed as including the time of advertising, it would be possible for any city council to frustrate the will of the electors by indefinitely postponing the advertisement of a proposed charter amendment, and thus prevent the holding of any election thereon. We do not think the dilemma thus suggested by petitioner will ensue if the word "manner" be construed as meaning only the way or mode, and not the time, of advertising. The embarrassing possibility suggested by petitioner's argument is based upon the assumption that, if the Constitution does not make it obligatory to advertise a proposed charter amendment within 15 days from the filing of the petition for its submission, then no time is prescribed by the Constitution for advertising a charter amendment proposed by electors.

[3] An analysis of the provisions of the Constitution will show the fallacy of petitioner's contention. If the Constitution does not require the city council to advertise within 15 days from the filing of a petition for a proposed charter amendment, then it is true that no definite time for advertising is directly enjoined upon the council. But, even so, it still remains that, indirectly, a period for advertising is prescribed by the Constitution, although that period may cover a somewhat wide range of time. It is expressly declared by section 8 of article 11 that a proposed amendment to a city charter "shall be submitted to the electors only during the six months next preceding a regular session of the Legislature or thereafter and before the final adjournment of that session"; that petitions for the submission of any amendment shall be filed "not less than sixty days prior to the general election next preceding a regular session of the Legislature"; and that the election on such proposed amendment shall be held "at a date to be fixed by the legislative body of such city, not less than forty and not more than sixty days after the completion of the advertising in the official paper." We are satisfied that the declaration that proposed amendments "shall be submitted to the electors only during the six months next preceding a regular session of the Legislature or thereafter and before the final adjournment of that session" is the equivalent of a mandatory requirement making it the duty of the city council to submit all proposed amendments to the electors at some time during the 6 months preceding the regular session of the Legislature next succeeding the filing of the petitions, or before the final adjournment of that session. And since the council must fix the date of the election "not less than forty and not more than sixty days after the completion of the advertising," it follows that, indirectly, the city council is commanded to advertise the proposed amendments at some time during a period having a fixed beginning and fixed ending, and that therefore it is not necessary to construe the word "manner" as including the element of time in order to escape the dilemma suggested by petitioner.

Another reason why this word "manner" should not be construed to mean "time" is that, if it were so construed, the time consumed in verifying the signature to a petition for the submission of a proposed charter amendment might exceed the 15 days within which, according to petitioner's claim, the proposed amendment should be advertised. When a freeholders' charter is to be submitted to a vote of the electors, the Constitution fixes a definite point of time from which to reckon the 15 days within which such charter is to be advertised. Not so, however, with respect to charter amendments; that is to say, the Constitution declares that a charter prepared by a board of freeholders must be advertised "within fifteen days after such filing" of the charter in the office of the clerk. No checking of names or verifying of signatures is required where a complete charter is to be submitted for ratification. It comes from the hands of the freeholders ready for advertising. But, where an amendment to the charter is proposed by 15 per cent. of the electors of a city, the signatures on the petitions for the amendment must be verified by the person having charge of the registration records of the city, who, in the instant case, is the city clerk. In the very nature of things, such verification must take some time, and mayhap considerable time. It is even conceivable that the time required for that purpose may, in some cases, consume more than 15 days. If it should take more than that length of time to verify the signatures to a petition, and if the word "manner," as here used, were construed as including the element of time, so that the advertising of any proposed charter amendment would have to be done within 15 days after the filing of the petition for the submission of the amendment, it is possible that it would be a physical impossibility to comply with the constitutional mandate to advertise the proposed amendment within 15 days from the filing of the petition.

Finally, there is, as we think, a conclusive reason why it must be held that the word "manner," as used in the phrase "shall be advertised in the same manner as herein provided for the advertisement of a proposed charter," was not intended to include the time for advertising proposed charter amendments. If it were necessary to advertise a charter amendment within 15 days from the filing of the petition for its submission to the electors, a case might readily arise where the council would either have to ignore the constitutional mandate to call an election "not less than forty and not more than sixty days after the completion of the advertising," or else violate the injunction not to submit the proposed amendment to a vote prior to 6 months next preceding a regular session of the Legislature. As we have seen, proposed amendments to a charter can be submitted to the electors "only during the six months next preceding a regular session of the Legislature or thereafter and before the final adjournment of that session." But, although an election upon a proposed charter amendment may not be held before the commencement of the period of time thus definitely fixed by the Constitution, petitions for such amendments, signed by 15 per cent. of the registered electors, may be filed with the legislative body of the city at any time prior to the period thus fixed by the Constitution as that within which proposed charter amendments may be submitted to a vote. The sole limitation upon the time for filing petitions for charter amendments is the requirement that they must be filed "not less than sixty days prior to the general election next preceding a regular session of the Legislature."

A hypothetical, concrete case will best serve to bring out the force of the point that, if petitioner's construction of the constitutional provision in question were adopted, the legislative body of the city might be confronted with a situation where it would be impossible for it to fix the time for an election in compliance with the constitutional mandate. Let us suppose, for example, that a petition for an amendment to a city charter, signed by 15 per cent. of the registered electors, is filed in the month of February of a year in which a general election is to be held. In that case, if it were the duty of the city council to advertise such proposed amendment within 15 days after the filing of the petition, then the amendment would have to be submitted to vote not later than the month of April, if the council complied with the constitutional mandate to call an election on all proposed charter amendments "not less than forty and not more than sixty days after the completion of the advertising in the official paper." But the election could not be held in the month of April without violating the constitutional requirement that all proposed amendments shall be submitted to the electors of the city "only during the six months next preceding a regular session of the Legislature or thereafter and before the final adjournment of that session."

For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that it was not intended that the element of time should be included in the word "manner," as that word is used in the constitutional requirement that proposed amendments to a charter shall be advertised "in the same manner" that is provided for the advertisement of a proposed charter, and that therefore respondents are not obligated to advertise the amendment in question within 15 days after the filing of the petition for its submission to a vote of the city electorate.

The alternative writ of mandate heretofore issued is discharged, and the application for a peremptory writ of mandate is denied.

CALIFORNIA DRILLING & MACHINERY CO. v. CROWDER et al. (Civ. 2474.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 17, 1922.)

1. Evidence ⟸441(7) — Parol evidence inadmissible to vary agreement implied by law as to time for performance.

Where a well-drilling agreement specified no time for performance, Civ. Code, § 1657, providing that in such case a reasonable time is allowed, was as much a part of the contract as though written therein, and parol evidence of an agreement fixing the time was inadmissible to change or vary it.

2. Contracts ⟸167—Presumed that statutory rule as to reasonable time for performance was known to parties and considered by them.

Where a written agreement specifies no time for performance, it is presumed that the settled legal meaning of such an agreement, under Civ. Code, § 1657, allowing a reasonable time for performance, was known to the parties, and considered by them in the execution of the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the California Drilling & Machinery Company against C. L. Crowder and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, for appellants.

C. D. McComish, of Colusa, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for the recovery of the sum of $2,900, claimed to be due on a contract in writing executed March 30, 1920, whereby plaintiff agreed to furnish the material and drill certain wells for defendant for the consideration and under the conditions therein specified. The judgment was in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,514, from which the appeal is taken.

Appellants declare:

"The question that is presented on this appeal arises from the rulings of the trial court rejecting certain evidence offered by counsel for defendants, which tended to show that, when the contract between plaintiff and defendants was entered into, a collateral oral agreement was entered into between them, by which the plaintiff became bound to complete its contract not later than May 1, 1920."

The importance of the ruling is disclosed by the fact that the work was not completed until July, and it is claimed by appellants that thereby they suffered great damage by reason of having been deprived of a water supply for their rice crop. It appears that appellants desired to have this limitation of time embodied in the written contract, but respondent refused to so incorporate it. However, the claim is that there was an oral contract to that effect, and evidence was offered and received in its support, but afterward stricken out by the court.

Appellants contend for the application of the rule that:

"Parol evidence is admissible as to a collateral agreement upon which the main writing is silent, and which does not purport to affect the terms of the instrument, * * * and when the evidence offered, or the oral agreement sought to be proved, is not inconsistent with the terms embodied in the instrument."

To the contrary, respondent claims that said oral contract is entirely inconsistent with the written instrument. To show this, it is pointed out that the defendants had several options, which, if exercised, would render the contract impossible of fulfillment by May 1, or any other fixed date. For instance, the written contract gave defendants the privilege of going as far below 100 feet as they might see fit in their search for water. "This one option alone," so says respondent, "makes defendants' alleged oral agreement absolutely irreconcilable with the written contract."

Again, defendants could stop the work at any time to pump out sand, and the testimony showed they actually spent five days of the month in thus getting rid of the sand. No one could anticipate how much time would be required for this purpose. The defendants also had the right to determine whether they would have one well or three wells, and at the time of the execution of the contract it was not known, of course, how many they would choose. An additional option was the right to have the location of the wells changed, and it seems that, acting under the advice of a certain "water witch," named Cofer, they changed the location of both wells; one of them after it was down 30 feet, requiring the work to be started over again, including the taking down, moving, and setting up of the rigs.

[1] These considerations certainly furnish strong reasons in support of the theory that there was no such agreement to finish the work within a month after the contract was executed; but we need not decide that such time limitation would be so repugnant to the written terms as to bring it within the rule forbidding parol evidence "to vary or contradict the terms of a written instrument," as we are of the opinion that the case is governed by the principle contained in section 1657 of the Civil Code, as follows:

"If no time is specified for the performance of an act required to be performed, a reasonable time is allowed."

This court had occasion to give to the subject very careful attention in the case of Standard Box Co. v. Mutual Biscuit Co., 10 Cal. App. 750, 103 Pac. 938, wherein the Supreme Court denied a rehearing. Therein it was said:

"It is a well-settled principle that that which is implied by law becomes as much a part of the contract as that which is therein written, and if the contract is clear and complete, when aided by that which is imported into it by legal implication, it cannot be contradicted by parol in respect of that which is implied any more than in respect of that which is written."

Therein an option was given to purchase, which was silent as to the time for acceptance, and it was held that proof of an oral agreement as to the time was inadmissible. The decisions of the Supreme Court upon the subject are specifically reviewed, and while it was pointed out that some of them contain expressions apparently inconsistent therewith, it was declared that:

"Where the law fixes the time of performance, parol evidence of some other definite time is inadmissible as varying the written instrument."

In 17 Cyc. 570, the rule is stated as follows:

"The legal effect of a written instrument, even though not apparent from the terms of the instrument itself, but left to be implied by law, can no more be contradicted, explained, or controlled by parol or extrinsic evidence than if such effect had been expressed. Thus, where no time of performance is specified in a contract, the legal effect is that it is to be performed within a reasonable time, and parol evidence is not admissible to show an agreement that it shall be performed at a particular time."

In 10 R. C. L. 222, we find the following:

"When a writing upon its face imports to be a complete expression of the whole agreement, and contains thereon all that is necessary to constitute a contract, it is presumed that the parties have introduced into it every material item and term, and parol evidence is not admissible to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular item to which the parol evidence is directed."

[2] Various decisions are cited by both parties in support of their respective contentions, and it must be admitted that some conflict in the authorities exists; but the weight preponderates and the better reason operates in favor of the view that, where the written contract is silent as to the time of performance, and the law fixes a reasonable time in such cases, the statutory provision becomes a part of the contract as though written therein, and parol evidence is inadmissible to change or vary it. In such instance the written agreement has a settled legal meaning as to time of performance, and it is presumed, of course, that this meaning was known to the parties and considered by them in the execution of the contract.

We may add that Whittier v. Home Savings Bank, 161 Cal. 311, 119 Pac. 92, and Blaeholder v. Guthrie, 17 Cal. App. 297, 119 Pac. 524, decided since the Standard Box Co. Case, supra, are entirely dissimilar to the case at bar. In the former, parol evidence was held to be admissible to show an agreement to repay to certain assignees, who had taken assignments of a part of the contract to secure advances to the contractor, the sum of $2,600 from the first collections under the written contract for the improvement of certain streets; the written instrument being silent as to such matter and its terms not being affected by said parol agreement. Not only was the written contract incomplete in that respect, but there was no provision of law that supplied the omission, and the Supreme Court properly held that the case fell within the principle announced in Savings Bank of So. Cal. v. Asbury, 117 Cal. 103, 48 Pac. 1083, as follows:

"The rule that an agreement in writing supersedes all prior or contemporaneous oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter has no application to a collateral agreement, upon which the instrument is silent and which does not purport to affect the terms of the instrument."

In Blaeholder v. Guthrie, supra, the parol evidence was admitted to show the particular crop to which the written contract related, the written instrument being uncertain in that respect. It was said by the Court of Appeal for the Second District:

"If there was any uncertainty or ambiguity in the contract, or the application of the same, it was competent in aid of its interpretation to show the situation of the parties and the surrounding circumstances as they existed when the contract was made"—citing Preble v. Abrahams, 88 Cal. 245, 26 Pac. 99, 22 Am. St. Rep. 301.

In view of the considerations to which we have adverted, we think there was no uncertainty or ambiguity in the contract herein; the parties having impliedly agreed that plaintiff should have a reasonable time in which to complete the work.

As we view the foregoing decisive of the controversy, we need not consider the further contention of respondent that appellants must fail at any rate, because they did not show that they suffered any damage by the delay.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

In re CHEDA'S ESTATE.

CHEDA v. CHEDA et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 3, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 31, 1922.)

1. Corporations ⇐116—Option to buy stock held converted by credit allowed thereon into accepted offer.

Where a note maker assigned to payee, his brother, in full payment of the note plus the amount of a disputed claim, stock worth the amount of the entire indebtedness, and the payee thereafter gave an option to assignor's wife to purchase the stock for such amount, with interest, and later, on the assignor's objecting to being charged with the disputed claim, the payee agreed to "wipe out" such amount, which he did, not by returning it in cash, but by crediting it with the assignor's consent as a cash payment on the option, the effect of such crediting was to convert the option into an accepted offer.

2. Corporations ⇐116—Option to purchase stock held accepted by payment of less than full purchase price.

Where an option to purchase stock provided that, on default in payment of interest on the unpaid portion of the purchase price, the option might be terminated by repaying to the optionee "any sum paid on account of above principal," the option might be exercised and converted into an accepted offer by a payment of less than the whole amount of the price.

3. Executors and administrators ⇐96—Contract to purchase stock not forfeitable by owner's executor without return of payments made.

Where an option to purchase stock provided that, on default in payment of interest on the unpaid portion of the purchase price, the option might be terminated by repaying to the purchaser "any sum paid on account of above principal," and the seller had agreed, as respects a disputed claim against purchaser's husband, which had been paid by the husband's transfer of the stock to the seller, to "wipe out" such amount, and had done so, not by returning it in cash, but by crediting it, with the husband's assent, as a cash payment on the wife's option, the seller's executor, in attempting to declare a forfeiture, failed of his purpose, where he made no offer to return the amount of the disputed claim in cash, nor was the effect of the provision as to repayment avoided by the executor's inviting the husband to file a claim against the estate of the seller for any sum that might be due him under the terms of the option, as neither husband nor wife would have any claim against the estate for the disputed amount until the contract had been lawfully terminated.

4. Corporations ⇐118—Receipt of dividends on stock by seller of stock held to operate as set-off to accruing interest on purchase price.

Where the seller of stock constantly recognized the fact that the acceptance of his offer, embodied in an option given by him to buy the stock and the payment of a part of the purchase price, had converted the option into a mutual contract, and that thereupon the purchaser became the owner of the stock and entitled to its dividends, the receipt of the dividends by the seller constituted by operation of law a set-off to the accruing demands for interest on the unpaid portion of the purchase price.

5. Executors and administrators ⇐96—Executor of seller of stock held bound to notify buyer to make prompt payment before resorting to forfeiture.

Delays granted by seller of stock in the payment of interest on the balance of the purchase price made it incumbent on his executors to give notice to the buyer, before resorting to forfeiture, that they would require prompt payment of the interest.

6. Corporations ⇐118 — Delay in making prompt payment of interest on stock purchase held waived.

Where one of the executors of the seller of stock, when asked by husband of the buyer to figure up the amount necessary to pay the full purchase price, pleaded his desire to go on a vacation, and the matter was accordingly delayed until his return, this operated as waiver of delay in making prompt payment of interest on the unpaid balance of the price.

7. Appeal and error ⇐1009(2)—Findings reasonably sustained by competent evidence in proceeding to compel delivery of assets by executors are conclusive on appeal.

The Supreme Court having held that a proceeding to require executors to transfer and deliver bank stock pursuant to a contract by decedent for the sale thereof is practically a proceeding in equity terminating in a final judgment, the findings of the trial court are conclusive on appeal, if reasonably sustained by competent evidence.

8. Specific performance ⇐121(8)—Findings as to truth of allegation of equity in petition to require delivery of bank stock under contract with decedent held sustained.

Findings of the trial court, in a proceeding to require executors to deliver bank stock pursuant to a contract for the sale thereof by decedent, that the allegation of equity in the petition was true, held sustained by sufficient evidence, as against the contention that the value of the stock was so far in excess of the agreed price as to render specific enforcement of the contract inequitable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Percy S. King, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of S. H. Cheda, deceased. From an order directing execution of a contract by decedent with Elenore A. Cheda and V. J. B. Cheda, George A. Cheda, one of the executors, appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 202 Pac. 133.

Henry E. Greer and Thos. P. Boyd, both of San Rafael, for appellant.

Jos. K. Hawkins, of San Rafael, for respondent V. J. B. Cheda.

Roy C. Lewis, of San Rafael, for respondent Elenore A. Cheda.

PREWETT, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order of the trial court directing said executors to carry into execution the terms of a written contract entered into by said S. H. Cheda in his lifetime with said Elenore A. Cheda. The facts of the controversy are numerous, but in the main they are established by evidence that is free from contradiction.

More than 20 years ago S. H. Cheda organized the Marin County Bank and the Marin County Savings Bank. The two institutions have been affiliated ever since their organization, and have been conducted in the same place of business and under the same management. S. H. Cheda had been for many years the president and active manager of both banks. A few years after the organization of the banks S. H. Cheda gave to his brother, said V. J. B. Cheda, 95 shares of the capital stock in each of said two banks. V. J. B. Cheda held and owned this stock for more than 15 years and up to October 30, 1916. On this date he was indebted to said S. H. Cheda on a promissory note in the sum of $19,000, and in addition thereto the latter claimed a balance as due to him from said V. J. B. Cheda of $6,650, alleged to be due on account of certain losses incurred in a barley deal and other matters, aggregating an entire claim of $25,650. On said October 30 said V. J. B. Cheda assigned to S. H. Cheda, in full payment of said sum of $25,650, all his said bank stock, to wit, 190 shares. The parties appraised this stock as worth, and the evidence shows that it was in fact worth, at least said sum for the payment of which it was assigned. The immediate motive for this assignment at this time is not clearly shown in the record, but on the following day, October 31, there came on for trial a suit brought against said V. J. B. Cheda by some third person.

On January 9, 1917, more than 2 months after the assignment, S. H. Cheda, without consideration, executed to Mrs. Elenore A. Cheda, the wife of said V. J. B. Cheda, a written option to purchase this bank stock. About this document revolve most of the facts of this controversy. It is in the words and figures following:

"In consideration of the sum of one dollar and other valuable consideration, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I hereby give to Elenore A. Cheda, her heirs and assigns, the option of buying for the full price of $25,650, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, interest payable quarterly, and, if not so paid, then to be added to the principal sum of $25,650 and bear interest at the same rate, the following stock, to wit: Ninety-five shares of the stock of the Marin County National Bank of San Rafael; 95 shares of the stock of the Marin County Savings Bank. The said Elenore A. Cheda shall have the right to close this application at any time within ten years. If default be made in the payment of interest for the period of one year, at the option of the undersigned, this option may be terminated by paying to Elenore Cheda any sum paid on account of above principal sum of $25,650, and I agree to deliver to Elenore Cheda, or to any one named by her, certificates in due form for the above-described stock.

"Dated San Rafael, California, Jan. 9, 1917.

"Original. S. H. Cheda.

"Signed in triplicate."

V. J. B. Cheda objected to being charged with said sum of $6,650 on the barley transactions, claiming that the investments were entered into without his consent or approval, and that he should not be held liable therefor. Thereupon, and on the following day, S. H. Cheda agreed to "wipe out" this amount. He did not return it in cash, but he credited it, with the consent of V. J. B. Cheda, as a cash payment on said option. This payment was evidenced by a written receipt, subscribed by said S. H. Cheda. It is an important factor in the case and we quote it, as follows:

"$6,650.00. San Rafael, Cal., 1/10 1917.

"Received of Elenore A. Cheda six thousand six hundred and fifty dollars on % of option to purchase stock of bank dated Jan. 9, 1917.

"Original. S. H. Cheda."

If, as we have stated, the stock was worth the amount due on the promissory note, to wit, $19,000 plus the amount of $6,650 involved in the barley deal, it follows that V. J. B. Cheda actually paid to S. H. Cheda, by transfer of the stock, the equivalent of the full sum of $25,650 in cash. Thereupon the latter, when he consented to "wipe out" the claim against the former on the barley deal, actually held $6,650 to his credit, and it was turned over as a cash payment in that sum on the option. This is according to the findings, and they are fully sustained by the evidence. There is, in fact, no evidence to the contrary. It results then, that this court must accept as a fact in the case that this payment of $6,650 was made on the option on the day following its execution. The payment thus made was, beyond question, the equivalent of so much cash.

On the 16th day of July, 1920, S. H. Cheda died, leaving a last will wherein he appointed said V. J. B. Cheda and another brother, George A. Cheda, as joint executors thereof. He left one minor son as his sole heir. For a period of about 18 months prior to his death, he was practically incapable of attending to business. During this period V. J. B. Cheda, assisted more or less by George A. Cheda, handled his affairs and managed the two banks. V. J. B. Cheda had control of the bank account of the deceased during his illness, and made deposits therein and drew checks thereon as occasion required. Sometimes he signed simply the name S. H. Cheda, and at other times he followed the signature with his own initials. About the time of the payment of the $6,650 on the option contract, S. H. Cheda orally agreed that the dividends accruing upon the bank stock should regularly be credited to Elenore A. Cheda on the interest account on the option. The dividends on the stock more than paid the interest on the option, and the excess was paid, from time to time, to Elenore A. Cheda. These dividends, up to and including the month of January, 1918, were by S. H. Cheda, in his own handwriting, credited in liquidation of the interest accruing on the option. These credits paid the interest to the month of January, 1918. Shortly after this he suffered a collapse, and he did not thereafter personally attend to any business.

In the month of May, 1919, there had accrued as unpaid dividends on said 190 shares of stock the sum of $855, which sum was, by said George A. Cheda, credited on the interest account on said option. This credit was made by him in his own handwriting and as agent for S. H. Cheda. On or about the 2d day of July, 1920, and very shortly before the death of S. H. Cheda, said George A. Cheda received the sum of $855 as dividends upon said stock, and he then and there paid the same into the bank account of S. H. Cheda, although no entry or indorsement was made upon said option contract to show that the same, or any part thereof, was applied toward the payment of interest. If Elenore A. Cheda was entitled to have it so credited, then she was not delinquent as much as one year in the payment of interest and no delinquency on account of nonpayment of interest ever accrued.

On September 3, 1920, George A. Cheda, acting as one of said executors, served upon V. J. B. Cheda a notice of forfeiture on the alleged ground that a payment of interest was more than one year overdue. No notice was ever served upon Elenore A. Cheda. The service was made upon her husband on the theory that a certain indorsement upon one of the triplicate copies of the option operated as a transfer thereof to him. This indorsement was made upon that copy retained by S. H. Cheda, and it was found among his papers after his death. It was in the following words:

"For value received, I hereby sell, assign, and transfer all my right in and to above option to V. J. B. Cheda. Elenore A. Cheda."

The evidence shows, without conflict, that V. J. B. Cheda had no knowledge of the execution of said assignment and that it was never delivered to him. The dividends accruing on the stock in January, 1920, although actually paid into the bank to the credit of S. H. Cheda, were drawn out of the account by V. J. B. Cheda and apparently applied to his own use. No offer was made at the time of service of the notice of forfeiture, or at any other time, to repay to Elenore A. Cheda, or to V. J. B. Cheda, the said sum of $6,650, paid on the option on January 10, 1917.

On the day following the service of said notice, Elenore A. Cheda paid to V. J. B. Cheda, as one of said executors, the sum of $1,400 by way of interest and in about one week thereafter she paid to him the entire balance of $19,000. These payments were accepted by V. J. B. Cheda, but not by George A. Cheda, and a few days thereafter the full amount of both payments was deposited in one of the banks to the credit of the two executors, and notice thereof given to George A. Cheda.

[1] The first and most important question in the case is the effect of the payment of $6,650 made on the option on the day following its execution. It should be remarked that, although V. J. B. Cheda strenuously insisted that he was not liable for and should not be bound by the transactions which resulted in the losses on the barley and other deals, he is made to say on cross-examination as a witness that he "owed" said sum to S. H. Cheda; but an examination of his entire testimony shows clearly that he disputed and controverted the claim, and shows that his brother S. H. Cheda acquiesced therein and returned the money by way of credit on the option. The effect of this payment was to close the option and to convert it into an accepted offer. From that time the contract was fully binding upon S. H. Cheda. In the late case of Flickinger v. Heck, decided by the Supreme Court on September 17, 1921, and reported in 200 Pac. 1045, the court says:

"An option contract may be regarded as embodying an offer. When the optionee, or person to whom the option is made, signifies his desire to accept in accordance with the terms of the option, the optioner, or person making the offer, becomes obligated to perform. This acceptance of the offer contained in the option contract is called 'election,' and it gives rise to a subsequent contract between the parties to buy and sell or perform whatever other acts have been specified in the option contract."

[2] The payment of part of the purchase price and its voluntary acceptance by S. H. Cheda constituted an election by Elenore A.

Cheda to buy the stock. This is so, even if it be conceded that S. H. Cheda might have refused to accept less than the entire contract price. But, in fact, it was contemplated by the parties that payments less than the whole amount might be made on the principal. This is conclusively shown by the provision in the option that no forfeiture could be declared without first returning such portions of the principal as may theretofore have been paid. Its language is:

"This option may be terminated by paying to Elenore A. Cheda any sum paid on account of above principal of $25,650."

[3, 4] When George A. Cheda, on September 3, 1920, attempted to declare a forfeiture, he failed of his purpose, since he made no offer to return said payment. His position is that the death of S. H. Cheda revoked the option. It is quite true that the death of a party before acceptance revokes a mere option. Section 1587, Civ. Code. But we have no such case here. It is evident that both parties, after the payment of said sum of $6,650, regarded the option as closed. S. H. Cheda constantly recognized the obvious fact that an acceptance of the offer and the payment of a part of the purchase price converted the option into a mutual contract, and that thereupon she became the owner of the stock and entitled to its dividends. This being so, the receipt by S. H. Cheda of the dividends constituted by operation of law a set-off to the accruing demands for interest. As long as he lived, unless the dividends of January and July, 1920, should constitute exceptions, they were regularly credited upon the interest. At most, the defenses interposed by appellant are purely technical, and they are clearly at variance with the desires and intent of the contracting parties.

Although the option expressly provided that there could be no forfeit for nonpayment of interest, unless all payments of principal were returned, the appellant made an effort to avoid the effect of this provision by inviting V. J. B. Cheda to file a claim against the estate of S. H. Cheda for any sum that might be due to him under the terms of the option. But this was not according to the terms of the option. Moreover, neither V. J. B. Cheda nor his wife had any claim against the estate. They could have had no claim upon the $6,650 until there had first been a lawful termination of the contract, and this event could be brought about only by returning the payment to him or her.

[5] It is insisted by the respondent that the delays granted in his lifetime by S. H. Cheda made it incumbent upon his representatives to give notice that they would thereafter require prompt payment of the interest before resorting to the remedy of forfeiture. This claim is well founded. Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751.

[6] The executors waived the delay in making prompt payment. George A. Cheda, when V. J. B. Cheda asked that he figure up the amount necessary to pay the full purchase price, pleaded his desire to go on a vacation, and suggested that to take it up then would interfere with his vacation. The matter was delayed until his return. This lulled the payee into a sense of security, and operated to extend the time until a reasonable time after his return.

The respondent insists that the payments to V. J. B. Cheda and their acceptance by him as an executor cured any default theretofore existing. This view receives the support of our Supreme Court in Willis v. Farley, 24 Cal. 491, and In re Sanderson, 74 Cal. 199, 15 Pac. 753; but, in view of our conclusions on other points, it becomes unnecessary to examine the question at length.

[7, 8] The appellant submits the claim that the value of the stock at the time of the execution of the option, and especially at the time of the commencement of this proceeding, was so far in excess of the agreed price that it would be inequitable to order a specific performance of the contract. This position is wholly untenable. As to the value at the time of making payment of the $6,650, the point is not fairly open to discussion. S. H. Cheda was a man of affairs, and evidently a banker of wide experience. He, better than any other person, knew the value of the stock. He knew, when he accepted the payment of $6,650, whether or not he was asking a proper price for the stock. The Supreme Court, in Estate of S. H. Cheda, 202 Pac. 133, has held that this proceeding is practically a proceeding in equity terminating in a final judgment; the findings of the trial court are therefore conclusive on the court on appeal, if reasonably sustained by competent evidence. In this case, the trial court found that the allegation of equity in the petition is true. This finding is justified by the testimony of V. J. B. Cheda, when he testified that each and every allegation of the petition is true. It is sustained by other evidence that goes more into detail. In every view, the value is not so out of proportion to the agreed price as to justify a court in overriding the deliberate contract of the parties. Equity does not require the highest price obtainable, but merely that it should be fair and adequate under the circumstances. Haddock v. Knapp, 171 Cal. 59, 151 Pac. 1140. We are unable to say that the finding of the trial court on this point is not sustained by ample evidence. We may add that the option was closed within about two months after S. H. Cheda bought the stock, and at the precise price that he paid for it.

Lastly, our attention is directed to that provision of the Probate Act which directs the trial court, if the right of the petitioner is found to be doubtful, to dismiss the petition without prejudice. Section 1602, Code Civ. Proc. However, we discover no particular wherein her right may be deemed doubtful as viewed in the light of the findings and evidence. It does not appear that any point has arisen that could be handled more satisfactorily by a court of equity than by the probate court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re DUNSCOMB et al.

BARTLETT, Mayor, v. DUNSCOMB et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District. Division 1, California. July 24, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 21, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊜168—Acts of mayor must be authorized or necessarily implied.

The functions of a mayor are of an executive or administrative character, and whatever power he may exercise must be warranted or necessarily implied, or his acts will be illegal and a usurpation of authority.

2. Municipal corporations ⊜168—Mayor not authorized to investigate bill approved by council.

After the council had approved a printing bill, the mayor was not authorized to investigate it on the theory that the charge was excessive, as under the charter, amended in compliance with Const. art. 11, § 6, the council is invested with the legislative powers of the municipality and has the sole power to determine this question, and its determination, in the absence of fraud, excessive jurisdiction, or other plain violation of law, is final.

3. Municipal corporations ⊜168—Mayor not authorized to issue subpœna to investigate claim against city.

Provision of the city's charter authorizing the mayor to see that all ordinances are faithfully observed, and giving to every official board the power to issue subpœnas to compel parties to produce records concerning matters before the board, did not authorize the mayor to issue a subpœna to a creditor of the city to compel the production of records concerning a claim which had been approved by the council, as whatever power the mayor has in this respect must be exercised in conjunction with the other members of the council.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Application by Louis Bartlett, as Mayor of the City of Berkeley, for an order to compel Charles E. Dunscomb and others to obey a subpœna. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the application, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Lemuel D. Sanderson, City Atty., of Berkeley, for appellant.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer, without leave to amend, to an application for an order to compel obedience to a subpœna issued by appellant as mayor of the city of Berkeley. It appears from the petition that the city ordered the printing of certain sample and official ballots from the Berkeley Gazette, a corporation of which respondents are officers. No specified price was agreed upon, but the work was performed and a bill therefor rendered to the proper authorities. The city council approved the same, but before payment was made petitioner, as mayor, was informed, so it is alleged, that the charge was excessive, and he thereupon determined to ascertain the truth as to whether or not the account was fair and reasonable. With this purpose in view he issued a subpœna to respondents directing them to appear and testify before him, and to produce probative evidence, consisting of certain described books and papers.

Respondents failed to obey the subpœna, and the petitioner thereupon presented an application to the superior court of Alameda county for an order to show cause why respondents refused to do so. A demurrer was interposed thereto on several grounds, both general and special. The trial court sustained the same, without leave to amend, and this is an appeal from such judgment. No claim of fraud was raised, nor that either the council or any member thereof acted improperly. The main question, therefore, presented for determination, is whether or not the mayor has the legal authority or power to investigate the bill in question, and to this end require respondents to produce papers and documents and appear before him in obedience to his subpœna.

[1] The source of the powers and duties of the mayor is the charter of the municipality. In the various chapters of that instrument are to be found the provisions for his appointment and an enumeration of his powers and duties. He is one of ten elective officials. As chief executive he must see that all ordinances are duly enforced, and he is charged with general oversight of the several departments of the municipal government, and directed to ascertain whether all contracts made with the city are faithfully performed, and he must annually and from time to time give the council information relative to the affairs of the city and recommend to its consideration such matters as he may deem expedient. He is given the power to make an examination of the books of officials and employees, and has supervision over public utility companies, and he performs such other powers and duties as may be prescribed by law and ordinance. He is made a member of the council, and is president thereof, and presides at its meetings, and all resolutions and ordinances are signed by him; but he has no veto power. The council is made the governing body of the municipality, subject to the express limitations of the charter, and is vested with all powers of legislation in municipal affairs adequate to a complete system of local government consistent with the Constitution of the state. Money is drawn from the treasury upon warrant and allowed by the council or proper board, and then only when such warrant is signed by the president and secretary or clerk of such body and properly numbered and dated. Every official board or commission is, under the charter provisions, given the power to issue subpœnas to compel the production of books, papers, and documents, and to take and hear testimony concerning any matter or thing pending before such official board or commission. It thus appears that the functions of the mayor, as such, are intended in the main to be, and they are, of an executive or administrative character; but whatever power he may at any time exercise, be it executive, legislative or judicial, it must be warranted or authorized, or be necessarily implied, or his acts will be deemed illegal and a usurpation of authority. Von Schmidt v. Widber, 105 Cal. 151, 38 Pac. 682.

[2] In compliance with the provisions of section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution, giving to cities the right and power to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, the city of Berkeley amended its organic law. It is the claim of appellant that by reason of this amendment the charter, instead of being a grant of power, became in effect a limitation of powers, and that the mayor, in carrying out his official duties, has therefore complete authority to investigate any matter relating to municipal affairs, unless prohibited from so doing by direct limitation. Matter of Nowak, 184 Cal. 701, 195 Pac. 402; Civic Center Association, etc., v. Railroad Commission of the State of California, 175 Cal. 441, 166 Pac. 351; Cole v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 617, 182 Pac. 436. Whatever the effect of the amendment to the charter may be is a question that is not necessary to discuss generally.

By the charter amendment (section 115, art. 16) the city is given the right to make and enforce laws, subject to the limitations and restrictions provided for in the charter. By that instrument the powers and duties of the mayor are restricted. The council is invested with the legislative powers of the municipality, and is its governing body. True, the mayor is a member thereof, and as such he has the same, but no greater, power than any of the other members, and that body must function as a whole, and not by its members separately. The authority of each official, board, or department of the municipality to exercise any corporate powers with which it has been clothed must be distinctly conferred or necessarily implied, in order to entitle it to act. As mayor, appellant could undoubtedly refuse to order a claim paid, and upon such refusal the proper remedy could be invoked against him; but the question of the regularity of a claim is one for the council, which has the sole power, under the charter, to determine such question, and its hearing and determination, in the absence of fraud, excessive jurisdiction, or other plain violation of law, is final and conclusive. McConoughey v. Jackson, 101 Cal. 265, 35 Pac. 863, 40 Am. St. Rep. 53; McFarland v. McCowen, 98 Cal. 329, 33 Pac. 113.

[3] The fact that the mayor, as chief executive, is given power to see that all ordinances are faithfully observed, does not confer the authority here attempted to be exercised. Whatever power he has to object to the correctness of a charge of the character here involved must be exercised in conjunction with all the other members of the council. The question of the reasonableness of a demand is not one for the mayor as such to determine. Any other conclusion would totally distort the plain intention of the framers of the charter, and stultify and destroy the limitations sought to be placed upon the various boards and officers.

Considering the conclusion we have reached, the questions as to the sufficiency of the pleadings and the right of the mayor to institute the proceeding become unimportant.

From what we have said it follows that the judgment of the lower court, sustaining the demurrer to appellant's application without leave to amend, should be, and it is, hereby affirmed.

PAVILION ICE RINK v. BRYANT, Tax Collector et al. (Civ. 3976.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 20, 1922.)

Mandamus ⊂=163—Demurrer to petition, admitting its allegations, held improperly sustained.

Demurrer to petition for mandamus to compel issuance of a license and permit to continue the conduct of a dancing pavilion is improperly sustained; it admitting the petitioner's allegations that plaintiff was arbitrarily and capriciously forced out of its lawful business, properly conducted and not injurious to persons, property, or public welfare, while others in like situation and condition were permitted by the same authorities to continue.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Mandamus by the Pavilion Ice Rink against Edward F. Bryant, Tax Collector of the City and County of San Francisco, and others. Demurrer to petition was sustained, and proceeding dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. J. Stafford, Edward A. Cunha, and John T. Williams, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Lull, City Atty., and Chas. S. Peery, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff filed its petition for a writ of mandate to require the defendant Bryant, as tax collector, to issue a license, and the other defendants, as members of the board of police commissioners, to issue a permit, to continue the conduct of a dancing pavilion in the premises known as the "Winter Garden" and located on the corner of Pierce and Sutter streets, San Francisco. A general demurrer to the petition was sustained, without leave to amend, and judgment followed, denying the application and dismissing the proceeding.

The petition alleged that the plaintiff was in possession of the premises under a lease running until August 1, 1926; that on the 1st day of June, 1918, acting under the ordinances enacted by the board of supervisors, the police commissioners granted to petitioner a permit to conduct a dancing pavilion in the premises, and that this permit had been renewed without protest on each succeeding quarter thereafter until January 1, 1921; that the commissioners refused to renew the permit for the quarter commencing on that day, giving as a reason therefor that the premises were located in a residence district; that in truth and fact the premises were not located in a residence district; that the street on which the premises were located was a business street; that the locality had not changed since the original permit had been granted, except that, since said time, it had assumed more of a business character from day to day; that in fact there was only one residence in the block in which said premises were located, and the residents thereof consented to the maintenance of said business; that the declaration that the premises were located in a residence district "was a sham and a pretense, and not based upon the fact or the truth, all of which is and was well known to the members of the said board; that the said board and the members thereof well knew that the said district surrounding the plaintiff's place of business, and the street upon which it faces, were and are not a residence district, or a residence street; and in this behalf plaintiff avers that said declaration was made for the purpose of affording the said board and its members an excuse to arbitrarily, maliciously, oppressively, unreasonably, and unlawfully destroy plaintiff's business and impair plaintiff's contract of lease, and to cause plaintiff great and irreparable injury." It was further alleged that the refusal to renew said permit was in deference to a protest filed with the commissioners, based upon a popular hue and cry against the "Winter Garden" as a place where "Howard street gangsters" met their victims, and that though the police commissioners, after a hearing, affirmatively found that those grounds of protest were untrue, they nevertheless refused to issue the permit unless the protestants would formally withdraw their protest; that, when this was refused, the police commissioners devised the pretense of denying said permit on the ground that said premises were in a residential district; that this action was arbitrary, capricious, and unreasonable; that it discriminated against plaintiff and in favor of other proprietors of similar pavilions located in districts which are of a far more residential character. Allegations followed relating to the character of the dancing conducted in the premises and the general conduct of the place. This, it was alleged, was without criticism. It was also alleged that plaintiff had expended large sums of money in fitting up its place of business for a dancing pavilion, and that it would suffer great injury if it was denied the right to continue it.

From the allegations of the petition, it appears that, without any legal cause, but arbitrarily, oppressively, and capriciously, the board suddenly terminated plaintiff's right to conduct a lawful and profitable business upon premises which were leased for that purpose upon the faith of the permit theretofore granted. It is not necessary to discuss the many constitutional questions argued by the parties. The right of the city to regulate a business of this nature may be conceded. The point of the case is that the petition alleges that the appellant was not subjected to regulation, but that it was arbitrarily and capriciously forced out of business, while others in like situation and condition were permitted by the same authority to continue.

It is not necessary to cite authority to the point that a lawful business, properly conducted, and not injurious to persons, property, or public welfare, cannot be confiscated by the arbitrary and capricious dictation of any official body. The complaint alleges that this was what was done in this case, and, of course, the demurrer admits the truth of these allegations.

Judgment reversed.

TANNAHILL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF ORANGE COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3928.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 25, 1922.)

Courts ⊂=472(2) — District Court of Appeal will not compel settlement of bill of exceptions in action over which Supreme Court has exclusive appellate jurisdiction.

As a matter of policy, the District Court of Appeal will not by writ of mandate compel settlement of a bill of exceptions in an action involving the title to realty, since under Const. art. 6, § 4, the Supreme Court has exclusive appellate jurisdiction of such an action.

Original application for writ of mandate by J. M. Tannahill against the Superior Court of Orange County and Z. B. West, Judge thereof. Alternative writ discharged, and peremptory writ denied.

J. R. Jaffray, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Adair & Winder, of Riverside, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an original application to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the settlement of a bill of exceptions. An alternative writ of mandate was issued—inadvertently, as it now appears. In due time respondents appeared and presented a general demurrer to the petition. Thereafter the briefs were filed, and the matter has been regularly submitted. Because we think the proceeding is not properly here, we refrain from expressing any opinion upon the merits of the controversy, or upon the propriety of the issuance of the writ of mandate by the proper court.

Though contending that the trial judge was justified in refusing to settle the bill of exceptions, respondents have argued and submitted this proceeding without questioning the propriety of the issuance of the writ by this court, if the facts disclose it to be a proper case for commanding the trial judge to settle the bill. Upon reading the briefs, our attention is for the first time directed to the fact that the appeal in which petitioner intends using the bill of exceptions is not one of which this court has jurisdiction. Upon a more careful examination of the contents of the petition than was given when the alternative writ was issued, we find that the action in the superior court is one involving the title to and possession of real property. On an appeal from the judgment in such an action the Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction. Section 4, art. 6, Const. A bill of exceptions is ultimately used as a basis for presenting the merits of a case upon an appeal. The writ of mandate, when issued by an appellate court to compel the settlement of a bill of exceptions, is issued to aid the court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. The writ, therefore, should be issued by the court which possesses the appellate jurisdiction—in this case the Supreme Court of this state. Stewart v. Torrance, 9 Cal. App. 209, 98 Pac. 396. See, also, Matter of Application of Davidson, 24 Cal. App. 407, 141 Pac. 216, 144 Pac. 147.

We do not say that we would not have jurisdiction, if we chose to exercise it. The Constitution gives equal and concurrent jurisdiction to the Supreme Court and to the District Courts of Appeal to issue writs of mandamus in all proper cases. Const., art. 6, § 4. See Favorite v. Superior Court, 181 Cal. 265, 184 Pac. 15, 8 A. L. R. 290. But as a matter of policy and practice, both the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal, respectively, refuse to take jurisdiction of an original mandamus proceeding in aid of appellate jurisdiction where that appellate jurisdiction is vested originally in the other court. See Collins v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 264, 81 Pac. 509; Favorite v. Superior Court, supra.

Because the alternative writ of mandate was inadvertently issued, it is discharged, and the petition for the peremptory writ of mandate is denied.

ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST CO. v. WALLACE et al. (Civ. 4182.)

(District Court of Appeal. First District, Division 1, California. July 26, 1922.)

1. Novation ⟸12 — One relying on novation must establish substitution.

The burden is on the one relying on a novation to establish that the new obligation was intended as a substitution or extinguishment of the old one.

2. Bills and notes ⟸430—New note does not extinguish old indebtedness, without express agreement.

Before a note extinguishes and satisfies the indebtedness evidenced by an earlier one, there must be an express agreement or understanding to that effect.

3. Bills and notes ⟸140—Execution of new note as renewal of old one simply postpones payment of the old one.

Where a new note is given as a renewal of an old one, the new note only postpones the time of payment of the old one until default is made in the payment of the new note.

4. Pledges ⟸25—Lien of pledge not lost by renewal of debt.

Collateral security pledged for the payment of a note is not released by the taking of a new note in renewal of the old.

5. Bills and notes ⟸348—Indorsee's rights as purchaser before maturity held not affected by subsequent transaction of indorser amounting to renewal of note.

Where a payee indorsed notes before their maturity to a bank to secure a debt, the fact that she later incorporated her business and had the corporation give a note to the bank for her indebtedness did not change the position of the bank as holder of the note in due course to that of holder after maturity, though she guaranteed payment of the corporate note, as the subsequent transaction merely amounted to a renewal of the original obligation.

6. Pledges ⟸30(2)—One holding note to secure debt may seek to recover on the note, though debt is not due.

One holding a promissory note deposited as security for a debt evidenced by another note may seek to recover on the collateral note, and hold the proceeds in satisfaction of the principal debt, though the note evidencing the debt is not dishonored by nonpayment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by the Anglo-California Trust Company against George J. Wallace and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. J. Hayes, of Oakland, for appellants.

F. A. Denicke and H. S. Young, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This was an action brought to recover judgment upon certain promissory notes executed by the defendants, who were doing business under the firm name and style of George J. Wallace & Co. The notes were four in number and were in the principal sum of $500 each, and were made payable to their codefendant, Emma B. Freeman. They were all executed on August 29, 1919, and matured thereafter in two, three, four, and five months, respectively. On the 20th day of October, 1919, and prior to maturity thereof, they were indorsed by the payee to respondent, Anglo-California Trust Company. The first two notes having become due and not having been paid, suit was filed thereon on December 12, 1919, and thereafter on March 1, 1920, and after their maturity another suit was instituted on the two remaining notes. Defendants by answer set up certain defenses, including fraud and rescission. The actions were consolidated, the parties and questions being identical. At the trial and before the submission of the cases, the defendants other than Emma B. Freeman duly moved the court for permission to file certain answers supplementary, and to reopen the cases for further testimony. These motions were denied, for the reason, as found by the court, that plaintiff accepted the notes before maturity for a valuable consideration and without notice of the alleged defenses attempted to be set up in the proposed amended pleading. It is the contention of appellants that this finding is not supported by the evidence. Defendant Emma B. Freeman has not appealed.

It is admitted that the notes were indorsed by the payee and transferred to respondent before maturity. It is also admitted that at the time of the indorsement Emma B. Freeman was a customer of respondent and was indebted to it, and that she received additional accommodation in the nature of advances on the strength of the notes so indorsed, and that they were held by respondent as security for the payment of this indebtedness. It is further conceded that there is nothing in the evidence to show that prior to the transfer the trust company had any knowledge of the alleged defenses of appellants. Notwithstanding these admissions, it is urged that the evidence disclosed certain facts which altered and changed the position of respondent as holder of the notes in due course to that of holder after maturity, and that such facts had the effect of opening the door for the defenses alleged in appellants' answer, and their proposed amendments.

For a full understanding of the question a brief summary of the transactions of the parties becomes necessary. On August 22, 1919, the defendant Emma B. Freeman occupied a certain store and conducted a business therein, known as Freeman Art Company. She held the premises under a lease for the term of five years. The lease contained restrictions against assignment or subletting without the written consent of the lessor, and provided for forfeiture in the event of a breach of either of these conditions. On August 22, 1919, pursuant to representations on the part of Mrs. Freeman that she had a right to sell her lease, appellants agreed to purchase the same for the sum of $5,000. Thereafter Mrs. Freeman informed them that she was having difficulty in obtaining the consent of her landlord to a transfer of the lease. She subsequently, however, presented to Wallace & Co. what purported to be an assignment thereof. Wallace & Co., believing the instrument to be satisfactory, completed their agreement. The notes sued on, which constituted a part of the consideration for the sale, were executed and delivered, and Wallace & Co. then went into occupation of the premises. Shortly thereafter the owner demanded possession thereof, on the ground that the covenant against assignment had been violated, and a suit in unlawful detainer was instituted by him against the purchasers. Four months thereafter Wallace & Co. moved to other premises.

It is claimed by appellants that at this time a rescission of all contractual relations between Mrs. Freeman and appellants took place, and that appellants abandoned the premises and surrendered the same to Mrs. Freeman, and that she thereupon went into full possession thereof and resumed the conduct of the busines she had theretofore carried on prior to the sale, and subsequently incorporated the business under the name of the Freeman Art Company, and that its assets were transferred by her to this corporation, which in turn assumed all of her liabilities. This corporation executed and delivered to respondent bank its promissory note in the sum of $3,000 in payment of the indebtedness to it of Emma Freeman, a guaranty of payment being indorsed thereon by her.

[1-4] It is the claim of appellants that, respondent bank having assented to this transaction and accepted the corporate note, Emma B. Freeman's indebtedness to the bank was thereby novated, and the bank merely held the notes here sued on as collateral to the corporate note, and as the transaction took place after their maturity, appellants' defenses are material and competent. We see no merit in this contention. One relying upon a novation must establish that the new obligation was intended as a substitution and extinguishment of the old one. Here the only evidence that in any manner indicated a novation was the execution of the note by the corporation and its acceptance by the bank. The rule is well established in this state that, before a note extinguishes and satisfies the indebtedness evidenced by an earlier one, there must be an express agreement or understanding to that effect. It is not contended that there was any express agreement upon the subject, and whatever presumption, if any, which might arise from the transaction itself, is dispelled by the testimony of the teller of the bank, which shows there was no such agreement, but on the contrary, that the corporate note was simply a renewal of the original indebtedness. Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 Pac. 28; Savings & Loan Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 922; Bonestell v. Bowie, 128 Cal. 511, 61 Pac. 78; Gnarini v. Swiss-American Bank, 162 Cal. 181, 121 Pac. 726. In such a case the note only postpones the time of payment of the old note until default is made in the payment of the new note. Clark v. Berlin Realty Co., 33 Cal. App. 50, 164 Pac. 333. Nor is the collateral security pledged for the payment of the original debt released by the taking of such new note. 8 Corpus Juris, p. 442.

[5] Counsel for appellants argues that the doctrine announced in the Gnarini Case has no application to the instant one, for the reason that Emma B. Freeman guaranteed payment of the corporation note. We fail to see how this fact in any manner affects the doctrine there announced. The note executed by the Freeman Art Company was for the same debt, and was manifestly executed simply to meet the changed conditions brought about by the incorporation of the business. The rights of the bank became fixed at the time it took the notes, and they were in no manner affected by the subsequent transaction, which merely amounted to a renewal of the original obligation.

[6] Appellants' further contention that, assuming that a novation never took place, nevertheless Mrs. Freeman's liability to the bank was suspended so long as the corporate note was not dishonored by nonpayment. Assuming this to be so, a pledgee of commercial paper takes it as a trustee for the owner and pledgor, and the suspensive condition as to payment could in no manner affect the bank's right to seek to recover upon a matured promissory note deposited as security for this debt, and to hold the proceeds, if and when recovered, in satisfaction of the principal debt secured by it. 2 Randolph, Commercial Paper, § 795.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

FRANCIS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF KERN COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3916.)

Attachment ⊜131—Superior court authorized to hear application for increase of bond, the amount of which was fixed by clerk.

The superior court has jurisdiction to hear and determine an application for an increase in an attachment undertaking, the amount of which was fixed by the clerk of that court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 539, for the clerk, in fixing the amount of the undertaking before issuing the writ, was acting merely as a constituent part of the court.

Original application for writ of prohibition by Mary F. Francis against the Superior Court of Kern County and Howard A. Peairs, as Judge thereof. Alternative writ discharged, and peremptory writ denied.

Matthew S. Platz, of Bakersfield, for petitioner.

George E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an original application for a writ of prohibition directed to the superior court for Kern county, and Hon. Howard A. Peairs, judge, commanding and directing them to desist from hearing a motion to increase the amount of an undertaking on attachment which had been given in an action wherein the petitioner here is the plaintiff and L. W. Lowell and others are the defendants. To the alternative writ of prohibition, issued out of this court, respondents have made a return, which petitioner has not seen fit to traverse.

The petition and the return thereto disclose the following facts: Petitioner commenced an action against L. W. Lowell and others to recover $11,250, alleged to be due on a contract. Petitioner, as the plaintiff in that action, caused an affidavit for attachment to be filed in the superior court; at the same time the clerk of that court fixed the amount of the undertaking on attachment at $500, as he was authorized to do by section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereby it is provided that the clerk, before issuing the writ, shall require an undertaking on the part of the plaintiff in a sum not less than $200 and not exceeding the amount claimed by the plaintiff. Petitioner gave an undertaking in the amount required by the clerk—$500—and thereupon the writ of attachment was issued. Acting under this writ, the sheriff, on March 11, 1922, levied upon certain debts then due and owing to the defendants in that action by the Midway Northern Oil Company, which debts were sufficient to satisfy plaintiff's demand for $11,250, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from the date of the commencement of the action.

The return, which, as we have stated, has not been traversed by petitioner, further alleges that it will take approximately three years before the action in which the attachment was issued can be finally concluded; that the interest which will accrue on the moneys or debts garnisheed by the sheriff, together with costs, will amount to approximately $2,500; that if the defendants in that action shall prevail the sum of $500 named as the penalty of the undertaking on attachment will be entirely inadequate to compensate them for the damages which they will sustain by reason of the attachment; and that if, pending the final outcome, disaster should overtake the oil company whose indebtedness to the defendants was thus levied upon and garnisheed, the full amount of $11,250 so tied up by the attachment might be dissipated and the defendants further damaged thereby.

The defendants, whose property has thus been attached, have given notice to the plaintiff in that action, the petitioner here, that they will move the superior court for Kern county to increase the amount of the undertaking on attachment from $500 to $11,250, on the ground that an undertaking in the sum of $500 is wholly inadequate. It is to prevent the hearing of that motion that the present proceeding was commenced; petitioner claiming that the superior court is without jurisdiction to alter the amount of the undertaking, once it is fixed by the clerk of the court prior to the issuance of the writ.

If the clerk could have been aware that solvent credits, aggregating the full amount sued for, due and owing to the defendants, were about to be attached and held for three years, possibly, while awaiting final disposition upon a crowded calendar, there can be little doubt that he would have required a very different undertaking. The clerk cannot be said to have found judicially upon the amount of security which was really required, for it does not appear that the circumstances as at present seen, now that the attachment has been levied, were brought to his attention when fixing the amount of the undertaking; and if the security as originally required by the clerk proves now to be insufficient, why cannot the superior court, looking to the interests and rights of both plaintiff and defendants, make it sufficient? The clerk, who is a ministerial officer, is an arm of the court and an essential constituent thereof (In re Durant, 60 Vt. 176, 12 Atl. 650), and when fixing the amount of the undertaking before issuing the writ he is but acting as a constitutent part of the court. He is not exercising jurisdiction as a separate and independent tribunal. It is true that, in determining the amount of the undertaking which should be required of a plaintiff, the clerk is exercising a judicial or a quasi judicial function, but his act and judgment is not the act or judgment of an independent judicial entity; and if subsequent developments, arising after the levy of the writ, show that the amount of the undertaking required by the clerk before issuing the writ is insufficient to indemnify the defendant for the costs which may be awarded him and the damages which he may sustain by reason of the attachment, why may not the court, whose ministerial officer prescribed the amount of the undertaking in the first instance, make an order, after a hearing, increasing the amount, upon a showing that the security is inadequate?

The security to be given by a plaintiff who obtains a writ of attachment is intended to be an indemnity to the defendant in the action against his costs and damages. The affidavit on attachment, which is intended to prevent the wrongful suing out of the writ, is a restraint upon the conscience of the plaintiff, and the undertaking imposes an additional restraint by fixing a definite liability upon the plaintiff and his sureties as indemnity to the defendant against loss from the wrongful and vexatious use of the process. Ex parte Damon, 103 Ala. 477, 15 South. 862. But if, through an error of judgment or a mistake of fact, the clerk has failed to require an undertaking in an adequate amount, the defendant may have no real protection against loss from the wrongful or vexatious use of the writ unless the court has the right and the power to require additional security.

We think the power of the court to require an increase in the amount of the undertaking is incidental to the provisional remedy of attachment. It is true that in some jurisdictions this power is expressly conferred by statute, but it exists without such express statutory authorization. Thus, in Manda v. Etienne, 13 App. Div. 237, 43 N. Y. Supp. 194—a case involving the jurisdiction of the Special Term to require the plaintiff in an action to give an additional undertaking on attachment—it was said:

"The plaintiff's main contention is that the Special Term 'was wholly without jurisdiction, power, or authority to make' the order in question. He seems to overlook section 682 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where this power is expressly conferred. It is a power which is frequently exercised. Before it was thus expressly conferred, it was held to be an incident to the regulation and conduct of provisional remedies. Whitney v. Deniston, 2 Thomp. & C. 471." (Italics ours.)

And in the case thus referred to (Whitney v. Deniston, 2 Thomp. & C. [N. Y.] 471) we find this language:

"The court has general power to discharge attachments the same as all other provisional remedies. Code, § 241. It may be exercised for all proper reasons, including those where, for any cause, the plaintiff's proceedings are in any respect defective, and they certainly are so where the amount of the undertaking is insufficient to indemnify the defendant for the costs which may be awarded to him and the damages he may sustain by reason of the attachment. Code, § 230. It is the intention of the law that the defendant shall have that indemnity where his property is attached; and if the undertaking given, when the attachment is obtained is insufficient for that purpose, the law cannot be properly administered without requiring an adequate increase in the amount to be made. The power is incidental to all the provisional remedies provided by the Code, and its existence is in substance provided for in the authority which the court has for supplying omissions in any proceeding." (Italics ours.)

In Ex parte Damon, supra, it is said that the undertaking on attachment—

"must be regarded as defective, when it is insufficient in security, as well as when it is lacking in some particular, which, while it does not render it absolutely void, does render it an imperfect obligation for the purposes intended. 1 Wade on Attachment, §§ 114, 115, 288; Bumberger v. Gerson, 24 Fed. 257. It is the right, then, of the defendant to have the attachment dissolved whenever, at any stage of the cause, the bond shall become defective or insufficient, as an indemnity, on account of the insolvency of its securities; but the plaintiff should be accorded the right of maintaining his cause by repairing a defect brought about by no fault of his."

See, also, Gapen v. Stephenson, 18 Kan. 140, and Bumberger v. Gerson (C. C.) 24 Fed. 257.

Our conclusion is that the superior court is not without jurisdiction to hear and determine the application for an increase in the amount of the undertaking on attachment.

The alternative writ of prohibition is discharged, and the application for a peremptory writ of prohibition is denied.

GALLAGHER v. BOYLE, City and County Auditor. (Civ. 4084.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 19, 1922.)

Courts ⟸57(1)—Superior court not authorized to order persons not official reporters to make transcripts of testimony in police court.

An order made by the superior court to a city auditor to issue a warrant for services by one not the official reporter, in making a transcript of the testimony in a criminal case in the police court, was void; Code Civ. Proc. § 128, subds. 4, 5, empowering the superior court to compel obedience to its orders, not authorizing such an order, and sections 274, 274a, and 274b, authorizing shorthand notes, referring solely to superior court proceedings and that court's official reporters.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by John F. Gallagher against Thomas Boyle, Auditor of the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment denying the application, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Flynn, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, denying the application of the appellant for a writ of mandate by which he was seeking to compel the respondent, as auditor of said municipality, to issue his warrant upon its treasury for the payment to appellant of the sum of $66 claimed by him to be due for the transcription of certain testimony taken by him as a police court reporter at the preliminary examination of one Bernardino Caterini in the police court of said city and county upon a charge of felony, upon which he was discharged from custody by the judge of said police court. The transcription of said testimony was made upon an order of the superior court of said city and county entered in another criminal case, to which said Caterini does not appear to have been a party. The purpose for which such transcription was made does not appear, but the appellant attempts to justify the order for its transcription under subdivisions 4 and 5 of section 128 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which read as follows:

The superior court shall have power—

"4. To compel obedience to its judgments, orders, and process, and to the orders of a judge out of court, in an action or proceeding pending therein;

"5. To control in furtherance of justice, the conduct of its ministerial officers, and of all other persons in any manner connected with a judicial proceeding before it, in every matter appertaining thereto."

We find nothing, however, in either of these subdivisions of said section of the Code which would give a semblance of authority to the superior court to make the order in question. The appellant was not the official reporter of said superior court, nor did the case of Caterini ever reach that tribunal. The sections of the Code of Civil Procedure which confer authority upon superior courts or the judges thereof to have shorthand notes of proceedings in said courts taken and transcribed, and which render the expense of so doing a charge against the public treasury payable out of its general fund, are sections 274, 274a, and 274b of said Code. These have reference solely to proceedings in said courts and to the official reporters thereof.

Neither by these nor by any other sections of the Code of Civil Procedure is any authority conferred upon judges of the superior courts to order persons not official reporters of said courts to make transcriptions of the testimony taken in other courts and in cases other than those pending in the superior court and to create a charge therefor upon the public treasury. In the absence of such statutory authority for the making of such orders, we are satisfied that the power to make the same does not exist, and hence that the making of the transcriptions and copies thereof under a void order could not be made the basis of a valid claim against the public treasury. The auditor was therefore justified in refusing to draw his warrant for the payment of such claim.

Judgment affirmed.

CARR v. INTERNATIONAL INDEMNITY CO. (Civ. 3840.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 25, 1922.)

1. Insurance ⟸424 — Exception of glazing damage in plate glass window policy held inapplicable to break after completion of glazing.

Clause in policy against breakage of plate glass in window, excepting insurer from liability for damage by glazing, is inapplicable to a break after the work of glazing had been completed.

2. Insurance ⟸424—Under exception in plate glass window policy, break must have been caused by unworkmanlike manner of installing.

For clause in plate glass window policy, excepting from insurer's liability any damage "occurring before the glass is completely glazed in a workmanlike manner," to avail insurer, the break, occurring after the glazing had been completed, must have been caused by unworkmanklike manner of installing the glass.

3. Insurance ⟸646(6)—Insurer held to have burden of showing loss within exception to liability.

On insured making prima facie showing of loss within the terms of the policy, insurer has burden of showing it was within some exception to liability.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1) — Determination of facts on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Trial court's determination, on conflicting evidence, of cause of damage not being within insurance policy's exception to liability, is final.

5. Trial ⟸395(3)—Form of general findings held sufficient.

Findings in form that all the allegations of the complaint are true, and that all denials and allegations of the answer are untrue, are sufficient to determine the material issues.

6. Trial ⟸377(2)—Case may be opened for further evidence after minute order for judgment.

The trial court has discretion at any time before decision is rendered to reopen case for further evidence; and, where findings of fact are required, a mere minute order directing judgment does not constitute a decision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by J. E. Carr against the International Indemnity Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Donald Barker and William H. Neblett, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover upon a policy of insurance which covered loss by breakage of plate glass in a store front. Judgment was in plaintiff's favor, and the defendant has appealed.

The insurance, as expressed in the policy, provided against "loss by breakage from accidental causes beyond the assured's control." The policy contained clauses exempting the insurer from liability for—

"(4) Any loss or damage caused by the glazing of any light of glass or by the removal of any light of glass from its frame or caused by the repairing of any frame; (5) any loss or damage occurring before the glass is completely glazed in a workmanlike manner."

Appellant's main contention that the evidence shows that breakage of the glass was caused by the unworkmanlike manner in which the same was set. It was shown in evidence that plaintiff, in December, 1919, owned a newly constructed store building, in which a plate glass front was then being installed. He notified his agent to have the glass covered by insurance, and the policy was issued, effective as at noon on the 30th day of December, 1919. The final work of setting the glass was completed on Monday, the 29th of December. The contractor in charge of the special matter of setting the glass and fastening it in place testified that there was nothing wrong with the glass on Monday, the 29th, after the work of attaching the fastenings or "stops" had been completed; that on Tuesday it was not broken, but that at about 10 o'clock on Wednesday, December 31st, he observed one of the curved plates, and saw that it was cracked, the crack extending for 16 or 18 inches. He further testified as follows:

"The glass was not broken because of the improper manner in which it was set. I cannot say what caused the break in the glass; or, in other words, I do not know."

The mechanic who actually put in the "stops," or final retaining supports of the glass, testified that he observed the general condition of the glass at the time he put in the "stops," and said:

"When I completed my work, everything was all right; there was no break at that time."

This witness testified that he had had long experience in installing glass; that he was an adept in work of that character. Two other witnesses who were employed about the building testified that, after the completion of the work of setting the glass and affixing the supports, they saw no breaks in it. Upon cross-examination of the architect of the building, that witness testified as follows:

"In my opinion, the break in this glass, I rather think, was produced by unequal expansion of the bars. That might have been some undue stress at one place."

This witness testified that, when the "bars" (referring to the supports holding the glass) are in place, the glass would be permanently fixed. One witness, called on behalf of the defendant, testified that, assuming no exterior violence to have been applied, the damage might have resulted by reason of the retaining strips or "stops" being too tight. He testified that, if such was the case, it would show that the glazing job was not properly done. Another witness for the defendant, after testifying that he had heard a description of the manner in which the work of installing the glass had been done, said:

"Based upon my experience, and assuming that this glass was not broken by exterior force, direct force, applied, I would be unable to say what was the cause of its breaking. The break might be caused from various reasons."

There was testimony, also, that there were no marks upon the glass showing the application of exterior force; but it was not shown but that exterior force might have been applied, and caused the break, without leaving any mark other than the break itself.

[1-4] As the work of glazing had been completely finished before the break occurred, plainly the first excepting clause quoted (4) would have no application. As to the second excepting clause, in order to relieve the defendant it must have appeared that the break was caused by reason of the unworkmanlike manner in which the glass was installed. Prima facie there was ample evidence to show that the work was properly done, and the testimony introduced on behalf of the defendant can at best be said to have produced a conflict in the evidence. Moreover, after the plaintiff had proved damage within the terms of the policy, the burden rested with the defendant to show that such loss was produced through some excepted cause. "Where proof is made of a loss apparently within a policy, the burden is on the insurer to prove that the loss occurred from a cause for which it is not liable." 14 R. C. L. p. 1437, par. 599; Blasingame v. Home Insurance Co. et al., 75 Cal. 633, 17 Pac. 925; Dennis v. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 84 Cal. 570, 24 Pac. 120. A determination of the facts, under a state of conflicting evidence, would, of course, rest with the trial judge, whose decision upon that matter would be final.

[5] Another contention of appellant is that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment. The court made general findings "that all the allegations of the complaint herein are true," and "that all denials and allegations of the answer herein, including the amendments thereto, are untrue." Findings in this form have been held to sufficiently determine material issues in a cause. Fritz v. Mills, 170 Cal. 449, 150 Pac. 375; Moore v. Clear Lake Water Works, 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. 816; County of Sutter v. McGriff, 130 Cal. 124, 62 Pac. 412.

[6] Appellant points to one other alleged error: It is claimed that the court had no jurisdiction to reopen the case for further evidence after a minute order had been made directing judgment for the defendant. The record shows that upon the first hearing evidence was introduced and the cause submitted to the court, and that the judge ordered judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff immediately gave notice of a motion to set aside that order (which latter was expressed only in the minutes of the court), assigning various grounds therefor. At the hearing of this motion the court refused to enter judgment for the plaintiff, which was asked for, but set the case down for the hearing of further evidence. It came on at the time so fixed, and certain amendments were made to the answer, and further pertinent evidence heard. It hardly needs citation of authorities to support the statement that the trial judge had discretion at any time, before decision was rendered, to order further hearing in a cause and require additional testimony to be given. A minute order, where findings of fact are required to be made, as in this case, does not constitute a judgment or decision, to vacate which a motion for a new trial must be made. Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 109 Pac. 91.

FEENEY v. STANDARD OIL CO. (PENNSYLVANIA FIRE INS. CO. OF PHILADELPHIA, PA., Intervener). (Civ. 2354.)

1. Master and servant ⊂=302(6)—Master not liable for servant's negligence in lighting cigarette.

Where defendant's servant, delivering gasoline to plaintiff's premises, was not negligent in spilling the gasoline, his act in dropping a lighted match used in lighting a cigarette into the gasoline was not an act for which defendant was liable, under Civ. Code, §§ 2338, 2339, relative to a principal's liability for the negligence of his agent, though defendant had instructed him not to smoke while delivering gasoline.

2. Master and servant ⊂=305—Violation of instructions no defense to action for servant's negligence.

An agent's violation of instructions as to the manner of transacting any business is no defense in a third person's action against the principal for the agent's negligence.

3. Pleading ⊂=398—Variance held not to have misled defendant to his prejudice.

Where the only negligence alleged was in spilling gasoline and dropping a lighted match into it, but there was evidence that defendant's driver, who spilled the gasoline, did nothing to clean it up, and the case was tried as if this was in issue, the variance did not mislead defendant to its prejudice, within Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470, providing that, when a variance has not actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice, it is not deemed material, etc.

4. Explosives ⊂=8—Express finding of negligence in not removing spilled gasoline held not necessary to support judgment.

The danger arising from leaving 2½ gallons of gasoline on the cement floor of a garage in the Sacramento valley, where it was spilled, in the middle of an afternoon in August, would be so apparent to a man of capacity and prudence that no express finding of negligence is required to support a judgment.

5. Explosives ⊂=8—That proprietor of garage was negligent in not removing spilled gasoline does not necessarily relieve seller of negligence in delivery.

That the proprietor of a garage knew defendant's driver spilled gasoline, which he was delivering, and was guilty of negligence in not promptly removing it, does not necessarily relieve defendant from the charge of negligence in not removing it.

6. Explosives ⊂=8 — Intervening independent act of negligence held not to defeat liability.

Where defendant's driver spilled gasoline, which he was delivering, his independent act of negligence in dropping a lighted match, used by him to light a cigarette, did not relieve defendant from the consequences of his negligent failure as its agent to remove the gasoline spilled.

7. Explosives ⊂=8 — Seller spilling gasoline owed duty of reasonable effort to regain control.

A seller of gasoline, spilling it when delivering it to the buyer's garage, owed the duty of making a reasonable effort to regain control of the gasoline in order to prevent injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by P. W. Feeney against the Standard Oil Company, in which the Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company of Philadelphia, Pa., intervened. From a judgment for intervener, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, and Brown & Albery, of Colusa, for appellant.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco (George Herrington, of San Francisco, of counsel), for intervener.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff was the proprietor of a garage conducted by him in a building which he occupied under a lease from the owner thereof. The building was destroyed by a fire alleged to have been negligently caused by the defendant. Plaintiff sued as assignee of the owner to recover damages suffered by the destruction of the building. The Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company, having insured the building against loss by fire, paid the owner the sum for which it was insured and intervened in the action. The intervener was given judgment for the sum so paid, and this appeal is from the judgment so rendered.

The facts are simple and undisputed. The only question presented by the appeal is whether the fire was caused by negligence of the defendant. The court found:

"That on the 23d day of August, 1917, plaintiff ordered certain quantities of gasoline from defendant, and on said last-mentioned date defendant, by its agent, McDonald, delivered a quantity of gasoline to plaintiff at the above-mentioned building owned by said Steel. Plaintiff had a tank inside the said building, and it was necessary for the said McDonald to draw the gasoline from the delivery wagon tank, in which he had brought the gasoline to the said building, and carry the same in buckets to the tank in said building. That in order to pour the gasoline into the said tank it was necessary for the said McDonald to be elevated to some extent, and a box had been provided by plaintiff, upon which the said McDonald stood when pouring the gasoline into the said tank. This box was not strong, and before the delivery of gasoline was completed on said day, and while the said McDonald was upon the said box with some buckets of gasoline, the said box broke, and at that time and because of that accident a large quantity of gasoline was spilled upon the cement floor of the said building above mentioned. McDonald did nothing in the way of removing the gasoline spilled as before mentioned, or preventing it from catching fire. After completing delivery of the gasoline, McDonald attempted to have his delivery tags approved by the plaintiff; but plaintiff put him off for a short time upon the claim that he (plaintiff) was busy at that particular moment. McDonald waited for plaintiff some 10 or 15 minutes, during which time he engaged in some conversation as to going swimming with some young men about the said building, and while so waiting lighted a cigarette and carelessly and negligently dropped a match lighted for said purpose on the floor and into the gasoline that had been spilled as aforesaid. The said gasoline caught fire from said match, and as the result thereof the said building belonging to the said Edward L. Steel was destroyed by fire."

Neither party contends that the foregoing findings are not supported by the evidence. There appears to be no evidence supporting the finding that the plaintiff provided the box on which McDonald stood at the time the gasoline was spilled, but that fact is immaterial, since there is no finding of negligence in that connection on the part of either McDonald or plaintiff. The evidence shows that the fire occurred about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and that the quantity of gasoline spilled was from 2½ to 3 gallons.

[1, 2] Since the court did not find that the gasoline was negligently spilled, the judgment must have been grounded upon McDonald's negligence in igniting the gasoline, or his failure to promptly remove it from the cement floor of the garage. Section 2338 of the Civil Code provides:

"A principal is responsible to third persons for the negligence of his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, including wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business."

Section 2339 provides:

"A principal is responsible, for no other wrongs committed by his agent than those mentioned in the last section, unless he has authorized or ratified them, even though they are committed while the agent is engaged in his service."

Under the rule thus declared it seems clear that the defendant is not responsible for McDonald's negligent act in dropping the lighted match into the gasoline. The lighting of the cigarette was no part of the transaction of the defendant's business. It was an independent act for McDonald's personal enjoyment. It occurred during the time of his transaction of the defendant's business, but was no part thereof and was not in the course of his employment. The fact that defendant had instructed McDonald not to smoke while delivering gasoline does not enter into the problem. An agent's violation of instructions as to the manner of transacting any business is no defense in an action by a third person against the principal for negligence of the agent. Was the failure of McDonald to remove the spilled gasoline actionable negligence for which defendant is responsible? Appellant contends that the finding as to such failure is insufficient to support the judgment on the issue of negligence on three grounds: (1) That such failure was not alleged in the complaint in intervention; (2) that the court did not find that the omission to remove the gasoline constituted negligence; (3) that no duty rested upon defendant to remove it.

[3] The only negligence alleged was that of spilling the gasoline and igniting it. Two witnesses testified without objection, in answer to direct questions on the subject, that McDonald did nothing "to clean it up, or mop it up." In cross-examination of such witnesses, appellant proved that no one else removed the gasoline from the floor. From the foregoing it appears that the case was tried upon the theory that McDonald's failure to remove the spilled gasoline was in issue. Had defendant objected to such testimony at the trial, the court probably would have permitted intervener to amend by alleging such failure.

"No variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. Whenever it appears that a party has been so misled, the court may order the pleading to be amended, upon such terms as may be just." Code Civ. Proc. § 469.

"Where the variance is not material, as provided in the last section, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, or may order an immediate amendment, without costs." Code Civ. Proc. § 470.

It cannot be said that the defendant was misled to its prejudice by the variance under consideration.

[4] The omission to find in express terms that the defendant's failure to remove the gasoline from the garage floor constituted negligence is not fatal. The highly inflammable and volatile qualities of gasoline are well known. That the gas generated therefrom is a dangerous explosive is a matter of common knowledge. The danger arising from leaving 2½ gallons of gasoline spread out over the cement floor of a garage in the Sacramento valley in the middle of an afternoon in August would be apparent to a man of ordinary capacity and prudence. The necessity of its prompt and careful removal to avoid probable injury is plain. The probability of ignition by a spark from an automobile engine, a carelessly lighted match, or the fire of a cigar or cigarette, is a matter of common experience. The danger to be apprehended was well within the range of reasonable foresight. The facts and circumstances were such that no inference but that of negligence can be logically drawn from the failure to remove the gasoline which had been accidentally spilled. Under such state of facts an express finding of negligence is not required. Cooley v. Brunswig Drug Co., 30 Cal. App. 58, 157 Pac. 13; Catlin v. Union Oil Co., 31 Cal. App. 597, 161 Pac. 29; Van Praag v. Gale, 107 Cal. 438, 40 Pac. 555; Jacobson v. Northwestern Pac. R. R. Co., 175 Cal. 468, 166 Pac. 3; Grossetti v. Sweasey, 176 Cal. 793, 169 Pac. 687.

[5-7] The next question is whether it was the duty of defendant to remove the spilled gasoline. The evidence shows that during the time of the delivery of the gasoline, and until the fire started, the proprietor of the garage was working on an automobile in some part of the garage not definitely located by the evidence in the record. The exact location seems to have been made clear to the trial court by means of a diagram referred to by the witnesses, but this diagram was not included in the record on appeal. It does not appear from the evidence whether the proprietor knew, prior to the fire, that any gasoline had been spilled. If it be assumed, however, that the proprietor had such knowledge, and that he was guilty of negligence in not promptly removing it, it does not necessarily follow that the defendant was not also negligent. Nor would McDonald's independent act of negligence in dropping the lighted match relieve the defendant from the consequences of his negligent failure, as its agent, to remove the gasoline.

"If I am guilty of negligence in leaving anything dangerous in a place where I know it to be extremely probable that some other person will unjustifiably set it in motion to the injury of a third, and if that injury should be so brought about, I presume that the sufferer might have redress by action against both or either of the two, but unquestionably against the first." Lynch v. Nurdin, 12 Q. B. (A. & E. [N. S.]) 29.

Having accidentally lost possession of a dangerous material, of which it had voluntarily taken charge, the defendant owed the duty to others of making reasonable effort to regain control, in order to prevent injury. If a person engaged in the transportation of dynamite should knowingly leave a part thereof, accidentally dropped, in a place where it probably would be exploded through accident or the negligence of others, he certainly would be responsible, in the event of an explosion thereof, for injury inflicted on persons who were without fault. The duty of safely keeping the dangerous material would be continuous from the time it was received until it was safely delivered, a duty which could not be escaped by knowingly abandoning the explosive after the accidental loss of its possession. In Pittsburgh, etc., Ry. Co. v. Shields, 47 Ohio St. 387, 24 N. E. 658, 8 L. R. A. 464, 21 Am. St. Rep. 840, the employees of the defendant, wantonly and without any necessity therefor, and contrary to the rules of the company, placed some torpedoes in front of the wheels of the caboose in which some women were riding, with the intention to frighten them. When the train moved forward, one of the torpedoes failed to explode, and it was later picked by some children, one of whom was injured by its explosion. The court said:

"The duty intrusted by the railway company to the conductor in regard to these torpedoes was, not only to use them as signals with the requisite care and caution, but to observe like care and caution in the custody of them, when not in use. The servant's custody of them, when not in use, was as much a part of his employment as was the use of them as signals when required. In taking them from the place where they were carried when not in use, and, in mere caprice, placing them on the track for the purpose of frightening the ladies, he was not, it is true, within his employment as to the use of them; but in so doing he violated the duties connected with his employment as the custodian of them, and thereby made his master liable for the consequences of his neglect, in the same manner and to the same extent as if it had been done by the company itself. * * * Suppose a servant, with others under his control, employed with a construction train. * * * He may for a time quit his employment, and with his men go off on affairs of his own. Whilst thus out of the master's employment, he may build a fire, which, through his negligence, may consume the property of another, and in the meantime loss of life and property may result from a collision with the train negligently left standing on the track. Now, whilst, as has been held, the master would not be liable for the loss resulting from the fire, because the act was done outside the servant's employment, * * * yet it is equally certain that for the loss occasioned by the servant's negligence in leaving the train on the track the master would be liable in damages, for the plain reason that, in abandoning the custody of the train, he was guilty of negligence in the employment of the master, whilst in building the fire he was not."

See, also, Wells v. Gallagher, 144 Ala. 363, 39 South. 747, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 759, 113 Am. St. Rep. 50. While the extent of injury likely to result from the negligent control of other explosives may be greater, the probability of injury from gasoline left under the circumstances here disclosed is not less than is usual in the case of higher explosives, and the point of law under discussion has to do with the probability rather than the extent of injury. That the same rules apply to the safe-keeping of gasoline as to that of other explosives is illustrated by the following cases: Childs v. Standard Oil Co., 149 Minn. 166, 182 N. W. 1000; Newton v. Texas Co., 180 N. C. 561, 105 S. E. 433; Leahy v. Standard Oil Co., 220 Mass. 90, 107 N. E. 458; Id., 224 Mass. 352, 112 N. E. 950; Watson v. Kentucky & Indiana Bridge & R.

Co., 137 Ky. 619, 126 S. W. 146, 129 S. W. 341. It seems clear that the findings support the judgment.

PEOPLE v. PAULI. (Cr. 1047.)

1. Witnesses ⟸37(4)—Striking out evidence of character witnesses, based on limited personal acquaintance held not error.

Where, in a prosecution for forgery, it developed that the evidence of character witnesses was based on personal contact with defendant, who was a stranger in each community in which the witnesses resided, and had not lived long enough in either community to have a general reputation therein, there was no error in excluding the evidence.

2. Criminal law ⟸379—That character or reputation of a person has not been discussed is cogent evidence of good character and reputation.

That the character or reputation of defendant in the community in which he resides has not been discussed or questioned is cogent evidence of good character and reputation, but the application of this rule presupposes a sufficient period of residence and extent of acquaintanceship in the community for the person's character to have become known.

3. Criminal law ⟸379—Stranger in a community has not such a good reputation to which any one may testify.

Defendant, a stranger in a community, working for a single employer therein for a few months, going about little, and forming no associations, does not have a general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity therein to which any one can testify.

4. Criminal law ⟸1170(1)—Excluding evidence of good reputation held not prejudicial, where accused testified to a prior conviction.

The exclusion of evidence of good reputation of defendant in a prosecution for forgery was not prejudicial, where defendant later testified that he had served a term in the penitentiary under an assumed name on plea of guilty of the crime of forgery.

5. Criminal law ⟸834(4)—Instruction that the information is merely a charge, and cannot be considered in determining guilt, held properly modified.

In a prosecution for forgery, an instruction that the information is merely a charge brought against defendant, and as such can have no more consideration in determining whether defendant is guilty than if such information had not been filed or charge made, and defendant is to be accorded every presumption of innocence in his favor, held properly modified.

6. Forgery ⟸5—Instruction that, though defendant forged the check, if he did not utter it with intent to defraud, he should be acquitted, held properly refused.

Under Pen. Code, § 470, the making, forging, or uttering of a false check constitutes a crime; hence an instruction that, though defendant did make and forge the check, if he did not utter, publish, and pass the check with the intent to defraud the particular person named, he should be acquitted, was properly refused.

7. Indictment and information ⟸149—Instruction attacking information on ground of uncertainty, being in nature of a demurrer, comes too late.

In a prosecution for forgery, an instruction that the information was defective in failing to sufficiently charge defendant with having made and forged the check in question with intent to defraud, which in substance was a demurrer to the information, was properly refused, where no demurrer was interposed by defendant on his arraignment.

8. Criminal law ⟸829(1)—No error to refuse instructions covered by given instructions.

No error can be predicated on the refusal to give instructions which are substantially covered by the instructions given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

George H. Pauli was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Peter F. Morettini, of San Jose, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. The defendant was charged in the information with the crime of making and uttering a forged check with intent to defraud. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment for the term provided by law. His appeal is from the judgment of conviction.

[1-4] The first contention which the appellant makes upon said appeal is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in granting the motion of the prosecution to strike out the testimony of two certain character witnesses who had testified to the good reputation of the defendant for truth, honesty, integrity and veracity. The record touching this contention shows the following state of facts:

The defendant called three witnesses to his good reputation—Manuel Picano, E. H. Crane, and Daniel B. Wade. The first of these witnesses, Picano, who was a life insurance agent and postmaster, and who also kept a general merchandise store in San Lorenzo, Cal., gave strong testimony as to defendant's good reputation while he was working in and about San Lorenzo from about April, 1920, to October, 1920, and his testimony was allowed to stand. The next witness, E. H. Crane, was an orchardist at San Lorenzo, for whom the defendant had worked from March to October, 1920, and who on direct examination, in response to the usual inquiries, stated that he knew the defendant's reputation in that community and that it was good. On cross-examination, however, it developed that his opinion on that subject was based wholly on his personal dealings with the defendant and the quality of his work with him; that the defendant was a stranger to him and to the community when he came to work for him; that he lived on his place, went out little, did not form any associations, and left the community when he had ceased to work for him. The witness further testified that he never heard his reputation discussed; never heard any one mention his name or refer to him in any way. The court upon this showing granted a motion to strike out the testimony of this witness. The next witness, Daniel B. Wade, also answered the usual inquiries upon direct examination by testifying that he knew the defendant's reputation and that it was good; but upon cross-examination it developed that the defendant had come, a stranger, to work for him on his ranch near Alviso, in the county of Santa Clara, in the fall of the year 1920, and had lived and worked on his place about two months, and that he had also worked for him at another time for a brief period; that he formed his opinion as to his good reputation wholly from the work he had done on the place, and that he never heard any one mention his name or talk about him or criticize him, and had never discussed his reputation with any one. The testimony of this witness was also stricken out on motion of the prosecution.

We perceive no error in the ruling of the trial court in striking out the testimony of these last two witnesses. It is, of course, a well-known rule regarding evidence of reputation that the fact that the character or reputation of a person in the community in which he resides has not been discussed or questioned is cogent evidence of the person's good character and good reputation. It was so held in People v. Adams, 137 Cal. 580, 70 Pac. 662, and the quite recent case of People v. Stennett (Cal. App.) 197 Pac. 372, and there can be no doubt that this is the general rule upon the subject. But the application of this rule presupposes a sufficient period of residence and extent of acquaintanceship, in the community from which such testimony is drawn, for the person's character to have become known, and for some sort of reputation thereof to have arisen. A stranger in the community, working for a single employer therein for a few months, going about little, and forming no associations, cannot be said to have a general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity therein to which any one can testify. The cross-examination of both of these witnesses developed precisely this state of facts concerning this defendant, and showed conclusively in each case the opinion of the witness was based upon his personal contact with the defendant, who was a stranger in each community, and had not lived long enough in either place to have a general or any reputation therein. It may be said in addition that the prosecution in this case made no attack upon the reputation or character of the defendant, and that, in addition to the presumption which attaches in every case, he had the affirmative testimony of one witness to his good reputation. It may be further said in this connection that the defendant took the witness stand in his own behalf and testified that he was an ex-convict, having served a term in Folsom under an assumed name upon his plea of guilty of the crime of forgery. It cannot, therefore, be said that the defendant was prejudicially affected by the rulings of the trial court upon the motion to strike out the testimony of these two witnesses, even if such rulings were conceded to be erroneous.

[5] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court was in error in refusing to give without modification the following instruction:

"You are instructed that the information is merely a charge brought against the defendant (and is not evidence in the case), and such a charge can have no more consideration with you in determining whether or not the defendant is guilty of the offense charged than if such information had not been filed or charge made; and in your deliberations you are to put this fact out of your minds, and are to accord to the defendant every presumption of innocence in his favor. Even if you find that the defendant did make and forge this check, but did not utter, publish, and pass said check with the intent then and there and thereby to defraud the particular person named in the information, then and in that event you must acquit the defendant, and your verdict must be not guilty."

The words in parentheses in the above instruction constituted the modifications made by the court, and the underlined portion thereof was the portion stricken out by the court. The abbreviated instruction, as thus modified, was given. The appellant contends that he was entitled to the whole instruction without modification or elision. We cannot sustain this contention. The instruction as requested embraced two distinct propositions, as to the first of which the court's modification in parentheses merely made the instruction state more tersely what the defendant had requested more diffusely.

[6] As to the second proposition, the portion of the instruction stricken out by the court was not sound in law. The defendant was charged in the information under section 470 of the Penal Code with the making, forging, and uttering of a false check. Either of said acts under said section constituted a crime, and hence the defendant's requested instruction to the jury to acquit the defendant if they should find that he made and forged said check, but did not utter the same, is unsound in law, and hence was properly stricken from said instruction by the trial court.

[7] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction requested by him, wherein he undertook to have the court charge the jury that the information was defective, in failing to sufficiently charge the defendant with having made and forged the check in question with intent to defraud. The instruction asked was in substance and effect a demurrer to the information upon the ground of uncertainty. No demurrer was interposed by the defendant upon his arraignment, and we think a demurrer upon this ground comes too late when it appears for the first time embodied in an instruction to the jury. Besides, we are satisfied from a reading of the information that it is not subject to the criticism which the defendant had aimed at it, and hence that the instruction was properly refused. A similar instruction directed to the same objection to the information was also properly refused by the court.

[8] As to the defendant's other instructions, which the court refused to give, we find that their substance is embodied in the instructions which the court gave to the jury, and for that reason the duplication of instructions already substantially given was properly refused.

Finding no error in this record, the judgment is affirmed.

I concur: TYLER, P. J.

2. Negligence ⊂⊃141(3)—Instruction that contributory negligence may be ignored because of any negligence of defendant erroneous.

Any instruction from which the jury might fairly infer that conduct of plaintiff which amounts to contributory negligence may become free from negligence because of any act of neglect on the part of defendant is contrary to the doctrine of contributory negligence, and is erroneous.

3. Evidence ⊂⊃14—That traffic upon highways is so great that driver of a vehicle must take into account the conduct of others is a matter of common knowledge.

It is common knowledge that the traffic upon our highways is so great, involving continual streams of powerful vehicles of many classes, proceeding at varying rates of speed and not bound to follow any particular track, that such thoroughfares have become places of danger, where one who is himself driving a motor vehicle and who fails to continually take into account the conduct of others and to anticipate their movements as far as possible is negligent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Polk McPherson against J. C. Walling and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Ernest Walling, of Fresno, and Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for appellants.

J. A. Chase, of Visalia, and Max B. Jamison, of Porterville, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. On May 28, 1920, the automobile driven by plaintiff and respondent collided with the stage of the defendant and appellant on a public highway in Tulare county. The respondent charges the appellant with negligence in that connection, and asks damages because of injuries to his automobile. The appellant, as a defense and by way of counterclaim, alleged contributory negligence on the part of the respondent. It appears that at the time of the collision smoke of a varying density, sometimes so thick that witnesses testified an object could not be seen more than 10 feet ahead, covered the highway for a considerable distance. A trial by jury was had and verdict and judgment were rendered for the plaintiff and respondent. This appeal is taken therefrom and from the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

[1] At the request of plaintiff the court gave the following instruction:

"The reasonable care which is required of persons using the public highways must be measured by the conditions and circumstances found to exist at the time and place in question. Each may rightfully expect that the other will, at the proper time, discharge his proper duties toward the other. He may not rely wholly on the care of others, nor on that account neglect to use the precaution which the

McPHERSON v. WALLING et al. (Civ. 3587.)

1. Trial ⊂⊃253(9)—Instruction in action for injury to automobile by collision held erroneous as ignoring evidence of contributory negligence.

In an action for injuries to an automobile caused by a collision with a stage on a highway, an instruction as to the reasonable care which is required of persons using the public highways held erroneous, as ignoring evidence showing that plaintiff had violated the Motor Vehicle Act.

particular situation demands of him. But he frequently must, to some extent, depend upon others in such situation, and his conduct must be considered in view of the facts determining whether or not there was negligence. His care, or want of care, in such matters is a matter to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time and place in question."

We think the giving of this instruction constitutes reversible error. The rule stated in the second sentence and to which recurrence is made in the fourth would disregard the doctrine of contributory negligence. The third sentence does not cure the vice of the instruction taken as a whole. We now proceed to a fuller discussion of these propositions.

By the second sentence of the instruction the jury were told that the plaintiff had the right to expect that the defendant would at the proper time discharge his proper duties toward him, the plaintiff. This statement, standing alone, is not distinguishable from similar instructions which have been held erroneous in other cases. In Hutson v. So. Cal. Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 701, 89 Pac. 1093, the following statement and other language to the same effect in an instruction was held to be error:

"The plaintiffs and each of them were authorized to assume that the men in charge of the train would approach the crossing with due care."

Thompson v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., 31 Cal. App. 567, 161 Pac. 21, is another case in which the same ruling was applied to a similar instruction.

It is true that the opinion in the Hutson Case stressed the idea that a railroad crossing is inherently a place of danger. This fact is emphasized as a reason for holding that such an instruction, conveying as it does the suggestion that a traveler may have the right to omit some degree of care in approaching a railroad crossing in reliance upon the presumption that another will perform his full legal duties, is erroneous. But the opinion also states that—

"Such a rule would abrogate the doctrine of contributory negligence in all such cases."

In the railroad crossing cases and also the Zarzana Case, 180 Cal. 32, 179 Pac. 203, 15 A. L. R. 401, the only claim of negligence on the part of the plaintiff consisted in the assertion that he did not anticipate the negligence of the defendant. In the instant case the error in giving the instruction in question is more apparent and prejudicial to the defendant because there was substantial evidence before the jury that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence by various violations of the Motor Vehicle Law (St. 1915, p. 397, as amended by St. 1917, p. 382).

Where no question exists as to the lawfulness of the plaintiff's acts, it may be proper to instruct the jury that:

"The general rule is that every person has a right to presume that every other person will perform his duty and obey the law, and in the absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise it is not negligence to assume that he is not exposed to danger which can come to him only from violation of law or duty by such other person" (29 Cyc. 516).

—but no authority has been called to our attention, and we apprehend none can be found, where such a proposition has been approved in a case where the lawfulness of the acts of plaintiff were themselves in question and an issue existed as to whether or not such unlawful acts were the proximate cause of the injury. Medlin v. Spazier, 23 Cal. App. 245, 137 Pac. 1078, was a case where the above quotation from Cyc. was cited with approval. It aptly illustrates the type of a case where such a principle of law applies. There the plaintiff was alighting from a car within a zone where the defendant was prohibited by law to run his auto. It was held that the plaintiff, while in this zone, was not negligent in failing to look up and down the street to make sure that drivers of vehicles were not operating the same contrary to law. But in the instant case there was substantial evidence to support the plea of contributory negligence by showing that the plaintiff was himself on the wrong side of the road, was exceeding the speed allowed by the Motor Vehicle Act under the circumstances, and was otherwise transgressing the law, and that such transgressions contributed proximately to the collision. To inform the jury that the plaintiff, acting as he did, might rightfully expect that the defendant would discharge his duty at the proper time without distinguishing between that conduct of the plaintiff which was lawful and that which the jury might find to be unlawful is prejudicially erroneous. It not only directs the jury to apply the rule to the plaintiff's conduct if they find that he himself violated no law, but it would require that they also view such conduct on his part as exceeding the speed limit in the same light and exclude it from consideration on the theory that he had a right to assume that defendant would not break the law. This rule would plainly abrogate the doctrine of contributory negligence.

The instruction before us does not leave it to the jury to decide from all the facts and circumstances in evidence whether or not the plaintiff had a right as a reasonable man to expect that the defendant would perform his legal duty. It forecloses it from deciding the question for itself.

[2] It is earnestly contended by respondent that the cases of Hutson v. So. Cal. Ry. Co. and Thompson v. S. P. Ry. Co., supra, are not applicable because they are both railroad cases in which the doctrine of "stop, look, and listen" is peculiarly applicable.

Of course, that doctrine applies to railway crossing cases only, but the law of contributory negligence is not limited to any class of actions ex delicto. The criticisms of the instructions in these cases, which were similar to that part of the one here in question, were not based alone upon the proposition that especial care was required because the plaintiff in each case was passing over a railway crossing, but upon the broader objection that the principle therein enunciated was squarely opposed to the doctrine of contributory negligence. As our court has well elucidated the matter in Antonian v. S. P. Co., 9 Cal. App. 718, 100 Pac. 877, a traveler approaching a railway crossing is only required to use the care of an ordinarily prudent man; the highest degree of care is not demanded. Ordinary prudence, however, may require, and in such cases does make necessary, cautious conduct such as looking, listening, and sometimes stopping. In requiring such acts of prudence, however, no different principle of law is applied, and no higher degree of care required than in other cases involving the issue of negligence. The difference is wholly one of fact. As a matter of law it is of no moment whether the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff be his failure to stop, look, and listen before crossing the railway, or to observe the inhibition of the Motor Vehicle Act against traveling at an excessive rate of speed, or upon the wrong side of the road or what not. The essential object of inquiry is, Was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence? If so, he cannot recover. Any instruction from which the jury might fairly infer that conduct of the plaintiff which amounts to contributory negligence may become free from negligence because of any act of neglect on the part of defendant is contrary to the doctrine of contributory negligence, and for that reason cannot be upheld. In cases where the plaintiff has been injured while passing over a railroad crossing it has been held that he was bound to stop, look, and listen for his own protection, because a railroad crossing is in itself a place of danger. Common experience and prudence requires such precautions upon his part. In the Hutson Case it is said that there are instances where as a matter of law it is negligence not to anticipate the negligence of others, and that the one then before the court was such case.

[3] In the case of Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., supra, the rule which requires one to anticipate the presence of others having equal rights with oneself is applied to the driver of a motor vehicle upon the public highways. It is common knowledge that the traffic upon our highways is so great, involving as it does continual streams of powerful vehicles of many classes, proceeding at varying rates of speed and not bound to follow any particular track, that such thoroughfares have become places of danger, where one who is himself driving a motor vehicle and who fails to continually take into account the conduct of others and to anticipate their movements as far as possible is negligent. Such anticipation is demanded without regard to the Motor Vehicle Act. Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., supra. At least one who is himself violating that act must then proceed with such caution as to avoid another vehicle whether its driver discharge its duty or not. If he fails to do so and is injured through a collision and his own negligent violation of the law is a proximate contributing cause, he cannot recover; his contributory negligence will bar his right of action; under such circumstances he had no right to assume that the other driver would not be negligent and would discharge his duty. But our Motor Vehicle Act expressly provides:

"Any person operating, or driving a motor or other vehicle on the public highway shall operate or drive the same in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, and no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle * * * on a public highway at such a rate of speed as to endanger the life or limb of any person or safety of any property." Section 22.

If the law were as respondent contends, it would constitute a modification of this statute, which clearly requires the driver to operate his motor vehicle in a "careful and prudent manner." Other provisions of the same statute regulate with greater definiteness the rate of speed, the portion of the highway in which each driver may lawfully proceed, and other details. These mandates are nowhere conditioned that one may lawfully disregard them upon the expectation that others will take heed and discharge their full duty.

Let us now proceed to a further examination of the entire instruction to determine whether or not, regardless of the erroneous statements contained in it, it can be construed as having, in its entirety, contained a correct and reasonably clear statement of the law. The first and last sentences are themselves free from criticism, but have no tendency to qualify the erroneous character of the sentences whose objectionable features have been pointed out. But, after stating in effect that the plaintiff had the right to rely upon the assumption that the defendant would discharge his duty and conduct himself lawfully, the instruction goes on to say, "He may not rely wholly upon the care of others, nor on that account neglect to use the precaution which the particular situation demands of him." Respondent asserts that this sentence cured the error in the preceding one, assuming that such error existed. The two statments appear to be both confusing and contradictory. As to whether or not the jury would be misled depends upon the issues involved and the evidence before it. It appears without contradiction that just before the collision the plaintiff had entered an area where the air was filled with smoke. The statement in the instruction that the plaintiff on account of relying upon the care to be used by others may not "neglect to use the precaution which the particular situation demands of him" was probably intended to apply, and would have been understood as referring to the precaution which might reasonably be expected of the plaintiff on account of the existence of the smoke. If so understood, that part of the instruction would not modify the proposition previously stated to the effect that the plaintiff had a right to rely upon the defendant at the proper time performing his duties under the law. For example, regardless of the smoke, the plaintiff might proceed at an unlawful rate of speed, but keeping his machine under such control that he could stop upon another vehicle coming in sight before a collision would take place, providing the other vehicle was traveling at a lawful rate of speed. Nevertheless, if the plaintiff, proceeding in this negligent manner, and the defendant also was violating the law by exceeding the speed allowed, and a collision resulted which the jury found to be a proximate result of the plaintiff's unlawful conduct, it would be a case of contributory negligence, and the plaintiff would not under such circumstances have a right to rely upon the defendant discharging his proper duties at the proper time, so that the instruction would have been prejudicially erroneous. Again, the third sentence is contradictory of the second and fourth; at least the whole matter with which the instruction attempts to deal is left in a condition of uncertainty. But an extended consideration of this phase of the matter is unnecessary. The Hutson Case is so directly in point as to leave no room for argument. In that case the trial court in the first instance erroneously instructed that—

"The plaintiffs and each of them were authorized to assume that the men in charge of the train would approach the crossing with due care."

However, as is pointed out in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw, the court further informed the jury that—

"While travelers in a vehicle approaching a railroad crossing 'have a right to rely upon the presumption that railway employees engaged in running trains toward such crossing will use precautions to prevent collisions, yet that such travelers have no right, on that account, to relax in any way the vigilance required of them by law in such circumstances and at such a place. They are under the duty of both listening and looking, and of listening and looking at points and places and in such circumstances that the listening and looking will give them protection.'"

But the court held that even this statement was insufficient to remove the error in the incorrect portion of the charge. Yet the instruction last quoted is clearly more definite and comprehensive than is the sentence relied upon to cure the error in the instruction here under consideration.

It is easily conceivable that, but for the instruction in question, the jury might have found that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence. Consequently this error will require a new trial. It will be unnecessary to consider other grounds urged for reversal. The judgment is reversed.

McPHERSON v. WALLING et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. July 19, 1922.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Polk McPherson against J. C. Walling and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Ernest Walling, of Fresno, and Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for appellants.

J. A. Chase, of Visalia, and Max B. Jamison, of Porterville, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The issues involved in this appeal are identically the same as those in McPherson v. Walling, Civil No. 3587, 209 Pac. 209, decided this date. The records were presented on appeal in one transcript. The reasons given in granting a reversal in that case apply to this, its companion case.

The judgment is reversed.

WYSEUR v. DAVIS, Director General of Railroads. (Civ. 2445).

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 21, 1922.)

1. Railroads ⊂=307(6)—Notice of time of operation of gates must be given.

If the law requires crossing gates to be operated part of the day only, failure to operate them during the rest of the day is not negligence because travelers are presumed to know the law, but where the company voluntarily installs and operates gates during part only of each day, it owes the duty to give reasonable notice of the hours during which they will not be operated, and the open gates give the same assurance of safety to persons without knowledge of the limited operation as if there were no such limitation, in the absence of reasonable notice by signs or otherwise.

2. Appeal and error ⊂=930(4)—Presumed in support of judgment for plaintiff that jury found issue submitted against defendant.

Where at defendant's request the court charged that it was for the jury to determine whether the rate of speed of a train was negligent, it must be presumed in support of the verdict for plaintiff that the jury decided the issue of negligent speed against defendant.

3. Appeal and error ⊂=999(3)—Implied finding that speed of train was negligent is conclusive.

Implied finding that it was negligence to run a train at a speed of 45 miles an hour at the time of a crossing accident is conclusive on appeal.

4. Railroads ⊂=346(5)—Reasonable inference nonresident did not know hours for operation of crossing gates.

Where one killed in a railroad crossing accident was not a resident of the place where the accident occurred, it is a reasonable inference that he did not know the hours during which crossing gates were operated.

5. Railroads ⊂=350(21)—Contributory negligence of automobile occupant question of fact.

Where there was no evidence as to what one riding in automobile driven by another and killed in crossing collision did for his own protection, it cannot be said as matter of law that he was guilty of contributory negligence.

6. Death ⊂=99(5)—Verdict for $30,000 held excessive to extent of $18,000.

Where deceased was an unmarried mining engineer 47 years old, earning $250 a month and contributing $100 a month to the support of his parents, his only heirs, who were 70 years old and with life expectancies of 9 years, a verdict for $30,000 was excessive to the extent of $18,000.

7. Trial ⊂=256(13)—More specific instruction as to damages for death should have been requested.

Instruction in action for death to award such damages as would fairly compensate for the injuries sustained fairly stated the law; and, if defendant desired the more specific instruction that the recovery should be limited to the pecuniary damages sustained by deceased's father and mother, it should have been requested.

8. Death ⊂=88—Damages allowable for loss of society, comfort, and protection.

In action for death of adult son, damages may be allowed for deprivation of society, comfort, and protection, not in addition to pecuniary loss, but as a part thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Leopold J. Wyseur, administrator of Roy J. Wyseur, against James C. Davis, Director General of Railroads, as Agent, etc. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed on condition that plaintiff file release of part of judgment.

Joseph M. Raines, of Fairfield, and Henley C. Booth, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph P. Lacey, of Oakland, and W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for damages in the sum of $30,000 for the death of Roy J. Wyseur, who was killed at a railroad crossing in Dixon by a train operated by the United States Railroad Administration.

The main line from Sacramento to San Francisco runs through Dixon in a general southwesterly direction. First street is the main highway leading out of Dixon to the north. At the intersection of First street and the railroad right of way the defendant had maintained gates operated from a tower on the west side of the street for several years prior to the accident. It had been the custom to operate the gates from 7:30 in the morning to 7:30 in the evening and to leave them open at other times. At 7:26 in the morning the deceased was riding as a guest in an automobile being driven north on First street by James F. Salaberry at a speed of about 15 miles an hour. At the crossing the automobile was struck by the engine of a west-bound train, running at 45 miles an hour, and both men were killed. The engineer had shut off steam, and the train was quietly drifting toward the station. The usual whistles had been sounded, and immediately before the collision, but too late to avoid it, on seeing the danger thereof, the engineer gave the usual warning whistles. The towerman, who was going to his post at the time, endeavored to warn the occupants of the automobile, but it does not appear that he succeeded in attracting their attention. The driver of the automobile apparently was not conscious of the approaching train until too late to avoid the collision, at no time reducing his speed, but turning slightly to the left at the moment thereof. When at a distance of 80 feet or more from the point of the accident, and thereafter until it occurred, the occupants of the automobile had a clear view of the approaching train, and could have seen it had they looked. For the purposes of this case it may be assumed that the driver of the automobile was negligent, notwithstanding the open gates. Koch v. Southern California Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 677, 84 Pac. 176; Griffin v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 Pac. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842.

[1] It is contended by appellant that it was not negligence to leave the gates open and unattended at the time of the accident. There was no law or ordinance requiring the maintenance of gates at the crossing, but defendant maintained them voluntarily. If the law required gates to be operated during 12 hours of the day only, failure to operate them during the other 12 hours would not constitute negligence, because travelers would be presumed to know the law, and open gates at a time when they were not required to be operated would furnish no assurance of a safe crossing. Where, however, the railroad company, though not required to do so, installs gates which it operates during a part only of each day, it owes a duty to the traveling public to give reasonable notice of the hours during which the gates will not be operated. In discussing a similar question, the absence of a flagman from a crossing, in the case of Elias v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 226 N. Y. 154, 123 N. E. 73, it is said:

"The danger is obvious. It is like in kind to that caused by raised and untended gates. To some extent it is an assurance that the way is safe. That the railroads recognize the danger is seen by the familiar sign at country crossings giving notice that the flagman is absent after 6 p. m."

See, also, Washington v. Birmingham Southern R. Co., 203 Ala. 295, 82 South. 545.

Where operated during certain hours of the day only, open gates during the remainder of the day give the same assurance of safety to persons without knowledge of the limited operation thereof as if there were no such limitation, in the absence of reasonable notice by appropriate signs or otherwise.

"Whether required by statute or not, the fact that the gate is open is held to be an invitation to cross and an assurance that the track can be crossed in safety." Elliott on Railroads (2d Ed.) § 1157; State v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., 80 Me. 430, 15 Atl. 36; Pittsburg, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Tatman (Ind. App.) 122 N. E. 73; Washington v. Birmingham Southern R. Co., supra; Montgomery v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 181 Mo. 477, 79 S. W. 930; Schwarz v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 211 Pa. 625, 61 Atl. 255.

"By these signals thousands of travelers are governed every day." Hooper v. Boston & M. R. Co., 81 Me. 260, 17 Atl. 64.

An open gate "is in the nature of an invitation to cross, and of a declaration that there are no approaching trains." Penn. R. Co. v. Stegemeier, 118 Ind. 305, 20 N. E. 843, 10 Am. St. Rep. 136.

See, also, Delaware & H. Co. v. Larnard, 161 Fed. 520, 88 C. C. A. 462; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eckman, 137 Ky. 331, 125 S. W. 729; Carlin v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 189 Ill. App. 23; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Howarth (Ind.) 127 N. E. 804.

[2, 3] The uncontradicted evidence shows that the train was running at the speed of 45 miles an hour at the time of the accident. At defendant's request the court instructed the jury:

"That it is for the jury to determine from all of the circumstances, whether the rate at which said train was being operated was negligent."

It must be presumed in support of the verdict that the jury decided the issue of negligent speed against the defendant. This implied finding of the jury is conclusive on appeal.

[4, 5] The evidence shows that the driver of the automobile was familiar with the crossing, and probably knew during what hours the gates were operated. Wyseur, the deceased, was not a resident of Dixon, and, as stated by counsel for appellant, a reasonable inference is that he was without such knowledge. It is urged that, as a matter of law, Wyseur was guilty of contributory negligence.

"The question as to whether or not the plaintiff, while passenger or guest in an automobile, exercised ordinary care upon approaching the tracks of a railway company is a question for the jury, under proper instructions by the court." Nichols v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 174 Pac. 319.

"A passenger in a vehicle operated by another is bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety." Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., R. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 Pac. 709.

"Whether or not he exercised such care is a question of fact. Unless the evidence is all one way, this question must be submitted to the jury." Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 156 Pac. 460.

"While the quantum of care which will be reasonable may be less where the gates are provided and are relied upon by the traveler, still the gates themselves are not an assurance and a warranty such as to justify a traveler in going blindly ahead in total disregard of all ordinary precautions." Koch v. Southern California Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 677, 84 Pac. 176, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 52, 113 Am. St. Rep. 332, 7 Ann. Cas. 795.

To sustain the defense of contributory negligence the defendant must prove personal failure of plaintiff to exercise ordinary care." Breese v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 149 Cal. 134, 85 Pac. 153, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059.

"In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that he did everything that a reasonably prudent man would have done under the same circumstances for the protection of his own safety." Carpenter v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. (Cal. App.) 195 Pac. 1073; Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. Min. Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 Pac. 714; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Landrigan, supra; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Gentry, 163 U. S. 353, 16 Sup. Ct. 1104, 41 L. Ed. 186.

In this case there is an entire absence of evidence as to what, if anything, Wyseur did for his own protection. He may have seen the approaching train and asked the driver to stop. Since the automobile was moving at such rate of speed that it could have been stopped within a few feet, he may have reasonably assumed, until too late, that the driver would stop before reaching the track. While no fixed rule has been or could be announced for the conduct of a passenger or guest under such circumstances, some of the decisions are enlightening upon the subject. In State v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., supra, it is said:

"The plaintiff's case is fortified by another consideration. He neither drove, nor, as far as appears, had any control of the team on which he was riding. It is reasonable to suppose that the owner carried him either for hire or gratuitously as a neighborly kindness. His position was not of the same degree of responsibility to the railroad as was that of the driver. He was a comparatively passive party. Not that he had no duty to perform. He could have asked the driver to stop the team, or he could have left it. But it would be natural, even though his fears were excited, that he should defer to some extent to the experience and discretion of the driver, who was in the control of his own team, and before he had time to assert his own judgment against the driver's, or perhaps fully appreciate the situation, the inevitable event was upon him. We think this fact has considerable force in the combination of circumstances which weigh against the charge of contributory negligence."

In Ilardi v. Central Cal. T. Co., 36 Cal. App. 488, 172 Pac. 763, it is said:

"In most instances such interference by the passenger or guest where the vehicle is about to be placed in a position of danger might prove to be gross imprudence and so disconcert the driver as to cause the disastrous result which such interference was designed to avoid."

In Carpenter v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., supra, the court said:

"Assuming that deceased, when the automobile which he occupied as a passenger or guest, reached the point 30 feet distant from the crossing, and traveling at a speed of only 4 miles per hour, saw the train 300 feet away therefrom and approaching at a high rate of speed, we cannot say as a matter of law that his failure to interfere with the driver's operation of the car rather than to rely upon the latter's judgment in escaping the threatened danger, nor his failure to leave the car, constituted contributory negligence. The question as presented was one of fact which should have been left to the verdict of the jury."

It cannot be said as a matter of law that Wyseur was guilty of contributory negligence.

[6] The father and mother of the deceased were his only heirs. They were of the age of 70 years at the time of the accident. The expectancy of life of each of them was about 9 years. The deceased was 47 years of age, unmarried, and a mining engineer, being in receipt of a salary of $250 a month. The parents lived in the home of another son. The deceased contributed $100 a month toward their support. He visited them on an average of six times a year. Under such circumstances the verdict for $30,000 is excessive as a matter of law.

"The jury is always bound by the fundamental rule that pecuniary damage is the limit of recovery, and the amount allowed must bear some reasonable relation to the pecuniary loss shown by the evidence." Dickinson v. Southern Pacific Co., 172 Cal. 727, 158 Pac. 183.

The Legislature has left "the subject of determining the amount at large, with the single restriction that the damages allowed should be just under all the circumstances of the case." Redfield v. Oakland C. S. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 277, 42 Pac. 822.

While no exact measure of damages is prescribed for the guidance of the jury, a comparison of the sum awarded with the amount which would constitute full compensation under an exact admeasurement of damages shows that the jury could not have arrived at the amount of the verdict by any rational method of computation. The evidence shows that the parents would probably have received $1,200 a year from their son but for his death. At 4 per cent. per annum they would receive an income of $1,200 a year on the amount of the verdict during the remainder of their lives, leaving the principal sum intact at the end thereof. Computing interest at the same rate, the present value of an annuity of $1,200 during their expectancy of life is $8,922. The pecuniary value of the son's comfort, society, and protection could not amount to the additional sum of $21,078. The language of the court in Dickinson v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, is applicable to the facts in this case. It was there said:

"Eliminating, as we must, any consideration of the grief and mental suffering occasioned to the survivors by the death, it is impossible to conceive how the loss of the comfort, society, and protection of the deceased could have had a money value of anything like the amount awarded by the jury."

[7, 8] The court instructed the jury that—

If they found for the plaintiff, "then you will award damages in such amount * * * as in your judgment will fairly compensate for such injuries as you may find have been sustained."

Appellant urges:

"That the jury was not specifically instructed * * * that recovery, if any, should be limited to the pecuniary damages sustained by the mother and father."

The defendant did not request any such instruction. The instruction given fairly states the law, and if defendant desired the more specific instruction the same should have been requested. The instruction given is unlike the one held to be erroneous in Pepper v. Southern Pacific Co., 105 Cal. 389, 401, 38 Pac. 974, 977, cited by appellant. In that case the court instructed the jury:

"That the measure of damages is not alone the pecuniary loss and injury sustained by the plaintiff in the loss of his son, as just explained, but in assessing the damages you may, in addition, take into consideration the loss, if any, sustained by plaintiff in being deprived of the comfort, society, and protection of the deceased by reason of his death."

In the instant case the court did not tell the jury that anything could be allowed in addition to pecuniary loss.

"The rule that allowance may be made for pecuniary loss from deprivation of society, comfort, and protection of a son is apparently settled, and cannot now be disturbed." Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 285, 113 Pac. 366, 372 (48 L. R. A. [N. S.] 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50.

Such allowance is not to be made in addition to pecuniary loss but as a part thereof.

In order that there may be an end to the litigation, and that the parents of the deceased may be enabled, during the remainder of their lives, to derive some benefit from the sum to be awarded them, it is ordered and adjudged that if the respondent shall, within 30 days after the going down of the remittitur herein, file in the court below a written release of the judgment to the extent of $20,000, then the judgment shall stand affirmed for the sum of $10,000. If such release be not so filed within said time the judgment shall stand reversed. The appellant to recover costs of appeal.

RODGERSON v. LE BARON. (Civ. 4247.)

Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)—Findings of courts on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where in an action for damages from an automobile collision the evidence as to speed of the cars was conflicting, and questions of contributory negligence and the last clear chance were raised, the findings of the court, sitting without a jury, on the issues, should not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by T. A. Rodgerson against W. J. Le Baron. From a judgment for the plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William N. Graybiel, of Turlock, for appellant.

C. W. White, of Alameda, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $626.90 for injuries resulting from the collision of two automobiles, one driven by the defendant and the other driven by plaintiff's son. The collision occurred at the intersection of the state highway with Redwood road near the town of Hayward in Alameda county. The plaintiff, with his son driving, was going south on Redwood road, intending to cross the highway. The defendant approached on his left, going west on the highway. The right front wheel of defendant's car struck the left rear wheel of plaintiff's car at a point on the highway about six feet south and to the left of the intersection. The testimony relating to the speed of the cars contains the usual conflict.

The appeal is based upon the ground that the evidence shows that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and that he had the last clear chance to avoid the collision. Upon both of these issues the evidence is conflicting, and the court, sitting without a jury, resolved the conflict in favor of plaintiff. Under the circumstances the judgment should not be disturbed.

REUTER et al. v. GAUDREAU. (Civ. 3867.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 28, 1922.)

1. Dedication ⇐44—Evidence held to sustain a finding that no dedication had been made.

Evidence held sufficient to warrant a finding that no public road over the plaintiff's land had been acquired by dedication.

2. Easements ⇐36(3)—Evidence held to sustain a finding that no right of way acquired by prescription.

Evidence held sufficient to warrant a finding that defendant had not acquired by prescription a right of way over plaintiff's land.

3. Highways ⇐17—Finding negativing public road warranted.

Finding that no public road over the plaintiff's land had been acquired by prescription held warranted.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Charles F. Reuter and another against Samuel W. Gaudreau. From a judgment for the plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. S. Maloney, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

McNabb & Hodge, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This action was commenced for the purpose of enjoining defendant from passing across the land of plaintiffs. Defendant claims the right to cross the land upon two theories: First, that there is a public road traversing the property, the road having been created by prescription or implied dedication; second, that defendant has himself acquired a prescriptive right to pass over the land if the road which is evident on the premises be not a public road. The trial court found against defendant upon each of these theories and rendered judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals.

[1-3] Appellant contends that the evidence does not support the findings of the trial court to the effect that there is no public road across the land of respondents, and that appellant never acquired a prescriptive right to pass over it. The complaint was filed in October, 1920. The land of respondents was originally settled upon by one Doyle in 1905; it then having been a part of the public domain. Doyle never perfected his title to the property, having died soon after he settled upon it, apparently in the same year. The place appears to have had other occupants afterward during a part of the time, and it was homesteaded in 1913 by one Balsom, who sold it several years later to respondents. The property was fenced by Doyle at the time he went upon it, and he maintained a gate at the place where appellant claims a public road started across it and toward certain land on which appellant resided at the time this action was commenced. One McNabb, who was on the land during Doyle's residence there, testified that a chain and padlock were then on the gate, although the gate was not actually locked at the time of his visit. He said further that at that time the only evidence of a road on the place was from the gate to a barn which Doyle had erected, and that the land beyond the barn "was under virgin brush." One Meyer, a forest ranger, testified that in 1910 there was no road across the property, but that there "seemed to be some wagon tracks." Balsom testified that in 1913, when he took up the land, there was on it a "part of a road up through an old vineyard that was on the place at the time," that it ended at the further side of the vineyard, and that the country beyond was rough and brushy, with no evidence of a road through it except "a wagon track that a pipe had been taken up to bring water down." He also said that the gate at which the alleged road entered the property was usually kept closed by him. Appellant's predecessor in interest in the land upon which appellant resides beyond the land of respondents was one Brown, who settled upon it in 1914 or 1915, according to the testimony of Balsom and of other witnesses. Balsom further testified:

"Q. And was there anything said by Mr. Brown when he came on the property at that time about his passing over it to you? A. The first time I saw Mr. Brown when he came on there, he asked me if I would give him permission to go up in the canyon beyond. Q. And you gave him permission, did you? A. I gave him permission. Q. And did he ever at any time after that, during the time that you lived on the ranch, or that he lived on his ranch, did he ever make any claim of right of way across there as a matter of right? A. No, sir. Q. Did he at any time say anything about that matter after that first time? A. No, beyond any time I met him going on there he would either make some apology or say that he had my permission to go on there. Q. He did mention it at various times? A. I don't think I ever met him that he didn't mention that he was crossing my land. Q. He didn't mention that he had any rights on there? A. No."

As already remarked, appellant acquired the property of Brown directly from that individual. Appellant first crossed the land of respondents, then still held by Balsom, in July, 1915, and took up his residence on the land acquired from Brown in January, 1916. We take up again the testimony of Balsom:

"Q. And after Mr. Gaudreau acquired Mr. Brown's interest, did you have any conversation with Mr. Gaudreau about the rights over this road? A. Yes, sir; I think it was about a month after Mr. Gaudreau came there I asked him if he knew he was using my road, and he told me yes he did. Q. And did he say anything else at that time; did he tell you how he knew? A. He told me Mr. Brown had told him it was my road. Q. And did you have any other conversation with him regarding the matter at any time? A. Not at that time, not until a month or five weeks before I sold the place [to respondents]. Q. And what took place then? A. I told him again he was using my road, and asked him if he would be willing to make some regulation so he would not get the right of way over the road, and he told me yes he would be willing to make any reservation or do anything that was right. * * * Q. Did you know of the notice being posted at the entrance, near the entrance, where this road turns from the public highway to go through the property with reference to it being a private road or no trespassing? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who put that up? A. I did. Q. When? A. 1917. * * * Q. And this conversation you had with Mr. Gaudreau was with regard to making some arrangement and paying you for the right to go over? A. Yes. Q. What year was that, Mr. Balsom? A. 1920, or the end of 1919. * * * Q. Now do you know of the public using this road as a public road at any time during the time that you lived there? A. No, sir. Q. And the only use that was made of it that you know of was the use that was made by Mr. Brown as you have indicated, and that by Mr. Gaudreau, as you have indicated? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. Did he [appellant] ever at any time during the time that you lived on the ranch, and after you filed on the ranch and up to the time you transferred it to plaintiffs, did he ever at any time claim to you that he had a right to use that road? A. No, never."

This evidence is amply sufficient to support the findings to which objection is made.

Judgment affirmed.

PAYNE v. WRIGHT. (Civ. 4220.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 1, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 28, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸706(7)—Evidence held to warrant court in refusing to direct verdict on ground of contributory negligence of person injured by automobile.

In an action for injuries sustained by plaintiff by the backing of an automobile against her in a city street, evidence held sufficient to warrant the court in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant on the ground of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

2. Trial ⟸260(1)—Refusal of requested instructions covered by those given not error.

Failure to give requested instructions is not error, where those given fully comprehend the theory of the defense and the substance of those requested.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County.

Action by Anna Payne against H. Wright. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs, of St. Paul, Minn., and E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wheaton A. Gray and J. M. Fursee, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $1,000, upon a verdict of a jury awarding that amount to plaintiff as damages for personal injuries sustained by being run over by an automobile owned and operated by defendant.

The plaintiff with her grandson, a child 10 years of age, was attempting to cross Main street in the city of Los Angeles, at a place in the middle of the block. There were two automobiles parked close to the curb, with sufficient space between them to permit the parking of another machine. Plaintiff stepped off the sidewalk between the two machines, which were parked. She is crippled and was walking with a crutch. She looked about her carefully for approaching vehicles before stepping off of the sidewalk, and then took the additional precaution to send her grandson ahead a few feet into the street and past the stationary automobiles, to ascertain whether or not there were any vehicles approaching. While she was standing still between the two automobiles which were parked, and awaiting her grandson's signal to advance, the automobile driven by defendant backed into the space in which she was standing and knocked her down, injuring her severely.

[1] The record contains ample testimony from which the jury might have concluded that the defendant gave no warning signal before backing into the space where plaintiff was standing; that defendant backed into such space rapidly; that plaintiff looked to her right and to her left before leaving the sidewalk; that she looked at the defendant's machine, and it was at a standstill; that she thereupon stepped into the street in an attempt to reach the opposite side; and that a moment later, defendant, without any warning signal and without looking in the direction of plaintiff, backed his automobile so rapidly into the space in which plaintiff was standing that she had no opportunity to escape in response to a warning shouted by her young grandson. The record contains the testimony of the traffic officer, who witnessed the accident, and of plaintiff's grandson, to the effect that defendant did not look around nor take any precautions before backing into the parking space; that he did not stop until the traffic officer jumped upon the running board of his automobile and told him he was crushing a woman with his car.

It is true, as pointed out by appellant, that the defendant's testimony is in conflict with some of the facts above recited in some important particulars; but with this conflict in the evidence we are not concerned upon appeal. The facts we have recited are testified to, substantially, by plaintiff, her grandson, and the traffic policeman who saw the accident, and also in most particulars by a witness who was a passenger in the automobile driven by the defendant at the time of the accident. A mere recital of the above is a sufficient answer to appellant's contention that the jury should have been instructed to find for the defendant upon the theory that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[2] The other matters urged by the appellant for a reversal of the judgment also relate to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. We have carefully read the instructions given by the court at the request of the defendant as well as those instructions which were refused. It does not seem necessary herein to discuss and compare these instructions in detail, for it is entirely clear that the subject-matter of the instructions refused was covered fully by the instructions given, and the theory of the defense was fully stated to the jury.

HARPOLD v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 4250.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 26, 1922.)

1. Justices of the peace ⟸141(5)—Service of notice of appeal jurisdictional, and cannot be waived by parties.

A defendant's motion to dismiss an appeal from a justice's court, on the ground that a codefendant had not been served with a notice of appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 974, is not a waiver of movant's right to personal service of such notice, for the reason that service is jurisdictional, and jurisdiction on appeal cannot be conferred or divested by stipulation of the parties.

2. Mandamus ⟸13 — Will not lie to compel judge to entertain appeal, where notice thereof was not given.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, entitling petitioner to writ of mandate "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office," does not entitle a party to a writ to compel a lower court to take jurisdiction of an appeal, where it does not appear from the record that petitioner has given the notice of appeal required by section 974.

3. Appeal and error ⟸792—Imperfect appeal dismissed on court's own motion.

Where an appellate court has not obtained jurisdiction by service of notice of appeal required by Code Civ. Proc. § 974, it will dismiss the appeal on its own motion.

4. Appeal and error ⟸23—Question of appellate court's jurisdiction determined from record.

The question whether jurisdiction of an appellate court has been conferred by an alleged appeal is to be determined from the record.

5. Mandamus ⟸168(2)—Dismissal by appellate court for want of jurisdiction presumed regular.

On application for writ of mandate to compel a judge to entertain an appeal, the action of respondent in dismissing the purported appeal for want of jurisdiction will be presumed regular, unless the record indicates otherwise.

Original application by A. D. Harpold for a mandatory writ, directed to Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and others, to compel respondents to entertain an appeal in an action by Laura E. Mathis against petitioner and another. Writ denied.

Clifford D. Good and Jeff L. Maloy, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Faulkner & Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an original application to this court, praying for a writ of mandate directing the respondent court to take jurisdiction of and hear a certain case on appeal from the justice's court.

[1] Heretofore Laura E. Mathis commenced an action in the justice's court against the petitioner and another. Thereafter such proceedings were had that on the 5th day of August, 1921, judgment was rendered against the defendants in that action; thereafter the petitioner prepared a notice of appeal purporting to appeal from said judgment, and in his petition in this case he alleges that he filed the notice of appeal and that he has annexed a copy of the notice to his petition. Such a paper appears as an exhibit, and there is nothing in the record showing that the same was served on anybody, or at all. In his petition the petitioner avers that he filed in the justice's court an undertaking on appeal, and that the same is attached to the petition. It is further alleged that the papers on appeal were thereafter transferred to the clerk of the superior court and that the proceeding was assigned to department 9 of the superior court; that Hon. Frank H. Dunne is the judge presiding in said department of said court; that on the 12th day of November, 1921, the plaintiff, Mathis, appeared in the superior court and moved to dismiss the appeal; that thereafter, March 10, 1922, the appeal was dismissed. Although the fact that the record does not show service of the notice of appeal was suggested in respondents' brief, served April 4, 1922, no showing has been made that the notice of appeal was, in fact, duly served.

This petitioner contends that in dismissing the appeal the superior court improperly divested itself of jurisdiction. To this contention the respondent replies that the superior court never acquired jurisdiction because the notice of appeal was never served. To that reply this petitioner calls attention to the fact that when the plaintiff, Mathis, moved to dismiss the appeal, she based her motion on the ground that the notice of appeal was not served upon petitioner's codefendant, T.

T. Quinn, and that by so framing her notice of motion she waived all other grounds. To this last contention the respondent replies that the due service of a notice of appeal is jurisdictional and that jurisdiction cannot be conferred nor divested by the stipulation of the parties.

[2-5] With this latter contention we agree with the respondent. The petitioner in this proceeding is seeking an order against a court and a judge thereof. He is entitled only to such writs as will operate "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. But there is no duty on the part of the respondent court, nor is there any power resting in the respondent court, to take jurisdiction of, or to hear an appeal, except as the statute provides, and the statute governing the subject expressly provides that "the appeal is taken by filing a notice of appeal with the justice or judge, and serving a copy on the adverse party." Code Civ. Proc., § 974. That language is almost identical with the wording of section 940 as that section stood as amended in 1873. "An appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice stating the appeal from the same, or some specific part thereof, and serving a similar notice on the adverse party, or his attorney." When that statute stood in that form it was adjudged that the service of the notice of appeal was jurisdictional. Pedlar v. Stroud, 116 Cal. 461, 48 Pac. 371. It is a rule of general application that, when an appellate court has not obtained jurisdiction of an alleged appeal, such court will dismiss such purported appeals of its own motion. 4 C. J. 589, § 2402. Whether jurisdiction has attached is determined by an inspection of the record. 4 C. J. 601. When, on March 10, 1922, the respondent court ordered the appeal dismissed, it is presumed that the respondent court was acting within its jurisdiction and was acting regularly. There is nothing in the record indicating anything to the contrary.

For these reasons the application for a writ of mandate should be denied. The alternative writ heretofore granted is discharged, and a peremptory writ is denied.

Ex parte MATHEWS. (Cr. 874.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸604 — City has power to regulate keeping of goats.

Under Const. art. 11, § 11, a city has the police power to prohibit the keeping of goats within 50 feet from a dwelling house, as reasonable men might rationally conclude that the enforcement of such a regulation would in some appreciable degree promote public welfare.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸605—City has police power to protect inhabitants from anticipated injurious conditions.

In the exercise of its police power a city may regulate, not only nuisances which have been declared such, but may protect the inhabitants from conditions which may reasonably be anticipated.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸63(2)—Question of reasonableness of only that part of ordinance regulating nuisances applicable to case considered.

Where an ordinance prohibited the keeping of goats within designated distances from a dwelling house, the distances varying in proportion to the number of goats kept, and a party kept 12 goats within 50 feet of a dwelling house in violation of the ordinance, the question as to the reasonableness of the other distances named in the ordinance will not be considered.

Application for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Pasadena to secure the release of Mrs. Frank Mathews from custody on a charge of violating an ordinance regulating the keeping of goats. Writ discharged and prisoner remanded.

J. G. Rossiter and B. M. Marble, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. H. Howard, City Atty., and Leonard L. Riccardi, City Pros. Atty., both of Pasadena, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The city of Pasadena enacted an ordinance regulating the keeping of goats. The petitioner was charged and convicted with having violated section 14 (c) of the ordinance. After sentence she petitioned this court, asking us to hold the section involved void as violative of the state Constitution. Upon the hearing in this court both sides introduced evidence principally intended to inform us upon the habits, culture, and characteristics of goats as well as concerning the flies, which some of the witnesses say accompany them.

[1] We find no conflict between the provision of the ordinance involved in the attack by the petitioner and the Code definition of a nuisance or with section 11 of article 11 of the state Constitution. There is no constitutional question involved in this proceeding which has not been, at least in principle, passed upon in this jurisdiction. The city of Pasadena possesses the police power by virtue of article 11, § 11, of the state Constitution. The city may prohibit or regulate whatever is reasonably involved in the preservation of the health or comfort of its inhabitants. Odd Fellows' Cemetery Ass'n v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 73 Pac. 987.

That the keeping of animals in a municipality is a proper subject for police regulation is too well established to be open to question. In re Linehan, 72 Cal. 114, 13 Pac. 170; Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, 41 Cal. App. 520, 183 Pac. 230; Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 24 Sup. Ct. 673, 48 L. Ed. 1018.

[2] In the exercise of its police power the city may regulate or even prohibit, not only nuisances which have already been declared such, but may use every reasonable expedient for the preservation of the safety and comfort of the city's inhabitants to protect them from those conditions which may reasonably be anticipated to result. Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, supra, and Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 220, 181 Pac. 714. In the regulation of such occupations as are capable of being offensive or injurious to the public, the zoning of a city so as to forbid the carrying on in certain localities of those which are objectionable has received the sanction of many judicial decisions. Ex parte Moynier, 65 Cal. 33, 2 Pac. 728; In re Hank Kie, 69 Cal. 149, 10 Pac. 327; In re Montgomery, 163 Cal. 457, 125 Pac. 1070, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 130; Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, supra. Nor is the city limited to the regulation of such occupations within a particular district, but may extend its inhibitions throughout the city. In re Linehan, supra; Fischer v. St. Louis, supra. McKnight v. City of Toronto, 3 Ont. Rep. 284, is a case where the same method of zoning was upheld as the one in the Pasadena ordinance. In that case the by-law prohibited the keeping of one cow at a less distance than 40 feet or two cows at a less distance than 80 feet from any dwelling house. This enactment was viewed as reasonable and valid.

The same decision is applicable to another aspect of the case at bar. It was there contended that the by-law, because of being so general as to include the owner of cows, in that particular attempted to make that a nuisance by legislation which could not be so. The court held that, conceding the claim to be good, it would not set the section of the by-law aside because plaintiff was not being proceeded against as one who was keeping cows too near his own dwelling house. In this proceeding, the reasonableness and validity of that part of section 14 (c), which prohibits the keeping of goats nearer than 50 feet distant from a dwelling house, is not in question.

The petitioner, Mrs. Mathews, testified that she has kept on an average of 12 goats in her corral, which occupies a space 50 feet square, and that her nearest neighbor is within 50 feet of the corral. There is a sharp conflict in the statements of the witnesses concerning the odor from goats and the noise made by them. The petitioner and some of her witnesses state that the female goat makes no noise. According to F. F. Heintz, the publisher of a goat magazine, and called as a witness for the petitioner, the female goat makes no noise if in a comfortable place and one to which it has become accustomed. On the other hand, the four witnesses for the respondent, all of whom live close to the Mathews place, declare that the noise made by the goats is extremely annoying. One said it is "a terrible noise when giving birth to kids." Another, that the goats stamp, walk, jump, and bleat in the night; and another that they bleat all the time; another that they made a noise, which the witness describes as "Baa," to such an extent that she was forced to go into the house while visiting a near neighbor to the Mathews.

Concerning the smell, we have the same diversity in the testimony. Some of the witnesses for the petitioner insist that there is no smell from the female goat, except, perhaps when she perspires, and that then it is not seriously objectionable. The witness L. W. Odell, called for the petitioner, testified that he noticed an odor of the goats on the Mathews place, and that he smelled it before he went on the lot, not less than 250 feet away. Witnesses for the respondent claim the stench from the goat corrals of Mrs. Mathews and another neighbor to be "something fierce," and so bad that one was forced to keep the windows closed on the side toward Mrs. Mathews' goats; another witness stated that this odor could be smelled a distance of two blocks, which was stipulated to be about 600 feet. This statement was corroborated by a second witness.

Concerning the flies, the respondent's witnesses generally testified that the screen doors of neighbors were black with flies. On the other hand, expert witnesses of the petitioner say that in their experience goats do not especially attract flies.

It is unnecessary to quote the testimony of the various witnesses in detail or to a greater extent than we have done. It seems clear that the conflict in the evidence is direct, if anything, preponderating in favor of the respondent's contentions.

The witness Heintz says that if a goat corral is kept as required by other provisions of the ordinance there will be no offensive odors; that if made comfortable and to feel at home goats make no noise. Mrs. Mathews states in effect that her corral is kept perfectly clean and in every way as required by law, and that the goats are provided with all of the comforts which the ordinary female goat may demand, and yet apparently truthful witnesses testify that the odors are "terrible," the noise so great as to drive neighbors into their closed houses, and that the flies gather in clouds. Surely with this conflict of evidence the judiciary will not say that the municipal legislative body has acted without reason and has abused its discretion in enacting an ordinance the language of which clearly indicates that the municipal legislators believed that the keeping of goats demanded regulation, and that the ordinance passed was appropriate and essential to the public comfort and the welfare of the citizens. It cannot be doubted that reasonable men upon a consideration of the facts in the instant case might well rationally conclude that the enforcement of the statute would tend in some appreciable degree to promote or preserve public comfort or welfare. If so, under the rule laid down in Re Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 124 Pac. 427, the law must be recognized as a legal exercise of the police power, "although other reasonable persons might take a different view." Courts would be arrogating to themselves a legitimate function of the Legislature if they should interfere with the exercise of legislative discretion in any case where it does not clearly appear that such discretion has been unreasonably exercised. Laurel Hill Cemetery v. San Francisco, 152 Cal. 464, 93 Pac. 70, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 260, 14 Ann. Cas. 1080.

The petitioner apparently has much reliance upon the showing made that her corral and barn are clean, and that it is possible to maintain such places with little or no danger to the safety or comfort of the community. In Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, supra, the court made use of this language:

"Nor would it be of any consequence that it would be possible for one or more * * * corrals to be maintained without appreciable risk of peril to the health or safety of the community. * * * The fact that appellant's corral was kept in a cleanly and sanitary manner affords no reason why he should be specially exempt from the provisions of an ordinance designed to regulate a business which, as conducted by some persons at least, is fraught with peril to the community's comfort, if not its very health."

Petitioner earnestly contends that inasmuch as subdivisions (b), (c), and (d) of section 5 of the ordinance provide for the cleaning of the goat corrals, etc., and that as her experts have testified that if such directions were to be carried out no objectionable odors could result, the provision of subdivision (c) of section 14 is unnecessary to public welfare, and therefore unreasonable and unconstitutional. This argument cannot be sustained. In the first place, the other subdivisions to which reference is made only provide for the cleanliness of the corral and the use of disinfectants. No provision is contained in them for the comfort of the animals without which it is a fair conclusion from the testimony of petitioner's own expert witness that they would bleat and stamp about with their feet; while others say in effect that the noise they make is quite unbearable A chorus of 12 discordant and petulant bleats may well carry a considerable distance. No expert has informed the court concerning the carrying powers of the voices of female goats or as to their melody or whether or not they blend in harmony, but from the deleterious effects testified to have been produced we must conclude that the net result of such "strident cacophonies" would make the authors thereof as much proper subject for regulation as the burro or the cow.

In the second place, if a section of this ordinance standing alone is calculated to insure the comfort and convenience of the public and where need exists for such a safeguard that section cannot be regarded as unreasonable and an unnecessary infringement of the rights of citizens merely because another section has also through separate provisions provided another redress. If counsel's argument were to obtain and section (c) were to be declared void on account of the provisions of subdivisions (b), (c), and (d) of section 5, in another suit involving a violation of the other sections they might with equal right and reason be declared unconstitutional because of the fact that subdivision (c) is in itself a complete safeguard of the public interest, for it might well be argued that if goat corrals were kept at a distance at from 50 to 1,000 feet from any dwelling house no injury would result, even though not cleaned daily and although some odors result.

[3] Perhaps the most spirited attack upon the subdivision of the ordinance is based upon an argument that it is unreasonable on account of the fact that under it 1 or 2 goats must be kept 50 feet from any dwelling house; 3 or 4 goats 100 feet; 5 goats 500 feet; and six goats 1,000 feet; whereas, it is claimed the menace to the public does not grow in the proportion that the distances named increase as related to the number of goats kept. It is argued that the law as to the 100, 300, and 1,000 feet provisions is unreasonable and oppressive and in no way tending to protect the health, safety, or comfort of the occupants of adjoining dwelling houses. The evidence shows that the petitioner has been keeping 12 or more goats continually, and that she kept them within 50 feet of the nearest dwelling of a neighbor. It thus clearly appears that she unquestionably violated the provision of the section to the effect that 2 goats must not be kept nearer than 50 feet of a dwelling. The provisions as to 100, 300, and 1,000 feet are therefore not involved, and we are not permitted to determine whether or not they are unreasonable, etc. If petitioner had maintained her goats at a distance of 999 feet from the nearest dwelling and in consequence had been convicted of a violation of this section of the ordinance, a decision as to the reasonableness of the 1,000-foot provision would be appropriate and necessary. As the facts are, we can only determine whether or not a regulation prohibiting goats being kept closer than 50 feet to the nearest dwelling is a reasonable enactment. We have no hesitation in holding that the city council might logically regard such a regulation as tending in an appreciable degree to promote the general welfare and comfort. The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 31, 1922.)

Application for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Pasadena to secure the release of Vada Lusher from custody on a charge of violating an ordinance regulating the keeping of goats. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

J. G. Rossiter and B. M. Marble, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.
J. H. Howard, City Atty., and Leonard L. Riccardi, City Pros. Atty., both of Pasadena, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The issues involved in this proceeding are generally the same as those in the application of Mrs. Frank Mathews for a writ of habeas corpus, Criminal No. 874 (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 220, decided upon this date. Upon the hearing it was agreed that the evidence taken should apply to both cases. The reasons given for discharging the writ in that case apply here.

A problem is propounded by the petitioner, Vada Lusher, to which no reference was made in the other proceeding, but the solution of which we regard as impossible in this one. Mrs. Lusher kept four goats and two kids. It is claimed that she was convicted under the charge that she kept more than four goats. The transcript does not bear out this contention. It appears that she was charged with a misdemeanor under Ordinance No. 1940, being the one in question, "particularly section 14 (c) of said ordinance." It will be seen that this charge is general.

From the testimony of witnesses given upon the hearing, it was shown that Mrs. Lusher's corral was within 9 feet of the nearest dwelling house. It is therefore clear that the conviction must be upheld, assuming that the provision against the keeping by any person of "any goat within fifty (50) feet of any dwelling house other than that occupied by him or it" is constitutional. Hence we need not decide whether or not a kid is a goat, it being unnecessary to a decision of the case. It seems clear that the determination of so serious a question should be deferred until some other suit or proceeding in which it shall appear to be an issue directly involved in that case.

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

BILLIG v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. SAYRE v. SAME. ROBISON v. SAME. (L. A. 7144.)

1. Master and servant ⟹301(4)—Servant may be transferred to another's service.

One may be in the general service of one employer, and nevertheless, with respect to particular work, be transferred to the service of another, so as to become by agreement, or by force of circumstances, the servant of the latter, with all the legal consequences of such relation.

2. Master and servant ⟹301(1)—Doctrine of respondeat superior only applies when relation exists.

The doctrine of respondeat superior applies only when the relation of master and servant exists between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged for the result of his neglect or wrong at the very time and in respect to the very thing out of which the injury arose.

3. Master and servant ⟹301(4)—Doctrine of respondeat superior depends on power of control.

The application of the doctrine of respondeat superior depends on the power of control which the superior possesses, and which for the protection of third persons he is required to exercise, over his subordinates, and the doctrine applies only where the power of control exists, and not where a special employer has no voice in the selection or retention of the negligent subordinate.

4. Appeal and error ⟹927(7)—Correctness of instruction against defendant as matter of law tested by undisputed evidence and that favorable to defendant.

The correctness of an instruction that the negligent driver of an auto truck was as matter of law defendant's agent must be tested solely by the undisputed evidence, coupled with that favoring defendant.

5. Master and servant ⟹301(4)—General employer may be liable for acts of employé hired out to third person.

A general employer is not freed from responsibility for the negligent acts of an employee merely because the employee has been hired out by the employer to a third person.

6. Master and servant ⟹301(4) — Truck driver, not controlled by third person, held truck owner's agent.

Where, though one to whom defendant hired a truck and driver exercised authority to control the driver's conduct in loading and unloading, he never assumed the right to direct him in the operation of the truck while in transit, and defendant never relinquished such right of control, and alone had authority to discharge the driver, the driver as matter of law was defendant's agent while driving the truck.

7. Appeal and error ⟹1057(2)—Exclusion of evidence relating only to undisputed matter held harmless.

The exclusion of defendant's testimony as to a conversation with a truck driver, in which he told the driver to obey one to whom defendant hired the truck and driver with respect to loading and unloading trucks, was not prejudicial, where it had no bearing on the question of right of control of truck drivers while the trucks were in transit, and it was undisputed that the drivers were under the hirer's control in loading and unloading.

8. Appeal and error ⟹1058(2)—Exclusion of questions on cross-examination subsequently answered not reversible error.

The exclusion of questions asked a witness on cross-examination was not reversible error, where on recross-examination the questions were answered.

On Petition for Rehearing.

9. Master and servant ⟹330(1)—General employer's control inferred, in absence of contrary evidence.

In the absence of evidence, direct or otherwise, from which it may be inferred that a truck driver's general employer relinquished his right of control over the driver of the truck while in transit to one to whom the truck and driver were hired, it must be inferred that he retained such control.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Meyers, Judge.

Three separate actions, by Margaret M. Billig, a minor, by her guardian ad litem, Harvey E. Billig, by T. D. Sayre, and by Irma E. Robison, against the Southern Pacific Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff in each action, defendant William C. Harris appeals. Affirmed.

Newlin & Ashburn and W. I. Gilbert, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. Each of the several named plaintiffs sued for and recovered judgments, in three separate actions, simultaneously tried, against the defendants Harris and Southern Pacific Company, in sums aggregating $45,000, for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiffs as a result of a collision between a gasoline motor car operated by the defendant Southern Pacific Company in which the plaintiffs were riding as passengers, and an auto truck owned by the defendant Harris. We have before us at this time only the three appeals of the defendant Harris, which, by stipulation of the parties to the appeals, are presented in a single record.

The collision in question occurred at the intersection of Long Beach boulevard and the tracks of the Southern Pacific Company in the county of Los Angeles. It is conceded for the purpose of the appeals that the evidence adduced upon the whole case is sufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that the collision in question resulted from the joint negligence of the engineer of the gasoline motor car and the driver of the truck. The auto truck, at the time of the collision, was employed in hauling a quantity of gasoline, which one Geiger, doing business as Geiger & Gehres, had contracted with the Gilmore Petroleum Company to transport from the city of Los Angeles to the harbor at San Pedro. Geiger and the Gilmore Petroleum Company were joined as defendants in the action, but a motion for a nonsuit as to them was granted. A motion for a nonsuit as to defendant Harris was denied, and at the request of the plaintiff the trial court charged the jury:

"That Walter Pratt, the driver of the auto truck on the occasion in controversy here, was the agent of the defendant William C. Harris, sued as 'Harris Bros. Truck Company,' and any negligence, if any, on his part, is imputed to the said Harris. * * * If the negligence, if any, alone of the driver Walter Pratt was a proximate cause of the accident, and any injuries following to plaintiffs therefrom, then you will find damages alone against the defendant William C. Harris, sued as the Harris Bros. Truck Company."

It would seem from the first of these instructions that the trial court determined, as a matter of law, that Harris was the master of and solely responsible for the conduct of Pratt, the driver of the truck, at the time of the accident. It was the contention of the defendant Harris in the court below, and it is his contention here, that the evidence adduced upon that phase of the case concerning the contractual relations existing, at the time of the collision, between Geiger and Harris and Pratt, which evidence embodied the evidence bearing upon the status of Pratt's servitude at the time of the collision, was in such substantial conflict as to preclude the trial court from charging the jury, as in effect it did, that, as a matter of law, necessarily deducible from the established facts of the case, the status of Pratt at the time of the collision was that of an agent of the defendant Harris.

Briefly stated, the evidence adduced in behalf of the defendant Harris, in so far as it relates to the status of Pratt at the time and place of the collision, is as follows: Pratt and his helper were at the time of the collision the general employés of the defendant Harris. The truck, Pratt, and the helper employed in hauling the gasoline were rented by Geiger from Harris for the performance of a contract which Geiger had with the Gilmore Petroleum Company for the transportation of gasoline from Los Angeles to the harbor at San Pedro. Geiger was to receive under his contract with the Gilmore Petroleum Company the sum of $2.25 for each ton of gasoline transported from the Gilmore plant to the harbor, and Harris was to receive from Geiger, as rental for the use of the truck, driver, and helper, $1.90 per ton of gasoline hauled with his truck.

Geiger, on the other hand, while admitting the existence of a contract with the Gilmore Petroleum Company and its terms, as above stated, testified that he had entered into a subcontract with Harris for the hauling of the Gilmore Company's gasoline, and that this contract was entered into about a year before the collision in question. The subcontract, so Geiger testified, was an oral contract, which continued up to the time of the collision. The sum and substance of the subcontract, according to Geiger, was that he and Harris had agreed that Harris would handle for Geiger the transportation of any excess of the Gilmore Petroleum Company's gasoline which Geiger himself could not handle, due to his lack of facilities, at an agreed price of $1.90 per ton.

Other facts, practically undisputed, or taken here in the light most favorable to the defendant Harris, appearing in evidence, bearing upon the status of Pratt as an employé of either Geiger or Harris at the time of the collision, as gleaned from the testimony of Geiger and Harris and other witnesses, may be substantially stated as follows:

Harris was at all times engaged in a general trucking business, and so likewise was the defendant Geiger. The conduct of Geiger's business differed from that of the defendant Harris, in the fact that Geiger owned no truck or transportation facilities of his own, but operated his business of procuring and consummating contracts for hauling by means of transportation instrumentalities rented by him from the defendant Harris and other persons. Geiger was at all times actively in charge of and supervised generally, either in person or through a representative, the loading and unloading that was done pursuant to and in the performance of contracts procured by him. Geiger, at the time of the collision in question, was engaged in the performance of a written contract entered into solely between him and the Gilmore Petroleum Company, upon which he alone was obligated. Pratt, the driver of the truck, was hired and employed by Harris generally in his trucking business, and Pratt's wage of $6.50 per day, and the wages of his helper, were paid by Harris. Whether driving specially for other persons or generally for Harris, Pratt, at the conclusion of the day's work, always returned the truck to the Harris garage, and daily turned in to Harris report cards of the quantities of gasoline hauled during the day, from which Harris computed his compensation and the wages of the driver and helper employed in operating the truck. Pratt and his helper, when directed in the first instance to report to Geiger, received no instructions from Harris, other than to go down to the Gilmore Petroleum Company's plant, and, upon arriving there, they were instructed by Geiger's foreman "where to load, and what to load, and how to load." Pratt exercised his own judgment as to the route to be taken by the truck employed in the delivery of the gasoline, and neither Geiger nor any one representing him ever at any time directed Pratt as to the management and operation of the truck after it was loaded and while it was in transit. Harris furnished all of the supplies and accessories necessary to the maintenance and operation of the truck, and upon one occasion went down to the Gilmore plant and had a general talk with Pratt and his helper, and on another occasion helped them load onto the truck a tank of gasoline.

Some several hours after the collision in question, Harris appeared upon the scene and cleared away the wreckage. Geiger always attended to and supervised the loading and unloading of the trucks. Upon one occasion, when Geiger complained to Harris that some of the men hired out by Harris, when loading and unloading, handled the gasoline containers too roughly, thereby causing a leakage, Geiger was told by Harris that "the men knew how to handle the stuff, and that, if they did not handle it right, to send them to the barn." And, as the result of a complaint upon another occasion by Geiger one of the helpers employed in loading another job in which a Harris truck was being used was removed from the truck by Harris. When the men of the Harris trucks were not actively engaged in the loading of gasoline assigned to their particular truck, they were required by Geiger to assist helpers, employed by him, in loading other trucks which were used in the same work, but not owned by or rented from Harris. Upon one occasion one of the helpers questioned Geiger's authority to require him to help load another truck, and he was told, upon telephoning to Harris, that he must take his orders from Geiger. When Pratt, the driver of the Harris truck, on the day of the collision, inquired of Harris whether or not he could take the load of gasoline, which was subsequently wrecked in the collision, to the garage for the night and deliver it at San Pedro in the morning, he was told to do as Geiger desired, and when Pratt applied to Geiger for instructions the latter requested him to take the gasoline to San Pedro that night. Geiger after the accident made a claim on an insurance policy for the loss of this particular gasoline while being transported "per motor truck and trailer owned or operated by the assured."

[1-3] Of course, one may be in the general service of one employer, and nevertheless, with respect to particular work, may be transferred to the service of another, so as to become by agreement, or by force of circumstances, the servant of the latter, with all the legal consequences of the new relation. In such a situation, however, it is obvious that it is necessary to ascertain who was the master at the very time of the negligent act complained of. This is so, for the doctrine of respondeat superior applies only when the relation of master and servant is shown to exist between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged for the result of some neglect or wrong at the very time and in respect to the very thing out of which the injury arose. In other words, the application of the doctrine of respondeat superior in any given case depends upon the power of control which the superior possesses, and which for the protection of third persons he is required to exercise, over the conduct and activities of his subordinates. Consequently the doctrine has application only in cases where the power of control exists, and such power does not exist in a situation where the special employer has no voice in the selection or retention of the negligent subordinate. Du Pratt v. Lick, 38 Cal. 691; Higham v. T. W. Waterman, 32 R. I. 578, 80 Atl. 178; Quinn v. Complete Electric Const. Co. (C. C.) 46 Fed. 506.

Whether Harris may, as a matter of law, be found to be the master of Pratt at the time of the collision, and therefore be held liable for the damage resulting to the plaintiffs from the admittedly negligent conduct of Pratt, depends upon the answer to be deduced from the evidence, hereinbefore outlined, to the question: Who, at the time and place of the collision, had authoritative control of the conduct of Pratt in his management and operation of the auto truck while in transit?

[4] The fact that the evidence is in substantial conflict concerning the character of the contract existing between Geiger and the defendant Harris is an immaterial factor in the solution of the question as to who was the master of Pratt at the time of the collision. And this is so for the reason that, whether it be found that Harris merely rented to Geiger the men and means employed in the performance of the work contracted for by Geiger, or was in the performance of the work in the capacity of an independent subcontractor, the correctness of the trial court's charge to the jury must, in the last analysis, be tested solely by the determination from the established evidence in the case—that which is undisputed, coupled with that which favors the defendant Harris—as to who, at the time and place of the collision, and with respect to the manner and method of operating and controlling the auto truck, while in transit, possessed the right, either express or implied, to exercise exclusive direction and control of the conduct of Pratt; that is to say, who was Pratt bound to obey concerning the control, management, and operation of the auto truck after it had been loaded in keeping with the desires and directions of Geiger, and while it was in transit between the place of loading and the place of delivery? Burns v. Jackson (Cal. App.) 200 Pac. 80; Cotter v. Lindgren, 106 Cal. 602, 39 Pac. 950, 46 Am. St. Rep. 255; Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469; Standard Oil Co. v. Anderson, 212 U. S. 215, 29 Sup. Ct. 252, 53 L. Ed. 480.

[5] Whatever the rule and its variations may be in other jurisdictions, it is the settled rule of law in this state, applicable to cases of the character under consideration here, that a general employer is not freed from responsibility for the negligent acts of an employé merely because the employé has been hired out by the employer to a third person, to be used by the latter in the performance of his work. Stewart v. Cal. Improvement Co., 131 Cal. 125, 63 Pac. 177, 724, 52 L. R. A. 205. The case last cited is in fact and principle strongly analogous to the case at bar. In that case it appeared that the defendant company had hired out to a municipality a steam roller, together with an engineer, one of the company's general employés, to be used in the rolling and leveling of a city street, which work was being done under the direction of the city's superintendent of streets. The plaintiff in that case suffered injuries caused by the negligent operation of the engine by the defendant company's engineer, and said company was held liable for the resultant damages, upon the theory that the facts showed, as a matter of law, that the relation of master and servant existed between the defendant company and its engineer, and that no such relation existed between the municipality and the engineer. This was held to be so primarily because of the undisputed facts that the city had merely hired from the defendant company, at a stipulated per diem, the services of the engineer and the use of the instrumentality employed in the performance of the municipality's work, and that its agent had authority only to direct and supervise the work in hand, and did not have the authority to control the engineer in his operation and management of the engine.

The court there, evidently, predicated and fixed the liability of the defendant company upon the theory that, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the operation of the engine was subject entirely to the skill and judgment of the engineer, who in the first instance was the selected, and at all times the paid, servant of the defendant company, employed for the purpose of operating the engine, and who could be discharged only upon the direction of the defendant company. It would appear, therefore, to be the rule in this state that, when a master hires out, under a rental agreement, the services of an employé for the operation of an instrumentality owned by the master, together with the use of the instrumentality, without relinquishing to the hirer the power to discharge such servant, to go where and perform such work as the hirer directs, the legal presumption is that, although the hirer directs the servant where to go and what to do in the performance of the work, the servant, as the operator of the instrumentality employed in the doing of the work, remains, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the servant of the general employer in so far as concerns the manner and method of operating the instrumentality, and the negligence of the servant must be held to be that of the owner, and not that of the hirer, of the instrumentality. Stewart v. Cal. Improvement Co., supra; Garven v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co., 100 Mo. App. 617, 620, 75 S. W. 193; note to Hardy v. Shelden Co., 37 L. R. A. 71.

[6] While the evidence in the instant case shows that Geiger, under the implied terms of the claimed contract of hiring, possessed and exercised authority to control the conduct of Pratt in the work of loading and unloading, nevertheless, so the evidence shows, Geiger never assumed the right to direct and control Pratt in his operation of the truck while in transit, and there is no evidence showing, or tending to show, with respect to the operation of the truck while in transit, that the defendant relinquished unto Geiger the right to control Pratt. The fact is undisputed that Pratt was the general paid employé of the defendant Harris, and while it was shown in evidence that Geiger was employed by Harris to send to the barn inefficient helpers, who were engaged in loading and unloading, still the only inference to be deduced from the undisputed evidence is that the right to hire and discharge the men rented to Geiger by Harris rested finally in Harris, and that Harris alone discharged them. The evidence does not show that Pratt for any cause might have been discharged by Geiger and replaced by a driver of Geiger's own selection. Retaining in himself, as Harris did, the right to hire and discharge Pratt, and there being no evidence showing, or tending to show, that Harris, either expressly or impliedly, relinquished control of Pratt in the operation of the truck, there was no possible basis upon which the jury could have found that Pratt was, as a matter of fact, the servant of Geiger, and therefore the trial court was justified in charging the jury as a matter of law that, under the established facts of the case, Pratt was agent of Harris at the time of the collision. Higham v. Waterman, 80 Atl. 178, 32 R. I. 578; Morris v. Trudo, 83 Vt. 44, 74 Atl. 387, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 33; Fink v. Brown (Tex. Civ. App.) 183 S. W. 46, 49.

The view we have taken of the evidence relative to the status of Pratt at the time of the collision, and what we have thus far said, in effect disposes of the remaining contentions made in support of the appeal upon the question of the agency of Pratt and the responsibility of Harris for the damages resulting from the admittedly negligent conduct of Pratt.

[7] Complaint is made of the ruling of the trial court refusing to permit the defendant Harris to testify as a witness in his own behalf concerning a conversation which he had with one Hilbert, a truck driver employed generally by Harris, who, with a Harris truck, had been hired by Geiger for work in the transportation of the Gilmore Petroleum Company's gasoline, relative to Geiger's "control or right to control" Hilbert. An objection to the testimony thus sought to be elicited was sustained, in part upon the ground that it was self-serving, leading, and, primarily, upon the ground that it was hearsay, and therefore incompetent. Conceding, without deciding, that the objection, as stated, was not well taken, still the trial court's ruling was without prejudice to the defendant, because it was not claimed nor shown that the testimony in question had any bearing upon the question as to who had the right to control the Harris drivers in the operation of the Harris trucks while in transit. To the contrary, it is conceded that the question objected to—

"sought to elicit * * * the instruction given by Harris to Hilbert about the necessity of obeying Geiger, when Hilbert telephoned [to Harris] to ascertain whether it was necessary for him [Hilbert] to assist in unloading Geiger's trucks as directed by Geiger."

Hilbert had previously testified that the instructions which he had received from Harris in the conversation referred to in the question which was objected to were in effect that the loading was to be done in accordance with Geiger's directions, and that the truck drivers must assist in loading whenever Geiger ordered them to do so, and it may be taken as an undisputed fact in the case that the truck drivers were required to assist in loading and unloading, and, while thus occupied, were under Geiger's control and direction; so, therefore, it is apparent that the refusal to permit Harris to testify to the same effect could not have operated to his prejudice.

[8] Complaint is also made of the ruling of the trial court in sustaining objections to a series of questions propounded to Pratt upon cross-examination, while testifying as a witness for the plaintiff, which were designed to elicit the fact "that while hauling gasoline for Geiger he [Pratt] was receiving and obeying orders only from Geiger or [Pierce] his representative." The objections to these questions were in the main rightly sustained; but, aside from any question of the correctness of the rulings, the record shows that the questions objected to were in fact subsequently answered by Pratt upon recross-examination, wherein he testified:

"I never had any instructions from anybody * * * at the Gilmore plant, except when somebody told me where the gas was that was to be transported and where it was to go. Nobody there ever told me how to drive my truck; Mr. Geiger, Mr. Gehres, Mr Pierce, nor any of the men there, ever told me anything about the driving of the truck, nor said anything to me about the way in which I did drive my truck."

The judgment is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [9] The petitions for a rehearing are denied. The case of Pruitt v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 209 Pac. 31, does not conflict with the instant cases, as is contended in the petition for rehearing. In the instant cases the relationship of general employer and employee existed between Harris and Pratt prior to the contract of hire of the truck and driver by the special employer, Geiger. Pratt was employed by Harris, his wages were paid by Harris, and he could only be discharged and replaced by Harris, and daily he made reports to Harris as to the amount of work performed. This and other uncontradicted evidence tended to show that Harris exercised exclusive control over Pratt in all respects, except as to the loading and unloading of the truck. In the absence of direct evidence, or of any evidence, in the instant cases, from which it might be inferred that Harris, at the time and place of the collision, and with respect to the manner and method of operating and controlling the auto truck while in transit, had relinquished to another person his right of control over the driver of the truck, it must be inferred that he retained such control and as a consequence was liable.

On the other hand, in Pruitt v. Industrial Accident Commission, the evidence leads to the opposite conclusion. In that case Conklin was hired by Graham Bros. to haul gravel, and was paid by them. At the inception of the hiring of Conklin, and for sime time afterwards, Graham Bros. exercised exclusive control over Conklin and his operation of the truck in general. Two weeks before the accident Pruitt purchased the truck in question, but made no change in the arrangement between Conklin and Graham Bros., except to take as owner of the truck a per centage of the amount earned by Conklin. There is no evidence, either direct or inferential, that Pruitt at any time assumed any control over the truck or the driver. The inference was therefore justified in that case that Graham Bros. retained control and were exercising it at the time of the collision. Pruitt, therefore, would not be liable.

ROGERS LAMB CO. v. COAST SECURITIES CO. (Civ. 3960.)

1. Sales ⟸479(2)—Seller under conditional contract entitled to take possession of property when abandoned by buyer.

In the absence of intervening rights of others, the seller under conditional contract had a right to take possession where the buyer abandoned the property by skipping out and becoming a fugitive from justice, though the time for payment had not arrived, and though contract did not provide that possession might be taken if buyer became financially involved or insolvent.

2. Sales ⟸472(3)—Assignee of fictitious contract of conditional sale not entitled to possession as against one selling to assignor on conditional sale.

Where ostensible contracts of conditional sale assigned to plaintiff by automobile dealer did not represent actual sales, but were fraudulently contrived to raise money, they gave plaintiff no right to possession of the automobiles described therein, as against one who had sold them to the dealer under conditional contract.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⟸138—Assignment of contracts if treated as sales held void as against creditors for want of delivery.

If fictitious contracts of conditional sale assigned to plaintiff by automobile dealer to raise money be treated as sales to plaintiff, they would be void as against creditors under Civ. Code, § 3440, in the absence of any delivery of the cars sold.

4. Evidence ⟸183(13)—Proof of contents of contracts, surrendered to one subsequently becoming fugitive from justice, admissible.

Where the evidence showed that upon renewal of contracts of conditional sale original contracts were surrendered to buyer, who subsequently skipped out and was a fugitive from justice, proof of their contents by comparison with the renewal contracts was admissible, as presumptively the buyer had the original contracts or had destroyed them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Rogers Lamb Company, a copartnership consisting of C. E. Rogers and another, against the Coast Securities Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph Musgrove, of Los Angeles, and Fred O. McGirr, for appellant.

C. E. Spencer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff, a copartnership, brought this action to recover possession of two automobiles. The court awarded judgment to respondent, and this appeal followed.

In March, 1920, one Adams, as agent and dealer, had consigned to him a carload of automobiles. Five machines comprised the shipment. Delivery of the automobiles was conditioned upon the payment of a draft covering the purchase price, which amounted to $10,315.55. Defendant corporation arranged to finance Adams, and its representative accompanied him to a suburban bank, which held the invoice draft for collection. The check of defendant was given covering the full amount of the invoice. An agent of defendant accompanied Adams, checked the numbers of the motors, and saw the automobiles placed on the floor of Adams' salesroom. Under the arrangement made between Adams and defendant, the latter issued to Adams contracts of conditional sale separately covering each of the five machines. In these contracts defendant was named as the owner and seller and Adams as the purchaser, and it was recited that there had been an initial payment made of a stated amount. The remainder of the purchase price was required to be paid on July 23, 1920. The purchase price as stated for each machine was $1,856.50, and each initial payment to be $556.95. Under the terms of the contracts title was reserved in defendant as seller, and the buyer was forbidden to dispose of the automobiles or hypothecate or incumber them until they were fully paid for. An officer of defendant testified, however, that Adams was a dealer, had a place of business as such; that it was understood that he was to sell the machines. Early in June, 1920, Adams disappeared and could not be found. One of the plaintiff copartners testified in reference to that matter that Adams had "skipped out and become a fugitive from justice." Not having received payment for but one of the automobiles described in the contracts, defendant took possession of four machines, all of which were found on the premises last occupied by Adams, and all of which belonged to the shipment hereinbefore mentioned.

[1] Leaving aside any question as to interfering rights of the plaintiff, which will be later referred to, it is apparent that the defendant, under its contracts with Adams, had the right to take possession of the automobiles when Adams abandoned the property, notwithstanding the time had not arrived when the final payment might be required to be made. This general right would follow, even though the contracts did not contain the term which was placed therein—that such possession might be taken in the event Adams became "financially involved or insolvent." The vendor had the right to protect his property and have possession of it whenever it received notice that the vendee proposed not to proceed to fulfill his obligations, or when he repudiated his contract.

It may now be considered as to whether the plaintiff acquired rights superior to those of the defendant by reason of its dealings with Adams. It has been noted that the automobiles were received at Adams' place of business, and the purchase price paid by defendant on March 16, 1920. On the same day Adams presented to the plaintiff copartnership, which dealt in automobile paper, a contract wherein he (Adams) was named as seller and one Longacre as buyer, and which described one of the five automobiles hereinbefore referred to as the subject of a conditional sale made. On the face of this contract it appeared that the purchaser had made an initial payment of $1,085. The remainder of the purchase price ($1,500) was provided to be paid in monthly installments of $150. Plaintiff advanced to Adams $1,500 less insurance and brokerage charges on this contract, and received an assignment of it. On March 28, 1920, Adams appeared at plaintiff's office with a similar contract, in which one Degele was named as purchaser. That contract described another of the same lot of automobiles, and recited that a payment of $1,485 had been made with condition that $100 per month should thereafter be returned to the seller. An assignment of this contract was accepted by the plaintiff, and Adams received therefor the sum of $1,100 less brokerage and insurance charges. The persons named as buyers in these two contracts were in default at the time the defendant took possession of the automobiles described therein, and they continued so to be up to the time that this action was commenced and thereafter.

Had Adams made bona fide sales of the automobiles and assigned the contracts of sale to plaintiff, respondent would doubtless have been estopped from denying to plaintiff all the rights which the assignments purported to carry, including the right to take possession of the automobiles upon default being made in the matter of purchase payments. But the evidence was sufficient to support an implied finding that the contracts were not bona fide; that they did not represent actual sale transactions. One of the machines was never delivered to the purported purchaser (Degele) but remained at all times in the possession of Adams. The other was used as a demonstrator by the purported purchaser (Longacre) who had worked for Adams. Neither was registered in the name of either Longacre or Degele with the state motor department. Longacre paid no money on account. He was produced as a witness at the trial; testified that Adams had credited him for labor and some other accounts, and that he had returned the machine, after receiving it, to have the starter repaired. His testimony, together with that given by another witness who had interviewed Longacre prior to the trial, showed a situation which authorized the trial judge to discard the testimony of Longacre and draw the conclusion that that transaction was not a real one. The other purported purchaser (Degele) was not produced. He was shown to have left the country, and it was also shown that he had never used the automobile which he was represented to have purchased.

[2, 3] The rights of appellant were measured by the contract that it produced. Apparently the contracts were fraudulently contrived by Adams for the purpose of raising money. The fact that there were described two automobiles which were in the possession of Adams created no right in appellant to have those machines to secure the debt which grew out of Adams' fraud. Neither can it be said that a sale of the automobiles to appellant resulted as a distinct and separable matter from the assignment of the contracts of purchase. If so, such sale would be void as against creditors of Adams, for the latter had possession of the machines, and did not deliver them to appellant. No such delivery was claimed ever to have been made. Civ. Code, § 3440. Respondent, on the other hand, had legal title to the property, as it had paid the original purchase price and received delivery by its agent.

[4] It was not error to admit in evidence the written contracts executed by Adams in favor of the defendant. It appeared in evidence that at the end of 60 days after the machines were delivered to Adams and paid for by the defendant, renewal contracts were made which were identical with the first ones executed, except that the amounts were reduced by 10 per cent. The secretary of defendant corporation testified that the old or first contracts were given back to Adams when the renewal instruments were executed. By the testimony of plaintiff's own witness it appeared that Adams had "skipped out" and was a fugitive from justice. The objection, therefore, that the defendant should have produced the original contracts and not have been allowed to prove their contents by comparison with the renewal contracts is not well taken. Presumptively, it would be considered that Adams either had taken the first contracts with him or that he had destroyed them. No further contention is made on behalf of appellant which requires consideration.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (Cr. 1036.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 22, 1922.)

1. Prostitution ⟸1—In prosecution of husband for leaving wife in house of prostitution, his status as husband continues until final decree of divorce.

As respects liability of a husband, under Pen. Code, § 266g, for placing or leaving his wife in a house of prostitution, his status as husband continues, although his wife has an interlocutory decree of divorce, until final judgment is rendered.

2. Criminal law ⟸722(2)—Prosecutor cannot read wife's complaint for divorce in prosecution for leaving wife in house of prostitution.

In prosecution of a husband, under Pen. Code, § 266g, for leaving his wife in a house of prostitution, the district attorney could not, during argument, read to the jury allegations in the wife's petition for divorce against defendant's character, since the divorce record was evidence only of the status of the parties.

3. Criminal law ⟸1037(1)—District attorney's improper argument not available on appeal, where not objected to on trial.

Defendant cannot avail himself on appeal of district attorney's improper argument, where defendant failed to object thereto on trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; George Samuels, Judge.

Thomas Smith was convicted of leaving his wife in a house of prostitution, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Francis J. Mannix, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment upon a verdict of a jury finding him guilty of a violation of section 266g of the Penal Code of the state of California. Said section reads as follows:

"Every man who, by force, intimidation, threats, persuasion, promises, or any other means, places or leaves, or procures any other person or persons to place or leave, his wife in a house of prostitution, or connives at or consents to, or permits, the placing or leaving of his wife in a house of prostitution, or allows or permits her to remain therein, is guilty of a felony, and punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than three nor more than ten years; and in all prosecutions under this section a wife is a competent witness against her husband."

The evidence presented at the trial is not included in the record presented to us upon this appeal, and appellant's contentions are, first, that the trial court erred in a certain instruction to the jury; and, second, that the defendant was prejudiced by certain alleged misconduct of the deputy district attorney in his closing argument to the jury.

[1] The first objection is to the following instruction:

"You are also instructed, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, that it is the final judgment that grants the divorce and restores the parties to the status of single persons. The interlocutory judgment does not have that effect. It merely declares the right that the party is entitled to a divorce, a divorce to be afterwards adjudged. It is the final judgment alone that grants the divorce, dissolves the marriage and restores the parties to the status of single persons, and permits each to marry again.

"The statute does not itself declare the marriage dissolved at the expiration of the year from the interlocutory judgment. It merely suspends for one year the power of the court to dissolve it, and, in effect, provides that it becomes dissolved only when, after the expiration of that period, the court has, by its final judgment, so declared. In the meantime, the parties remain in the relation of husband and wife."

As we have stated, the evidence is not before us, and we must assume that it shows such conduct on the part of the defendant, as to bring him within the provisions of said section of the Penal Code, provided he is the husband of Sarah Smith, the woman involved. It is admitted that Sarah Smith and defendant had been married, and that an interlocutory decree of divorce had been entered in an action brought by her to dissolve the marriage. No final decree of divorce had ever been entered, and the time at which such a decree might have been entered had not arrived when the offense charged was committed. Under such circumstances, appellant contends that Sarah Smith was not his wife, within the meaning of the section of the Penal Code involved here. The question is settled against his contention by the Supreme Court of this state in the case of Estate of Dargie, 162 Cal. 51, 53, 121 Pac. 320, 321, where it is said:

"It is the final judgment that grants the divorce. The interlocutory judgment does not have that effect. It merely declares the right: That the party is 'entitled' to a divorce, a divorce to be afterwards adjudged. By the terms of the statute, it is the final judgment alone that grants the divorce, dissolves the marriage, restores the parties to the status of single persons, and permits each to marry again. The statute does not itself declare the marriage dissolved at the expiration of the year from the interlocutory judgment. It merely suspends for one year the power of the court to dissolve it, and, in effect, provides that it becomes dissolved only when, after the expiration of that period, the court has, by its final judgment, so declared. In the meantime the parties remain in the legal relation of husband and wife."

The instruction of which complaint is made followed the language of the last-cited case and was not erroneous.

[2] The second matter urged by appellant is that the deputy district attorney was guilty of misconduct in reading to the jury the allegations of the petition for divorce which had previously been filed by Sarah Smith against the defendant, and which had resulted in the interlocutory decree mentioned. The attorney for the defendant in his argument to the jury had referred, evidently, to evidence produced by the defendant at the trial relative to his industry and good character. In reply the deputy district attorney produced the record in the divorce action, which had not been offered in evidence, and read the allegations of the complaint, which included charges of idleness and abuse. He then commented upon the fact that the defendant had failed to answer this complaint and to deny the allegations therein made. The presentation to the jury of the allegations of the complaint in the divorce action as evidence against the defendant of the facts therein recited, was clearly unwarranted. The record in that action was evidence against the defendant, in favor of third parties, only as to the status of the parties to said divorce action, and not as to the facts alleged in the pleadings therein. The estoppel of a judgment must be mutual in order to be admissible against a party to an action, In this case, the state, assuredly, would not have been bound by allegations in any of the pleadings in the divorce action, and could not use the same against the defendant. Gill v. Read, 5 R. I. 343, 73 Am. Dec. 73; Luke v. Hill, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559; Coney v. Harney, 53 N. J. Law, 53, 20 Atl. 736.

[3] However, defendant cannot avail himself of this matter upon appeal, because he failed to object thereto at the trial and failed to ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard the objectionable statements. The record discloses that no objection whatever was made to the reading of these allegations to the jury, despite the fact that the deputy district attorney specifically called counsel's attention to the matter and asked him to make any objections which he might have to the court.

HUTCHINSON v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. (Civ. 3864.)

1. Attachment ⊂⊃344—Plaintiff in proceeding on surety's undertaking need not show no property, but only sheriff's return unsatisfied.

Code Civ. Proc. § 552, providing that if an execution be returned unsatisfied the plaintiff may prosecute any attachment undertaking given pursuant to sections 540 or 555, requires that sheriff's return show judgment remains unsatisfied, but not that plaintiff show there is no property; and nothing but fraud and collusion in making the return would alter this rule.

2. Pleading ⊂⊃129(2)—Defendant's failure to plead sheriff's fraud in execution return of execution is admission of regular return.

In a proceeding against an attachment surety, under Code Civ. Proc. § 552, where defendant fails in his answer to show sheriff's fraud in return upon execution return, such failure is an admission of plaintiff's allegation of a regular return.

3. Attachment ⊂⊃344—Plaintiff in proceeding upon surety's undertaking shows he pursued his execution by showing regular issuance and return of writ.

A proceeding against a surety, under Code Civ. Proc. § 552, upon an attachment undertaking, is supported as to regular pursuance of plaintiff's remedy by execution, where the writ was regularly issued and regularly returned by the officer.

4. Attachment ⊂⊃347—Plaintiff's proceeding on surety's undertaking given by defendant not premature, though motion for new trial was pending in action and appeal time had not expired.

A proceeding against a surety, under Code Civ. Proc. § 552, upon an undertaking given by defendant pursuant to section 540, after plaintiff has pursued his remedy by execution, is not premature because brought when motion for new trial was pending or time to appeal was unexpired, in the original suit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Craig Hutchinson against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James M. O'Brien, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This action is upon an undertaking executed by defendant, as surety, for the release of property that had been taken under a writ of attachment in an action brought by the plaintiff here against A. Lincoln Miller and others. The undertaking, which was given pursuant to section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure, binds defendant to pay to plaintiff, on demand, the amount of whatever judgment the latter might obtain in the action which he had brought against Miller et al. Defendant having appeared and answered, plaintiff moved for a judgment on the pleadings, claiming that defendant's answer raised no material issue. The motion was granted, and defendant now appeals from the judgment. Insisting that its answer does present material issues, one in the form of a denial and another in the form of new matter, appellant contends that in granting plaintiff a judgment on the pleadings the lower court committed reversible error.

After averring that on January 24, 1921, he recovered a judgment for $2,024.90 against Miller et al. in the action wherein the defendant here had given the undertaking to release the attachment, plaintiff alleges in his complaint that on February 4, 1921, "execution was duly and regularly issued out of said court [the court in which the action against Miller et al. was pending], and remedy thereon regularly pursued, and on the 4th day of March, 1921, said execution was duly and regularly returned and filed in the office of the county clerk * * * wholly unsatisfied." None of these averments is denied except that defendant denies, on information and belief, that "the remedy on said execution was regularly pursued." It is appellant's contention that this denial raises a material issue, and that therefore it was error to render judgment on the pleadings. The contention lacks merit.

[1] It is provided by section 552 of the Code of Civil Procedure that—

"If the execution be returned, unsatisfied, in whole or in part, the plaintiff may prosecute any undertaking given pursuant to section five hundred and forty or section five hundred and fifty-five, or he may proceed, as in other cases, upon the return of an execution."

As we have seen, it is alleged in the complaint, and not denied in the answer, that "execution was duly and regularly issued" on February 4, 1921, and that four weeks thereafter "said execution was duly and regularly returned and filed in the office of the county clerk * * * wholly unsatisfied." The object of section 552 is to give relief to the obligee named in the undertaking whenever all the ordinary remedies have been resorted to without avail. But all such remedies have been resorted to without avail when execution has been regularly issued and regularly returned unsatisfied. When that has been done, the condition of the surety's undertaking is broken, and he becomes liable to an action. Section 552 does not demand that there shall in fact be no property. It demands no more than that execution shall be returned by the sheriff showing that the judgment remains unsatisfied in whole or in part. It is not a question of the existence of sufficient property, but of the existence of a return by the officer showing the judgment to be unsatisfied. If the sheriff was derelict in his duty, there is a complete remedy on his bond. Fraud and collusion in making the return, for the purpose of basing an action thereon against the surety, may alter the rule; but nothing short of such fraud and collusion will alter it. See Hall v. McGregor, 65 W. Va. 74, 64 S. E. 736, Clements v. Waters, 90 Ky. 96, 13 S. W. 431, and Stoors v. Kelsey, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 418.

[2] No cause of fraud or collusion appears here. If defendant has any reason to believe that plaintiff and the sheriff fraudulently colluded to make a false return, it should have set up in its answer the facts which constitute such fraud and collusion. That it has failed to do. Its admission that the execution was "duly and regularly" returned is equivalent to an admission that the return is not a "false return."

[3] Appellant refers us to the following language used by our Supreme Court in Passow & Sons v. United States F. & G. Co., 177 Cal. 34:

"The thing contemplated and required by section 552 is that the plaintiff in the attachment suit shall exhaust his remedy by execution before proceeding against the surety on the undertaking. It is therefore necessary that he shall show in his complaint upon the undertaking that the remedy by execution has been regularly pursued and that a return of the execution unsatisfied in whole or in part was regularly made before the action was begun."

Because the court said in that case that the plaintiff in such an action as this should show in his complaint that "the remedy by execution has been regularly pursued," appellant claims that something more is required than a showing that execution was regularly issued and regularly returned unsatisfied. But the remedy by execution is regularly pursued when the plaintiff causes the writ to be regularly issued and it is regularly returned by the officer. In Jones v. Green, 1 Wall. 330, 17 L. Ed. 553 (a judgment creditor's suit), Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said:

"* * * The court, when its aid is invoked, looks only to the execution, and the return of the officer to whom the execution was directed. The execution shows that the remedy afforded at law has been pursued, and of course, is the highest evidence of the fact. The return shows whether the remedy has proved effectual or not, and from the embarrassments which would attend any other rule, the return is held conclusive. The court will not entertain inquiries as to the diligence of the officer in endeavoring to find property upon which to levy. If the return be false, the law furnishes to the injured party ample remedy."

See, also, William Wright Co. v. Frazer, 109 Mich. 139, 66 N. W. 954, and Hunt v. Weiner, 39 Ark. 70.

[4] Coming now to the claim that the answer pleads an affirmative defense of new matter: It is alleged in the answer that at the time of the commencement of the present action a motion for a new trial was pending in the action against Miller and others—the action wherein the defendant here gave the undertaking which is the subject of the present action. It also is alleged that when the present action was commenced the time to appeal from the judgment in the other action had not expired. Wherefore, it is contended that this action was prematurely brought. It is conceded by appellant that this contention is directly opposed to the ruling of the District Court of Appeal in Bailey v. Ætna Indemnity Co., 5 Cal. App. 740, 91 Pac. 416. In that case it was held that the cause of action on a bond given under section 540 accrues as soon as execution against the defendant has been returned unsatisfied. It is claimed, however, that the Bailey Case, in so far as the point under consideration is concerned, is opposed to the reasoning of the Supreme Court in Cook v. Ceas, 143 Cal. 221, 77 Pac. 65. We are satisfied wth the reasoning of the court in the Bailey Case, and think that the opinion there points out clearly why it is that the Cook Case is distinguishable from such an action as this.

SCOTT v. AUSTIN et al. (Civ. 4272.)*

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 31, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 28, 1922.)

1. Courts ⟸93(3)—Decision uniformly followed held a rule of property not to be departed from because of decision of United States Supreme Court.

The rule that Civ. Code, § 172, as amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 425), to prohibit the husband from making a gift of community property without the wife's written consent, is unconstitutional and inoperative as to property acquired before its passage, having been uniformly followed, is a rule of property, and will not be departed from because of a contrary decision of the United States Supreme Court respecting a similar amendment of the statute of another state.

2. Husband and wife ⟸247—Amendments as to conveyance of community property inapplicable to property acquired before 1891.

Civ. Code, § 172, as amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 829), and section 172a, as added, requiring the wife to join in any conveyance of community real property, do not in any manner affect the right of the husband in property acquired prior to the amendment of section 172 in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 425).

3. Husband and wife ⟸267(1)—Finding that conveyance of community property by husband not fraudulent held sustained by evidence.

Under Civ. Code, § 3442, making the question of fraud in a transfer of real estate a question of fact, and providing that no transfer can be adjudged fraudulent solely because made without valuable consideration, where a husband conveyed community property acquired before the amendment of Civ. Code, § 172, in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 425) to one whose relations to him had been intimate and affectionate for many years, in consideration of the grantee's agreement to pay towards the care and support of the grantor's insane wife such amounts as might be required by the public authorities, and furnish her with necessary clothing, a finding that the conveyance was not fraudulent was sustained by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Emma Scott, an insane person, by J. A. Cornett, guardian of her person and estate, against Milton W. Austin, as administrator of Horace W. Austin, deceased, substituted in place of Horace W. Austin, deceased, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 207 Pac. 710.

Daugherty & Theile, of Salinas, and Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, for appellant.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action brought by the plaintiff as the surviving wife of one John B. Scott, to recover a one-half interest in certain community lands which her said husband conveyed during his lifetime to the defendant without her consent to such conveyance. The plaintiff is an insane person, and in bringing said action is acting through the regularly appointed guardian of her person and estate. The plaintiff and said John B. Scott intermarried on May 14, 1873, and continued to be husband and wife until the death of her said husband on February 18, 1920. On April 6, 1888, the lands in question, consisting of business property on Main street in the city of Salinas, were acquired by said John B. Scott by purchase, and it is a conceded fact in the case that they are of the present value of about $20,000. On May 6, 1889, the plaintiff was adjudged insane by the superior court of Monterey county, and was committed to the state hospital at Stockton, where she has ever since been and now is, in said condition, and is incurably insane. Her present age is about 73 years. On January 31, 1920, said John B. Scott conveyed said premises to the defendant herein, Horace W. Austin, reserving to the grantor a life estate therein. The said grantor was then 76 years of age and was in failing health. He died, in fact, within a month after the deed of said conveyance. It is an admitted fact in the case that no money consideration passed from the defendant Austin to said John B. Scott for said conveyance. The only consideration claimed by the defendant to have existed therefor being the execution by him to said Scott of an instrument in writing at the time of the delivery of said deed, reading as follows:

*Rehearing denied August 30, 1922.

"Salinas, Cal., January 30, 1920.

"In consideration of a deed of conveyance this day made to me by John B. Scott, I hereby agree that from and after the death of the said John B. Scott, I will pay towards the care and support of his wife, now confined in the asylum for the insane at Stockton, California, such amounts as, from time to time, may be fixed or required by the public authorities, and will likewise furnish her with necessary clothing.

"This obligation is to continue until the death of the said wife of John B. Scott, and is to bind my heirs, executors and administrators.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name this 30th day of January, 1920.

"Horace W. Austin."

The defendant Austin, who executed the foregoing agreement, was not a relative of the Scotts, but had been for many years an employee in a drug store owned and kept by said John B. Scott in Salinas, which was of the value of about $6,000, and which was transferred to the defendant Austin by said Scott by a separate writing at or about the date of the conveyance of said lands, and for the same consideration. It is an admitted fact in the case that the amount required by the state for the care of plaintiff at the Stockton hospital is $20 per month, and that her clothing costs from $20 to $40 a year. Upon the foregoing facts the trial court made its findings and rendered its judgment in favor of the defendant Austin, holding said conveyance to have been valid as to all of said real estate. It is from such judgment that the present appeal has been taken.

[1] The first contention of the appellant herein is that since said real estate was acquired after and during the marriage by the said John B. Scott of the plaintiff herein, by purchase, the whole thereof is community property, and that since the conveyance of the same was of a date after the amendment of section 172 of the Civil Code, added thereto in the year 1891 (St. 1891, p. 425), and which provided that the husband could not make a gift of community property or convey the same without a valuable consideration unless the wife in writing consented thereto, this conveyance, amounting substantially to a gift of said property to said defendant, must be held to be void. In making this contention the appellant concedes that if the rule laid down in Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170, holding that the amendment of 1891 to section 172 of the Civil Code was unconstitutional and inoperative as to property acquired before its passage is to be upheld, the appellant's said contention cannot be sustained. The appellant insists, however, that since said decision by the Supreme Court of this state, the doctrine announced therein has been departed from by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Arnett v. Reade, 220 U. S. 320, 31 Sup. Ct. 425, 55 L. Ed. 477, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1040, involving precisely the same question, arising in regard to a like amendment to the laws of New Mexico, in which that tribunal held that such amendment was valid and effectual in relation to community property acquired before its passage. The appellant in her opening brief insists that this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States must be held to be controlling in this case for the reason that a federal question is involved, viz. the question as to whether such amendment of section 172 of the Civil Code operates to deprive persons of property without due process of law. In her closing brief, however, the appellant concedes that the foregoing decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is not controlling, but is merely persuasive upon the courts of this state in passing upon the effect to be given to said amendments of the statutes of this state regulating the acquisition and disposition of real property within this state. In answering this contention it may be stated that the said decision of the Supreme Court of the United States can no longer be held to be even persuasive upon the courts of this state, and particularly upon this court in determining the effect of the amendment of 1891 to section 172 of the Civil Code, since the case of Spreckels v. Spreckels, supra, has been uniformly followed by the decisions of the courts of last resort in this state, until it has become and, in fact, has long been, a rule of property touching the subject to which it relates. Estate of Moffitt, 153 Cal. 360, 95 Pac. 653, 1025, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 207; Dargie v. Patterson, 176 Cal. 716, 169 Pac. 360; Duncan v. Duncan, 6 Cal. App. 407, 92 Pac. 310; Clavo v. Clavo, 10 Cal. App. 449, 102 Pac. 556; Jacobs v. All Persons, 12 Cal. App. 171, 106 Pac. 896; Thomas v. Fursman, 39 Cal. App. 285, 178 Pac. 870; Badover v. Guaranty, etc., Co., 186 Cal. 775, 200 Pac. 638.

[2] By the amendment made to the Civil Code in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 829), section 172 thereof was so amended as to confine its application to personal property, and section 172a was added, having relation to real estate. But these changes in the Civil Code did not in any manner affect the right of the husband in community property acquired prior to the amendment of section 172 of the Civil Code made in the year 1891, and hence did not in any manner affect the full application of the cases above cited to the facts of this case.

[3] The appellant's final contention is that the said conveyance, being without substantial consideration, and amounting practically to a gift to the grantee, must be held to have been fraudulent in so far as it purports to convey to said grantee the community interest of the said plaintiff in said property. We find no merit in this contention. The question whether a transaction involving the transfer of real estate is fraudulent is a question of fact and not a question of law; nor can any transfer or charge be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration. Civ. Code, § 3442. The trial court by its findings expressly determined that this conveyance was not made for the purpose or with the intent of defrauding the plaintiff in this action. We are of the opinion that this finding is fully sustained by the evidence in the case, which shows practically without contradiction that the plaintiff herein, has ever since the year 1889 been, and still is, hopelessly insane; that she has been during all of said time, and still is, and in all probability will be during the remainder of her life, confined in a state hospital for the insane; that during all of those years, and up to the time of his death, her husband had paid for her comfortable support and maintenance at said state hospital a sum approximating $300 a year, and at the time of the conveyance of the premises in question provided by a separate agreement with said defendants that such payments should be continued during the lifetime of his wife. The relation between the defendant and the decedent, John B. Scott, had been intimate and affectionate for many years, the defendant having begun work in the decedent's drug store when a boy, and having remained in his employ for more than 30 years, during the latter portion of which he had taken care of the decedent in his own home, where the latter died. In thus conveying to said defendant shortly before his death, and in thus providing for the maintenance of his wife during the remainder of her life, the decedent, far from evincing a fraudulent intent or purpose, manifested, in our opinion, the utmost and most commendable good faith in the disposition of this property, with the best interests of his wife in view. The mere fact that the decedent conveyed to the defendant the larger portion of the community property without other consideration than that above noted is not of itself sufficient to raise the imputation of fraud, since, under the authorities above cited, the husband possessed full power to make an absolute gift of the whole of the community property acquired prior to the amendment of section 172 of the Civil Code in 1891, when such conveyance was made in good faith, and particularly when the transfer was made for the laudable purpose manifested in the instant case. Clavo v. Clavo, supra; Jacobs v. All Persons, supra.

MANNING v. CITY OF PASADENA.
(Civ. 4227.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 4, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 2, 1922.)

Municipal corporations ⊂=729—Exercising governmental function in collecting garbage, and not liable for negligence, though selling the garbage.

A city, in enacting an ordinance concerning the disposition of garbage, and in collecting garbage and disposing of it in a sanitary method, was acting within its police powers, and the fact that it sold the garbage after it had been collected at its incinerator, thereby recouping some of the expense of collection, did not convert the governmental function of collecting into a proprietary function, so as to render it liable for the negligence of its garbage collectors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Carol Manning, a minor, by Alfred L. Manning, his guardian ad litem, against the City of Pasadena. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

James H. Howard, City Atty., of Los Angeles, and Roscoe R. Hess, Asst. City Atty., of Pasadena, for appellant.

John L. Richardson, T. E. Parke, and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff, by his guardian, brought an action against the defendant, the city of Pasadena, to recover a judgment in damages for personal injuries which the plaintiff alleged he had suffered. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

The appellant makes several points, including the contention that the defendant, the city of Pasadena, is not liable for acts of negligence on the part of its employees occurring in the performance of a governmental duty, and that the alleged injuries occurred under such circumstances. The respondent concedes that the defendant would not be liable if the injuries occurred in the performance of a simple governmental duty, but contends that under the facts the alleged accident occurred while the city of Pasadena was engaged in a private venture.

The city of Pasadena is a municipal corporation organized under a freeholders' charter. Prior to the accident alleged the city had adopted an ordinance, under and by virtue of which private persons were compelled to place in a receptacle the garbage of a household. It also provided that the expression "garbage," as used in the ordinance, should mean all animal and vegetable refuse from kitchen and household waste that should have been prepared for or intended to be used as food, or should have resulted from the preparation of food, and all animal and vegetable refuse from institutions where foodstuffs intended for human consumption should be handled commercially. The ordinance prohibited private individuals from collecting and disposing of such garbage. After the enactment of the ordinance the garbage in the defendant city was gathered by the employees and agents of the city. Under the directions of the head of the department, the garbage was collected and delivered at the municipal incinerator. Prior to the accident in question the city had entered into a contract with A. B. Miller, under and by virtue of which the city sold at $4.10 per ton the garbage so collected by it. Under that contract the purchaser agreed to remove the garbage from the incinerator.

At about half past 5 on the morning of the 28th of October, 1919, while it was still dark, municipal employees had driven their truck into Center street for the purpose of collecting garbage. Near Euclid avenue they had stopped the truck on the left-hand side of Center street and facing to the east. At that time the truck had two oil lamps, one on each side of the driver, but neither of those lamps was lighted. It had one large light near the windshield, beside the driver, focused down on the street. While at the time the truck stood in that position, the plaintiff drove west on Center street, riding on a motorcycle. He did not see the truck, and collided therewith, hitting it between the middle of the radiator and outside of the north wheel. It is for the injuries sustained in that accident that this action is brought. There were three employees with the truck on the morning in question. They were engaged in collecting the garbage from the several garbage cans and hauling the same to the incinerator. The ordinance above mentioned was approved March 9, 1917. The contract with Miller was executed on the 15th day of January, 1918. The plaintiff offered a summary of expenditures and receipts of the refuse collection department, from which it appears that for the fiscal years 1914–1920 the revenue collected by the department during each year or fraction thereof amounted to in round figures from $4,500 to $9,100, but that the expenditures were such that a balance was raised by tax levy which varied from $319 to $11,644. The totals for the same years showed total expenditures in the sum of $68,763.62; revenues, $42,688.23; salvage and abatement expense, $1,532.79; balance raised by tax levy, $24,542.60.

Excepting as the above facts may be evidence thereof, there is no evidence in the record that the City of Pasadena was conducting a garbage business for the purpose of making a profit. However, the respondent takes the position that the foregoing facts show that the defendant city was at the time and under the circumstances delineated conducting the garbage business for a profit, and that the defendant city is liable for the negligence of its servants in the performance of the duties cast upon them in gathering together the garbage, and in this behalf respondent cites McQuillin, Municipal Corporations, §§ 2625, 2673; Chicago v. Selz, Schwab & Co., 104 Ill. App. 376, 381; Hourigan v. Norwich, 77 Conn. 358, 365, 59 Atl. 487; Judson v. Borough, 80 Conn. 384, 68 Atl. 999, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 91. As we understand the appellant, its position is that, without regard to what may be the rule in other states, the facts of this case do not show that at the time of the accident the city of Pasadena was engaged in the garbage business for profit, and therefore the respondent did not bring himself within any exception to the above rule that cities, as subordinate agencies of the state, are intrusted with the exercise of limited governmental powers for the benefit of the local public in the performance of which, in this state, there being no statutory provision to the contrary, they are not liable for the negligence of their officers, agents and servants through whom they act. The most that can be said in favor of the respondent's position is that the evidence before the trial court showed that in collecting the garbage the city of Pasadena did not lose every dollar it expended, but that it recouped some of its expenses by virtue of its sales. The fact that it collected some moneys to cover expenses did not ipso facto render the city liable to the same rules that would apply to private individuals. In performing the function of collecting garbage and disposing of the same in a sanitary method, and in enacting the ordinance above mentioned and enforcing its provisions, the city was acting within its police powers. In re Zhizhuzza, 147 Cal. 328, 81 Pac. 955. Conceding, without deciding, that when thereafter, at the incinerator and after the garbage had been gathered together, the city offered the same for sale and did sell the same, that therein and thereby it was performing a purely private business function, it suffices to point out that the accident in question did not arise in the performance of this last-mentioned function, but did arise in the performance of the above-mentioned function of gathering the garbage together. The fact that the city of Pasadena sold the garbage after it had been collected did not operate to convert a governmental function into a proprietary function.

The question involved in this case in this state is not an open one. Chapman v. State, 104 Cal. 690, 38 Pac. 457, 43 Am. St. Rep. 158, and Denning v. State, 123 Cal. 316, 55 Pac. 1000, seem to us to be determinative of this litigation. Both cases involved the acts of the employees of the state harbor commissioners at the port of San Francisco. Those commissioners were acting under the provisions of section 2504 of the Political Code. They performed many functions. They acted as wharfingers. As such, they received and discharged freight. In handling a cargo of coal the commissioners allowed the same to break through the wharf and to be lost in San Francisco bay. Speaking of the liability of the state (104 Cal. at page 694, 38 Pac. 458 [43 Am. St. Rep. 158]), the court said:

"A wharfinger is one who for hire receives merchandise on his wharf, either for the purpose of forwarding or for delivery to the consignee on such wharf, and the matters alleged in the complaint show a contract of the latter character, and the state is bound thereby to the same extent as a private person engaged in conducting the business of a wharfinger would be under a similar contract."

The same public officers were furnished steam towboats. The boats were used during the daytime to tow, and to attend fires; at nighttime the boats were used only to attend fires. The board was authorized—"to fix and regulate from time to time the rates of dockage, wharfage, cranage, tolls and rents, and collect such amount of revenue therefrom as will enable the commissioners to perform the duties required of them by the act. * * *"

In Denning v. State, supra, it appears that the plaintiff had been injured while placing a light at night in pursuance of his duty as a deck hand on one of the boats operated by the harbor commission. At page 322 of 123 Cal., at page 1001 of 55 Pac., the court said:

"The fact that the board is authorized or required to collect tolls and charges for dockage and wharfage to such extent 'as will enable the commissioners to discharge the duties required of them by the act' does not affect its character as a governmental agency."

And again, at the bottom of page 322 of 123 Cal., at page 1002 of 55 Pac., the court says:

"But even if it were true that in so far as the duties of the board were those of a wharfinger, and that the liabilities of the state to its employees are or should be the same as that of a private corporation engaged in the same business, it does not follow that the state is or would be liable to the plaintiff, inasmuch as he was employed in a distinct branch of the service, viz. the protection against or extinguishment of fires, which, even in the case of municipal corporations, is uniformly held to be the exercise of a purely governmental function; and there is certainly as strong ground for distinguishing between the different functions of the board as there can be for distinguishing between the different functions of municipal corporations, in the exercise of some of which the corporation is liable for negligence, whilst in others it is not."

In Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 53 Pac. 416, the facts were much more in favor of the plaintiff than are the facts in the instant case. The Legislature had provided for the creation of a state agricultural society, for fairs to be conducted and managed thereby, for the maintenance of exhibits thereat, and for the collection of admission fees at the gate. In answering the same contention which this plaintiff makes the court said:

"It does not follow, however, that the society is organized for gain. It exists for the sole purpose of promoting the public interest in the business of agriculture and kindred objects. It is an agency of the government, and in no sense an organization for pecuniary profit to the state."

Any doubt that may exist on the subject seems to be entirely removed by the case entitled Kellar v. City of Los Angeles, 179 Cal. 605, 178 Pac. 505. The city of Los Angeles had purchased and was maintaining in the San Bernardino mountains a park—

"for the purpose of giving any children of said city, at certain prescribed charges to be paid by said children to said city, a vacation, with care, board, and lodging at said camp."

The plaintiff had gone to the camp under an agreement by which, in consideration of $3.75 per week to be paid by him, he was to be received and cared for, boarded, and lodged for two consecutive weeks. While there he accidentally fell and broke his arm. The alleged negligence was the failure to provide the necessary care and attention, in view of his injury, occasioning very serious results. There, as here, it was contended that the defendant was engaged in a business enterprise. The court held otherwise. It held that the city was in the due exercise of one of its governmental powers; and regarding the recoupment of expenses the court said (179 Cal. at page 610, 178 Pac. 507):

"That a small charge is made upon those children going to and staying at the camp, for the purpose of assisting in defraying the cost of maintenance of such children while at the camp, does not change the situation."

The trial judge, acting upon the request of the plaintiff, gave instructions 10, 11, and 12, embodying the contention of the plaintiff, and it refused instructions 28 and 29, which embodied the contention of the defendant. It was prejudicial error to give the instructions which were given, and to refuse those which were refused.

The judgment is reversed.

PALACE HOTEL CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 4339.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 10, 1922.)

Mandamus ⟸176—Judgment creditor of municipality cannot compel levy of tax sufficient to pay judgments other than his own.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1086, requiring a writ of mandate to be issued on the verified petition of the party beneficially interested. a judgment creditor of a city and county cannot compel the levy and collection of a tax sufficient to pay all judgments against the city and county, but can only compel the levy and collection of a tax sufficient to pay his own judgment.

Original application by the Palace Hotel Company of San Francisco for a writ of mandamus directed to the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco and others. Writ issued for part of relief asked.

Drown, Leicester & Drown, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to require the respondents, as members of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, to take the appropriate proceedings for the levy and collection of a tax sufficient to pay all final judgments against the said city and county that were included in a list of final judgments filed by the county clerk with the county auditor during the current fiscal year. The respondents have appeared by general demurrer. The petition contains all the necessary averments relating to the judgment which the petitioner holds against the city and county, and, so far as that judgment is concerned, the writ of mandamus should issue. But, in so far as the petitioner seeks to obtain relief for others who hold judgments against the city and county, it fails to allege any facts bringing it within the terms of section 1086, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that the writ of mandate "must be issued upon the verified petition of the party beneficially interested."

Let the writ issue commanding the respondents to include in the tax levy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, a sum sufficient to pay the judgment held by petitioner or an aliquot part thereof as provided by the act of March 23, 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 794).

ARMAS v. ARMAS. (Civ. 2418.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 8, 1922.)

Landlord and tenant ⟸95—Lessee held not entitled to stipulated amount from lessor on voluntary termination.

A provision in a lease that, if lessor should convey the property during the lease, he should pay lessee $250 a year for the unexpired term, in consideration whereof lessee should surrender the property, was solely for the benefit of the lessor, and, where the lessee on sale of the property surrendered possession voluntarily and without demand, he was not entitled to any of the money stipulated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Manuel Armas, Jr., against Frank C. Armas. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for appellant.

John A. Wall, of Mariposa, for respondent.

HART, J. The parties to this action (brothers), on the 26th day of December, 1919, entered into a written agreement of lease, whereby the defendant leased to the plaintiff 40 acres of land, situated in what is designated in the lease as "Rotterdam Colony," in Merced county, for the term of five years, for the total rental of $1,250, payable annually in installments of $250, the initial payment of $250 to be made, and the same was made, on the date of the execution of the lease. Among the covenants or conditions of the lease was the following:

"In the event the lessor shall sell and convey said property to any one other than the lessee during the term of this lease, he shall pay to the lessee at the rate of two hundred and fifty dollars per year for the unexpired term of the lease, in consideration whereof the lessee shall give up and surrender to the lessor, or his assigns, the real property and appurtenances covered by this lease."

The controversy here revolves around the foregoing provision of the lease.

The complaint alleges that the defendant (lessor), prior to the 22d day of September, 1920, and while said agreement of lease was in full force and effect, and while the plaintiff was, under the terms of said agreement of lease, in the possession and occupation of the lands therein described, sold and conveyed said land to a person other than the plaintiff; that the latter, on the 22d day of September, 1919, surrendered the possession of said real property and appurtenances to the defendant, and thereupon demanded of defendant "that he pay to plaintiff the sum of $250 per year for the unexpired term of said lease; that is to say, from the 22d day of September, 1920, to the expiration of said agreement to lease, to wit, December 26, 1924, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $1,041; that defendant has failed and refused to pay plaintiff the said sum or any part thereof."

Answering the complaint, the defendant, after certain denials, alleges that the conveyance of the property described in the lease was made subject to said agreement of lease, and that the grantee named in the deed of conveyance took said premises by said conveyance from defendant subject to said lease and to the right of the plaintiff to the possession of the premises therein described, and that at no time has the defendant or the grantee in said conveyance "demanded or required of plaintiff herein the surrender of said premises or any portion thereof."

The defendant also filed a cross-complaint by which he sought the reformation of the agreement of lease, alleging that the agreement of lease set out in the complaint was made and signed by the parties, but, "by mistake of the said parties, which was mutual, and of the person who drew said instrument, the said agreement of lease did not, nor does it, correctly contain and set forth the agreement of the parties with reference to the sale of said premises." Following these averments is the provision of the lease above quoted herein, as to which the cross-complaint proceeds:

"That said provision was inserted and made as above set forth by mistake of the person selected by plaintiff and defendant for the drafting of said instrument; that the parties hereto agreed that, in the event that the lessor should sell and convey said property to any one other than the lessee during the term of said lease with the right to the immediate possession thereof, the plaintiff would upon demand of defendant vacate said premises, surrender said lease, and that thereupon defendant would pay to plaintiff $1,000.00 for the unexpired term of said lease."

It is further alleged that said property was not sold with the right of immediate possession in the grantee or any right of possession prior to the termination of the lease; that neither defendant nor his grantee of said land ever demanded of plaintiff surrender of such possession; that the conveyance of said land was, as the answer alleges, to a person other than plaintiff subject to all the terms, covenants, and conditions of said lease; that, subsequent to the sale by defendant of said land, "without the consent of defendant and of the purchaser from him, and contrary to the wishes of each of them, plaintiff vacated said premises and abandoned said lease."

The prayer of the cross-complaint is that the said written lease be so reformed as to "speak the agreement of the parties as herein set forth, and that plaintiff take nothing by his action," etc.

The cross-complaint was met by denials.

The court found that the agreement of lease was as it was written and set out in the complaint, and, accordingly, denied the prayer for a reformation thereof; that plaintiff entered into the possession of the said premises under said agreement of lease on the 26th day of December, 1919; that defendant, prior to the 22d day of September, 1920, sold the land to a person other than the plaintiff, and that the deed of conveyance executed by defendant to the grantee of said land contained a provision that said conveyance was "subject to the lease thereon to Manuel Armas, dated December 28, 1919," but that said provision in said deed of conveyance "was without the consent or knowledge of plaintiff, and he refused to recognize it or be bound by it in any way or at all." It was further found that, after the execution by the defendant of said conveyance, to wit, on the 22d day of September, 1920, plaintiff vacated and surrendered possession of said premises, and "did then and there demand of defendant that he pay to plaintiff the sum of $250 per year for the unexpired term of said lease—that is to say, from the 22d day of September, 1920, to the expiration of said agreement, to wit, December 26, 1924, amounting to the sum of $1,041; that defendant refused to pay plaintiff said sum, or any part or portion thereof, and that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the said sum of $1,041, together with interest," etc.

Judgment was awarded accordingly, and the defendant appeals therefrom under the alternative method.

Under the plea by the defendant in his cross-complaint for a reformation of the provision of the instrument, stating the contingency upon the happening of which the lessee was to surrender possession of the premises in question prior to the expiration of the term during which the lease was to run, the court allowed parol evidence upon the question of the understanding of the parties as to what they intended the lease should actually say in that particular; and, in addressing proof to that inquiry, some evidence was developed which sustains the finding of the court that the provision referred to, as written in the lease, and as construed by the plaintiff, contained the real stipulation of the parties as to the occasion on which the plaintiff would be required to surrender his leasehold interest in the premises and vacate the same. The plaintiff testified that he and the defendant together went to a scrivener in the city of Merced, stated to him the terms of the lease as they appear in the lease which was signed by the parties, and that said scrivener prepared said instrument accordingly, and that both he and plaintiff, after reading the instrument, expressed themselves as being satisfied therewith as so prepared, and subscribed their names thereto. The plaintiff in effect declared that there never was any question as to his obligation to surrender possession of and vacate the premises at any time the defendant should sell and convey the property during the term of the lease to any person other than to himself. There was testimony by other witnesses that defendant stated in their presence, after the lease was executed, that he was satisfied with the terms of the agreement as it was written. The defendant, however, positively testified that possession was to be surrendered by the lessee in case of a sale by the lessor during the term of the lease only upon demand for possession by the lessor or his grantee.

If the parol evidence received in this case were required to be reviewed as to its relation to the question whether it was or was not sufficient to support the finding upon the issue of the reformation of the agreement; if, in other words, there was so pronounced an ambiguity as to the meaning, as intended by the parties, of said instrument in the particular as to which the controversy here has arisen as absolutely to require parol evidence to explain what was thereby actually meant or intended to be expressed—then we would perhaps feel compelled to hold, under the rule as to evidentiary conflicts, that there was sufficient support for the court's conclusion involving a construction of said provision. But, in our opinion, it was and is not necessary to resort to extrinsic aid to get at or understand the true meaning or at least the legal effect of that part of the agreement. The provision as to the sale of the premises during the term of the lease speaks plainly for itself as to its effect.

The construction given by the trial court of that provision of the lease is, in effect, that, upon a sale and conveyance of the land, as provided in the lease, the right of the plaintiff to the further possession thereof ipso facto ceased, and that he was then bound to surrender such possession at once to the purchaser or grantee, and the lessor required to pay him the sum stipulated in the lease. This construction or the effect thereof would make the provision as to sale and surrender of possession a personal covenant as between the lessor and lessee, and solely for the benefit of the latter. But, be that as it may, the language and the very nature of the provision forbid the construction to which it is subjected by the trial court.

The part of the lease referred to, it will be noted, provides that, in the event of a sale and conveyance of the premises by the defendant as therein specified, the lessor "shall pay to the lessee, at the rate of $250 per year for the unexpired term of the lease, in consideration whereof the lessee shall give up and surrender to the lessor, or his assigns, the real property and appurtenances covered by this lease." It seems to us that, upon the slightest reflection, it must become manifest that what the parties intended to say, and, upon a fair construction of the English language, what really they do and did say, by the use of that language, was that, if the lessor, upon selling the property to a party other than plaintiff while the lease was still in force, failed and refused to pay the lessee the stipulated sum, the latter would not be required to surrender possession of the premises. Or, to put the proposition in a different form of language, it is reasonably certain, if not perfectly clear from the language of the provision, that the understanding between the parties thus intended to be expressed was that the lessee should be required to surrender possession of the premises, upon a sale thereof during the term of the lease to some person other than plaintiff, only upon payment to the plaintiff of the sum stipulated to be paid upon such surrender; and necessarily this would mean, and does mean, that the plaintiff was entitled to remain in possession until such payment was made. In other words, paraphrasing said language according to what clearly appears to be the natural tenor thereof, the provision would read:

"That if a sale of the property be made to a party other than lessee during the term of the lease, the lessee agrees to relinquish his right of possession under the lease and surrender possession of the premises provided the lessor pays to the lessee the sum," etc.

This is undoubtedly the meaning and effect of the language referred to. It vested the lessee with the unquestionable right to remain in possession after a sale as specified until he was reimbursed as stipulated. With that provision in the lease, no court would sustain an action by the defendant to oust plaintiff of possession for the purpose of giving possession to a purchaser of the premises during the term of the lease without first requiring defendant or the purchaser to pay plaintiff the sum stipulated so to be paid in the case of such sale. And this proposition was faithfully recognized by the defendant on selling and conveying the premises to his grantee, one Azevedo. Said deed is dated, and presumptively was delivered (Civ. Code, § 1055), the 15th day of September, 1920, little short of nine months after the date of the execution of the lease to plaintiff, and was filed for record in the office of the county recorder of Merced county on the 4th day of October, 1920. The indenture, in the habendum clause thereof, among other things, contains the condition, as the court found, that the sale and conveyance of the premises is "subject to a lease thereon to Manuel Armas, dated December 28, (26?), 1919, and expiring December 26, 1924." Of course, by this provision or condition in said deed, the grantee of defendant was bound by the terms of the lease. He could not secure possession of the premises until the plaintiff had been, either by the grantor or the grantee, satisfied according to the terms of the provision stipulating for the sale of the property pending the existence of the lease to some person other than himself. In other words, the plaintiff, according to the deed of conveyance, was entitled to continue in possession of the premises under his lease until demand was made by the grantor or grantee of said premises for possession and the payment to him of the sum stipulated in the lease to be paid in the event he was required to surrender such possession during the term of the lease. In truth, the legal effect of said provision in the lease is this: That the plaintiff, by the lease, was granted by the defendant a defeasible estate for years in the demised premises, carved out of the fee which remained in the lessor or (using the common-law term in such a case) the grantor. The latter could not arbitrarily but only upon complying with the condition involved in the defeasance clause of the deed defeat or destroy the estate so vested in the plaintiff. The latter's estate or interest in the fee was, until the happening of the condition for its termination, as impregnable against attack as was the estate of the defendant or his grantee in the premises in remainder. Indeed, the defendant could not convey absolutely or unconditionally the interest in the land which he had previously taken out of the fee and conveyed to the plaintiff. And it is clear that he did not attempt to do so. As we have seen, in the transaction whereby he sold and conveyed the remainder to Azevedo, he was particular to preserve, by apt words in the deed of conveyance, the estate or leasehold right of the plaintiff. There was no demand made by either the defendant or his grantee that the plaintiff surrender possession and so terminate his lease. This the plaintiff admitted. He testified that he learned of the sale of the property four days prior to the day he abandoned possession of and vacated the premises; that he thereupon called on the defendant and asked him if a sale had been made, and that the latter replied that, while a sale had not then been completed, he expected to sell and convey the premises within a short time; that thereafter, and on the 26th day of September, 1920, wholly upon his own volition, or voluntarily, or without having been asked, requested, or required to do so by either the defendant or Azevedo, the purchaser, he vacated and so surrendered possession of the premises.

But, regardless of any other considerations, the case comes squarely within the principles of the case of Diepenbrock v. Luiz, 159 Cal. 716, 115 Pac. 743, L. R. A. 1915C, 234, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1084, and particularly within the rule as it is declared in the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw (now Chief Justice) and concurred in by two other justices. See page 722. That case involved the leasing of agricultural lands, the agreement of lease containing a provision authorizing the sale by the lessor of the leased lands during the term of the lease, upon certain conditions as to the reimbursement of the lessee for improvements, etc. The agreement is in all particulars substantially the same as the lease involved herein. Considering the provision of said lease as to the sale of the lands and the reimbursement of the lessee, Judge Shaw thus construes its legal effect:

"The provision for the termination of the lease upon a sale of the premises was solely for the benefit of the lessor. Foley v. Constantino, 43 Misc. 91, 86 N. Y. Supp. 780. He could undoubtedly waive the benefit thereof and, without terminating the lease, he could sell and convey the premises subject to the lease. The grantee, if the lessor did not act in the matter prior to the conveyance, could also waive the right and continue the lease in force. In that case the lessee would have no right to declare the lease terminated and demand payment for his improvements. The part of the provision which was for his benefit was that which gave him the right to demand payment for his improvements as a condition concurrent with the exercise by the lessor or his grantee of the option to terminate the lease. If either attempted to exercise the option, the lessor could demand payment for his improvements and the lease would not terminate until such payment was made."

See, also, cases cited in the footnotes of said case as published in L. R. A. 1915C.

As suggested, if upon no other theory the judgment herein may or should be reversed, it must thus be disposed of upon the doctrine declared in the above excerpt.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. WISMER. (Cr. 623.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 4, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 2, 1922.)

1. Jury ⟸97(4)—Juror who expressed opinion based on evidence in similar trial in which he was a juror held disqualified.

Under Pen. Code, § 1076, a juror, who, on his voir dire in a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, stated that he had served in a similar trial previously, and formed the opinion that the I. W. W., in which defendant was accused of being a member, was an unlawful organization, was legally ineligible for actual bias as defined by section 1073, subd. 2, and his disqualification was not cured by his asseverations that he would be able to accord defendant a fair and impartial trial.

2. Jury ⟸110(5)—Failure to peremptorily excuse juror held not a waiver of disqualification.

That defendant did not peremptorily excuse a juror disqualified for actual bias, after denial of his challenge for cause, did not constitute satisfaction with the juror or waiver of the disqualification, where he used his peremptory challenges on other jurors equally objectionable.

3. Criminal law ⟸1186(4)—Act providing that technical error should be disregarded does not apply to disallowance of challenge of juror for actual bias.

Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that errors not resulting in a miscarriage of justice should be disregarded, does not apply where error was committed in the disallowance of a challenge of a juror for actual bias, and where the error was not legally cured or waived by the challenging party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Walter Wismer was convicted of violating the Criminal Syndicalism Act, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

R. W. Henderson, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The indictment, in two separate and distinct counts, charged the defendant with the violation of certain provisions of the act of the Legislature of 1919, known as the "Criminal Syndicalism Act" (Stats. 1919, p. 281). Both counts were framed upon the fourth subdivision of section 2 of said act. The first charged that the defendant, in November, 1921, at the city of Sacramento, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously organize and assist in organizing an organization known as the "Industrial Workers of the World," sometimes known and referred to as "I. W. W." and the "One Big Union," being a society, group or assemblage of persons organized and assembled to advocate, teach, and aid and abet criminal syndicalism, as said crime is defined in section 1 of said act of the Legislature. In the second count, the defendant is accused of being at the time and place above mentioned, a member of said organization, having become so willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly. On the conclusion of the presentation of the people's case, the defendant, through his counsel, moved a dismissal of the first count on the ground that there was no evidence to support it, and the motion was granted. The case was finally submitted to the jury on the second count, and a verdict of guilty of the crime so charged was returned. The appeal is by the defendant from the judgment of conviction.

The legal validity of the verdict is challenged on four different grounds, to wit: (1) That error was committed in the denial of challenges to certain jurors on the ground of actual bias; (2) that "practically all the literature introduced by the prosecution" for the purpose of showing the character of the organization of which the defendant is accused of becoming and being a member, knowing it to advocate, teach, and aid and abet criminal syndicalism, was permitted to be received in evidence, in the absence of proof having first or at all been made that said literature was printed, published, and distributed by and under the authority of the Industrial Workers of the World; (3) "that the court erred in refusing to permit the defendant to read to the jury the whole of the pieces of literature, portions of which had been read on behalf of the prosecution;" (4) that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, "in that there was no testimony from which it could be deduced that the defendant ever had any knowledge of the unlawful purpose of the organization."

A careful examination of the record and a like consideration of the points urged for a reversal have led us to the conclusion that points 2, 3, and 4, in the order in which they are above enumerated, are devoid of merit. The cause must be reversed, though, because of rulings disallowing challenges to certain prospective jurors.

Among the veniremen called to the jury box were seven tentative jurors who stated, upon their voir dire examination, that they had sat as jurors in a case or in cases previously heard in the superior court of Sacramento, and in which the accused were tried on indictments charging them with the identical crime charged in the indictment against the defendant here and of which he stands convicted. These jurors each declared that, as to the particular case in which they had served as jurors, they had formed the opinion that the organization of which it is alleged in this indictment that the defendant herein is a member was an unlawful organization. This opinion, each of these jurors stated, was formed from and upon the evidence adduced in the case or cases in which he (or she) had sat as a juror. Each of said jurors was challenged on the ground of actual bias as the same is defined in section 1073, subdivision 2, of the Penal Code, viz.:

"For the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror in reference to the case, * * * which will prevent him from acting with entire impartiality and without prejudice to the substantial rights of either party."

In each of these instances, the challenge was disallowed after, upon an issue thereon being made by the denial of the challenge by the people, the district attorney had further examined the jurors, and thus elicited from them the statement that they could and would free their minds from anything that they had heard at the previous trial or trials in which they had served as jurors, and involving the same issue that is involved in this case; that they could and would try the defendant fairly and impartially, according to the evidence and the law as stated to them by the court, notwithstanding the opinion they had formed upon evidence that they had heard at the previous trial or trials that the organization of which the defendant is accused of being a member was "an unlawful organization."

The record shows that all the seven jurors, with the exception of Juror Fiege, were peremptorily excused by the defendant. The record further shows that said Fiege was not excused, but was sworn to try the defendant, and that he did try him. It is further made to appear by the record that, upon completion of the panel, the defendant had exhausted his full legal quota of peremptory challenges. In fact, the record shows this: That, after the panel had been completed—that is, after 12 jurors were in the box after the allowance of challenges, peremptory and for cause—the following occurred:

"The court, addressing counsel for the defendant: You are satisfied with the jury, Mr. Henderson? Mr. Henderson: Our peremptories are exhausted, your honor. Are there any more, Mr. Clerk? I would want to be absolutely sure. Clerk: Yes; I will call these names."

The clerk thereupon read to court and counsel the names of 10 persons (of whom 6 were among the 7 who had served as jurors in a trial previously had upon an indictment charging the accused with the offense for which the defendant was on trial) who had been peremptorily excused by the defendant.

Thus it is plainly made to appear by the record that the defendant exhausted the number of peremptory challenges to which he is entitled under the law (Pen. Code. § 1070), with Juror Fiege, who had sat in a similar trial previously, and had stated that therein he had formed the opinion that the Industrial Workers of the World constituted "an unlawful organization," and who was unavailingly challenged by defendant for actual bias, among those sworn to try the defendant.

[1] It is clear that Fiege was not legally eligible to serve as a juror in this case, and that the defendant, having exhausted his peremptory challenges, was compelled to accept said Fiege as one of the jurors to try the question of his (defendant's) guilt or innocence. Nor was Fiege's disqualification such as that it could be cured by his asseverations that he could and would in the trial of the defendant remove from his mind any impressions or opinion he may have obtained from hearing a previous trial of precisely a similar nature and that he would be able to accord to the accused a perfectly fair and impartial trial. He doubtless honestly believed that he could so try the defendant, and it may be that he could. But the law does not so view such a situation and hence in effect declares that a defendant in a criminal case or a party litigant in a civil case is not required to take the chance that a person thus forming an opinion as to the merits of the case will give to him that fair and impartial trial which the law intends and contemplates that he shall have.

Section 1076 of the Penal Code, in part, provides:

"* * * In a challenge for actual bias, the cause stated in the second subdivision of section ten hundred and seventy-three must be alleged; but no person shall be disqualified as a juror by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion upon the matter or cause to be submitted to such jury, founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety; provided it appear to the court, upon his declaration, under oath or otherwise, that he can and will, notwithstanding such an opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters to be submitted to him."

The above provision involves a departure from the common-law rule, as far as it goes, and, to render a person who has formed an opinion as to the merits of a case eligible to serve as a juror therein, it must be shown that such opinion has been formed upon information received from one or more of the three sources named in said section; so, where a juror has formed an opinion on the merits of the case which has originated or been generated from any other than any of the three sources named in said section, he is disqualified from sitting in the case as a juror, and he cannot, as he may in the cases specified in section 1076, qualify himself as a juror howsoever emphatic may be his declaration that he can and will disrobe his mind of such opinion and give to the defendant a fair trial and so return a verdict strictly in accord with the evidence and the law as it is stated by the court. People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 229, 34 Pac. 718; People v. Miller, 125 Cal. 44, 46, 57 Pac. 770, 771; People v. Helm, 152 Cal. 532, 536, 93 Pac. 99; People v. Riggins, 159 Cal. 113, 112 Pac. 862.

In the Wells Case, in which a juror stated that he had an opinion on the merits of the case, it is said:

"At common law a juror who entered the box with an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused was ipso facto disqualified from acting in the case, but section 1076 of the Penal Code of this state * * * creates an innovation upon this principle, and declares an exception to the common-law rule. But in order that a juror disqualified at common law, by reason of having previously formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, may come within this provision of the statute it must appear affirmatively to the court from the evidence before it that such opinion is formed from public rumors, or statements of public journals, or common notoriety; and it must further appear to the court by the juror's declaration under oath that, notwithstanding such opinion, he can and will act fairly and im-partially upon the matters to be submitted to him."

But the court added that—

Where the opinion of the juror was founded upon information or matters coming from a source other than any of those designated in section 1076 of the Penal Code, "that fact of itself is a disqualification under the law, and it is a disqualification even though the juror should declare to the court under oath that, notwithstanding such opinion he would and could act fairly and impartially upon the matters to be submitted to him. The juror," proceeds the court in that case, "would not only be disqualified at common law, but disqualified under the Penal Code, for he has not brought himself within the provisions of section 1076, as those provisions require an affirmative showing to the court that his opinion is based upon public rumor, common notoriety, or statements from public journals."

In People v. Miller, supra, the juror stated that he had an opinion upon the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence based upon statements made to him by persons with whom he had been acquainted for many years, and whom he believed told him the truth about the case, and that he believed them. He stated, however, that he could and would act fairly and impartially in trying the case and obey the instructions of the court. The challenge by defendant for actual bias was denied by the trial court, and on appeal, in considering the assignment based upon that ruling, the Supreme Court said:

"The juror went into the box with an opinion that the defendant was guilty. Such condition of the juror's mind was an absolute disqualification at common law. Under the Penal Code of this state, a single exception is * * * declared in section 1076. This juror was clearly disqualified, unless he came within the provisions of the aforesaid section," —and it was held, as obviously no other conclusion could be declared under the facts, that the juror did not come within the exception provided in section 1076, and that he was therefore disqualified beyond any power to qualify him under the law.

In People v. Helm, supra, the court, in discussing the subject in hand, said:

"If it is not made to appear that the juror's opinion is based entirely upon one or all of the three sources of information above named [in section 1076]; if it is shown that his belief has its origin in any other source than one of the three enumerated, he is at once as thoroughly disqualified under our Code as he would have been at common law."

Besides the above cases, see People v. Riggins, 159 Cal. 113, 112 Pac. 862, and the cases therein cited to the point under discussion at page 119 of 159 Cal., 112 Pac. 862.

In all the above cases the opinion of the juror was based upon information derived from the statements of parties not under oath, or made under circumstances in which no duty rested upon the jurors to test and determine their verity. In this case, the jurors referred to, having acted as jurors in a previous trial in which the identical offense charged here constituted the groundwork of the prosecution, founded their opinions as to the character of the organization of which the indictment charges the defendant with being a member upon sworn testimony, the truth or falsity of which they were required to determine. And the opinion of the said jurors so formed was upon one of the essential elements of the crime charged against the accused. Juror Fiege, who was forced upon the defendant as one of the arbiters of his fate by the ruling denying the defendant's objection to him as a juror in the case on the ground of actual bias, stated that, at a previous trial of a similar offense, he formed the opinion that the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World was an unlawful organization or assemblage or society of persons. In other words, the rational deduction from the statement of said juror was that he had previously formed the opinion upon sworn testimony that the organization of which the accused was charged with knowingly becoming and being a member, was an organization which advocated, taught, and aided and abetted the commission of the crime of criminal syndicalism, as defined by the statute of 1919, supra. And, since the two principal witnesses called by the people to prove the claimed criminal character of said organization, both former members thereof, testified that they had given similar testimony in previous trials of the same charge against others, in the superior court of Sacramento county, it may be that the opinion formed and entertained by Fiege and the other six jurors who stated that they had sat in previous trials of precisely the same issue, was upon the testimony of those very witnesses.

Clearly, a trial by jurors whose minds, when entering the jury box, were in the condition in reference to that element of the case that the minds of Fiege and the other six were in cannot be said to be characterized by that absolute fairness to which the law intends and declares that all persons, whatever may be their position in life, according to the social scale or standard, are entitled. There was one other element only to be established to make out a case against the accused, and that was the fact that he was a member of said organization at the time mentioned in the indictment, and this element was removed from the case as an issue by the admission of the defendant, extrajudicially and also before the jury, that he was at the times referred to in the indictment a member of said organization. And thus this case itself furnishes a forcible illustration of the singular wisdom and justness of the law in hedging the great and fundamental right of trial by jury with such restrictive safeguards as will insure to every person prosecuted for a public crime a trial by a jury composed of persons whose minds are not, from the beginning, infected with the slightest predilection for a particular result in the case and who, therefore, can give to him as well as to the people the benefit of their unbiased and unprejudiced judgment on the matters submitted to them.

[2] The Attorney General states in his brief that it does not appear from the record but that the defendant was satisfied with the jury as it was constituted. We do not know of any other more effectual way in which a party to an action could express his dissatisfaction with a jury or a particular juror than by challenging such jury or juror for cause or peremptorily. Indeed, this is the only way pointed out by the Code by which such dissatisfaction may be made known to the court. And the record here plainly shows, as we have pointed out, that the defendant did thus express his dissatisfaction with Juror Fiege, but that he was required to accept said juror as one of his triers because his right to peremptorily excuse tentative jurors had been exhausted. It is no reply to say that the defendant could have used one of his peremptories upon Fiege instead of upon one of the veniremen that had not formed an opinion upon one of the essential ingredients of the offense charged upon sworn testimony in a previous trial of a like offense. The record discloses that there were certain of the prospective jurors who had formed opinions upon the merits of the case from information coming from a different source from that of sworn testimony, and against some of these sitting in judgment upon him the defendant objected at the expense of the loss of some of his peremptory challenges. And it is to be assumed that he preferred to take a chance for a fair trial by Fiege than to take such a chance with some of the jurors peremptorily excused by him who had not heard testimony as to the character of the organization in question at a previous trial; and this he had the right to do without being required to sacrifice or surrender his right to complain of the act of the court resulting in the forcing upon him of an objectionable juror. The fact that he did not peremptorily excuse Fiege, when he might have done so at the expense of having some other juror on the panel equally as objectionable to him, although not because of having served on a jury at a previous trial for a similar offense, is not to be construed as the expression by him of satisfaction with Fiege or the jury as impaneled or as a waiver by him of Fiege's disqualification. The difficulty with the whole situation was that the defendant was compelled through erroneous rulings on his challenges for cause, to use six of his peremptory challenges, with the result that, having finally exhausted all such challenges allowed him by law, a disqualified juror was forced upon him.

[3] Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution has no application to the situation presented here. The right of trial by jury is fundamental—a right which came to us from the common law and as such guaranteed by the Constitution—and inseparably connected therewith (indeed, it is of the very essence thereof) is the right to a trial by a jury consisting of unbiased and unprejudiced persons. Hence, where, as here, it unquestionably appears that error has been committed in the disallowance of a challenge of a juror for actual bias, and the record discloses nothing indicating that the error was legally cured or in effect waived by the challenging party, the case cannot be saved from the fate of a reversal by an appeal to the terms of said section of the Constitution. This provision was not inserted in the organic law with the purpose of impairing the fundamental rights of the citizen or in any measure hampering the exercise or enjoyment thereof. Indeed, those rights cannot be destroyed or impaired so long as our present system of government exists.

It may be that the result of this decision will subject the people to great inconvenience in the prosecution of cases coming under the Criminal Syndicalism Law, especially as to cases founded on subdivision 4 of the second section of said act, in that, where there are many such cases in a county, the entire body of the people as citizens possessing the general qualifications for jury service might ultimately become disqualified from sitting as jurors in such a case by reason of having served as jurors in cases of like nature previously tried. If such shall be the result of this decision, it is to be greatly deprecated. But such a plea, which is nothing more than argumentum ab inconvenienti, can never be allowed except in those cases only where the law which is being construed is, by reason of the ambiguity of its language, of doubtful meaning, in which case it is permissible, if necessary, to give it a construction which, while not involving a departure from its general purpose, will with greater certainty make its application conform to public convenience or result in bringing about a more effectual achievement of the real ends of its enactment. In the present case, however, we are confronted with no such condition. The law relating to the right of trial by jury is not in such dubious language or doubtful or equivocal phrases as that its real meaning is enveloped in obscurity. The Code sections are merely regulatory of the exercise of the right of trial by jury as that right is guaranteed by the Constitution, and involve only a reaffirmation or restatement of the common-law rules with respect to that subject. Those rules are framed in simple and readily understandable language. Moreover, in thousands of decisions of the courts of last resort they have as often been declared to mean precisely what their simple language plainly implies. Therefore the inconvenience which may follow from their application according to their obvious tenor and intent cannot support an argument addressed to a construction which would impart to them a meaning different from that attributed to them here. We may, in this connection, add that section 1076 of the Penal Code, although in a measure in derogation of the common-law rule, was not intended to deny to litigants a trial by jury composed of persons without bias or prejudice as to the merits of the case or the parties to the issue to be tried.

The conclusion is that the defendant was, as a matter of law, denied the fair and impartial trial to which he is entitled, and the judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

(Civ. 4294.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 9, 1922.)

Religious societies ⇐18—Grant to church trustees held gift to church, vesting legal title in trustees, as depositary of title.

A grant without consideration "unto B., M., and P. as trustees for the F. Church," a voluntary unincorporated society, where the instrument contains no specific language indicating a trust, vests legal title in the trustees as the only depositary of title, and is a gift to the church, and not a trust.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Franc C. Brittenbaker, as administratrix of the estate of Anna Salyer, deceased, against F. L. Buck and others, as trustees for the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pacific Grove, Cal. From a judgment against plaintiff, she appeals. Affirmed.

E. G. Ryker, of Oakland, S. W. Mack, of Monterey, and C. L. Lacey, of Salinas, for appellant.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment against her as administratrix of the estate of Anna Salyer, deceased, and in favor of the defendants, as trustees for the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pacific Grove, California.

The complaint alleges that on January 30, 1918, plaintiff's intestate was the owner of certain real property in the city of Pacific Grove, Monterey county, Cal., which property is specifically described in the complaint; that on said date said Anna Salyer executed a deed of said property to the defendants. Said Anna Salyer died on the 18th day of November, 1919; plaintiff was duly appointed administratrix of her estate. Subsequently this action was brought by plaintiff, and was framed in three counts. The first court was based upon the alleged mental incompetency of plaintiff's intestate at the time of the execution of the deed in question. The second count was based upon the ground of alleged undue influence, and plaintiff prayed that the deed be declared null and void. The third count is in the form of a suit to quiet title, and proceeds upon the theory that because of the form of the deed no title was conveyed to the grantees.

Upon appeal none of the evidence introduced in the trial court in support of the first two counts is before us, and appellant states that she has abandoned her position in relation thereto. This leaves for our consideration only the question of the sufficiency of the deed in question to convey title to the defendants.

It was stipulated that the deed was executed without consideration. It reads as follows:

"This indenture, made the 30th day of January, A. D. 1918, by and between Anna Salyer, of the city of Pacific Grove, county of Monterey, state of California, grantor, and F. L. Buck, C. L. Moyes, J. K. Paul, J. T. Elliott, J. H. Williams, James Harper, H. G. Jorgensen, J. O. Leek, and E. B. De Forrest, as trustees for the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pacific Grove, Cal., an association, grantees, witnesseth: That the said Anna Salyer does hereby give, grant and convey unto F. L. Buck, C. J. Moyes, J. K. Paul, J. T. Elliott, J. J. Williams, James Harper, H. G. Jorgensen, J. O. Leek and E. B. De Forrest, as trustees for the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pacific Grove, California, an association, and their successors in office duly appointed according to the discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, forever, subject to the exceptions and reservations hereinafter mentioned, all that lot, piece or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the city of Pacific Grove, county of Monterey, state of California, and particularly described as follows, to wit: [Here follows a description of the land and certain reservations in favor of the grantor personally, which are not material to our present inquiry.]"

Appellant's contention is that by this deed the grantor attempted to create a voluntary trust in favor of the First Methodist Church, but that said trust fails because the instrument does not indicate with reasonable certainty the purpose of the trust (section 2221, Civ. Code), and that the title to the property remains in the heirs of the grantor.

Reliance is placed upon the case of Union Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena, Executor, etc., v. Ishkanian, 45 Cal. App. 347, 187 Pac. 757. In that case the property in question was granted to "H. P. Faris, as treasurer of the Prohibition National Committee, or his successor," and it was held that the deed clearly indicated an intention on the part of the grantor to create a trust in favor of the Prohibition National Committee. It was held on appeal that parol evidence was properly received to explain the intentions of the parties as to whether the conveyance was a deed absolute or in trust. It did not appear that the treasurer of the Prohibition National Committee was the person chosen by said committee to hold the legal title to its property.

In the present case we must conclude, in support of the judgment, that the trial court concluded that it was not the intention of the grantor in the deed to create a trust thereby. We have not before us all the evidence offered on that subject in the trial court. However, the deed itself was offered in evidence, and is in the record presented to us, as is also the testimony of H. G. Jorgensen, one of the defendants herein, that the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pacific Grove is an unincorporated religious association; that said Jorgensen and the other defendants herein constitute the board of trustees of that association, and did constitute such board at the time the deed in question was executed. He identified a book containing the constitution and laws of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which volume was offered in evidence and contains provisions relative to the election of trustees to hold the church property, their qualifications, etc. It is further provided that—"The board or boards of trustees in any charge shall hold all church property, using so much of the proceeds as may be needful to pay debts or to make repairs and shall be amenable to the quarterly conference. They shall invest all trust funds coming under their control in conformity with the laws of the state and shall deposit trust funds in savings banks or invest them only in securities which are lawful for savings banks."

There are additional provisions regarding the management and control of church property, title to which is vested in the trustees.

In the light of these facts, and apart from any other evidence upon the subject which may have been before the trial court, we think that court was warranted in concluding that there was no intention on the part of the grantor to create an express trust. It seems clear that she intended to give the property to the Methodist Episcopal Church. That institution was unincorporated, and had not the legal capacity to take title to the property. It was necessary, therefore, that legal title be given to its board of trustees. If the property in question had been purchased by the church for a valuable consideration, free from all limitations or trusts, the deed, necessarily, would have been made in the same manner. A valid grant may be made to trustees for an unincorporated society, and such title will pass in perpetuity. Ruddick v. Albertson, 154 Cal. 640, 644, 98 Pac. 1045. The designation of the grantees in the deed as "trustees" was for the purpose of identifying the body of individuals that was to take title to the property, and not for the purpose of creating a trust. That question was discussed in the case of Clark v. Brown (Tex. Civ. App.) 108 S. W. 421, 431, 433, where it was said:

"In the case before us the property was sold and conveyed to certain named trustees for the use and benefit of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church at Jefferson. The designation of the beneficiaries by the terms employed was for the purpose of identifying the body of individuals or organization that was to take, and not as indicating a purpose of the grantors to dedicate it to any particular form of religious worship. The congregation for whose benefit the conveyances were made took the property unincumbered by any conditions or trusts, so far as the grantors were concerned. The only conditions imposed grew out of the relations of the beneficiaries among themselves and such as were implied in their compact of association. * * * Members of voluntary unincorporated associations can hold property in no other way than through the medium of trustees, acting as depositaries of the legal title, and this equitable interest entitles each beneficiary to the same voice in the management and control of the property as if he were a joint owner and holder of the legal title."

In view of our conclusion that the conveyance in question does not create an express or voluntary trust, it becomes unnecessary for us to discuss the question raised in the briefs relative to the degree of certainty necessary in prescribing the terms of express trusts for charitable and other purposes.

PEOPLE v. SHARP. (Cr. 896.)

1. Indictment and information ⟸129(2)—Separate crimes connected together may be charged in one indictment and information.

Under Pen. Code, § 954, providing for the charging of different offenses in one indictment or information, the crimes of burglary and robbery may be charged in separate counts in one information where both offenses arise out of the same transaction.

2. Burglary ⟸41(1)—Evidence held to warrant conviction.

In a prosecution for burglary, evidence that defendant obtained entrance to a house upon the pretense of using the telephone to call assistance because his automobile was disabled, and upon entering was followed by a masked and armed accomplice, and that both men then locked the landlady in the bathroom and searched the house for valuables, was sufficient to warrant conviction.

3. Robbery ⟸24(1)—Evidence held sufficient to warrant conviction.

In a prosecution for robbery, evidence that defendant obtained entrance to a house upon pretense of using the telephone to call assistance because his automobile was disabled, and upon entering was followed by a masked and armed accomplice, and that both men, by force and fear, took rings from the person of the landlady, was sufficient to warrant conviction.

4. Criminal law ⟸1172(11)—Failure of judge to indorse all instructions held not prejudicial error.

The failure of the trial judge to indorse every instruction, as required by Pen. Code, § 1127, was not prejudicial error where the only instructions not indorsed were those given, and those modified and refused were indorsed with the judge's decision thereon, and where the instructions were not taken to the jury room, under provision of section 1137, and where defendant was present and knew what instructions were given, refused, and modified.

5. Criminal law ⟸775(6)—Instruction that evidence as to alibi should be closely scrutinized held not erroneous.

An instruction that the defense of alibi was capable of being, and that it had been occasionally successfully fabricated, and that, when false, its detection might be a matter of great difficulty, and that the testimony offered in support of the defense should be closely scrutinized, was not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Walter Sharp was convicted of burglary and robbery, and from the conviction and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Paul Nourse, Fred H. Thompson, and Hale Day, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was charged by the information filed by the district attorney, and in separate counts thereof, with the crimes of burglary and robbery, both alleged to have been committed on the same day. The jury returned separate verdicts finding the defendant guilty of both charges. The court in its judgment declared the conviction to have been of both crimes, and ordered that the defendant be imprisoned "for the term prescribed by law." There was a motion for a new trial, which was denied. The appeal was then taken from the judgment and from the order made denying the motion.

[1-3] Appellant makes several contentions as grounds for reversal of the judgment and order. He contends, first, that under the facts defendant should not have been convicted of two crimes. Section 954, Penal Code, permits prosecuting officers to include in the indictment or information separate and different charges "connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts." By the authority of the provisions of that section the separate offenses described in the information were properly pleaded, and under the facts as the evidence for the prosecution showed them to be the conviction of both offenses must be sustained.

It was established by the testimony offered for the prosecution that on the evening of the 19th of December, 1921, the defendant, at about 8 or 8:30 p. m., appeared at the door at the home of Mrs. Alice Smith in Glendale, Los Angeles county, and asked permission to use Mrs. Smith's telephone, saying that his automobile had become disabled, and he wished to summon assistance. Reluctantly Mrs. Smith allowed him to enter the house. Defendant, upon entering was followed immediately by an accomplice, who wore a mask and carried a gun. With the gun menacing her, Mrs. Smith was compelled to allow one of the men to remove a diamond ring valued at about $1,500 and four other rings from her fingers. She was then compelled to enter a bathroom, and the door was locked behind her. The two men proceeded to make a search of the house for valuables, obtaining some money and other things, after which they departed. The circumstances attending the entry of the defendant to the house of Mrs. Smith were sufficient to show the intent to commit larceny, as was charged in the information. The crime of burglary was completely made out upon such an entrance being shown to have been effected, regardless of whether any property had been secured. In addition to such acts the defendant, by means of force and fear, took from the person of the complainant her rings. This was an act of robbery, and there would appear no reason why it might not be charged separate from the burglary, and a separate conviction had thereon. If it be conceded, for the sake of argument only, that the acts described were so connected together as to amount to but one offense, it may not be said that the judgment was prejudicially erroneous. If the conviction should have been for one offense alone, that conviction might properly have been for the crime of robbery. Under the law a person convicted of robbery may be sentenced to imprisonment for life. The form of judgment as now authorized to be pronounced under the "indeterminate sentence law" (it was sufficiently expressed by the judgment herein) is in legal contemplation a judgment for the maximum period authorized by the statute; hence here, had the conviction been for the crime of robbery alone, the sentence imposed would not have been for a less time than that which was fixed.

[4] Defendant makes claim to two errors as affecting the instructions given by the court to the jury. He asserts, first, that the trial judge failed to obey the law (section 1127, Pen. Code) and indorse upon each charge presented a statement as to whether it had been given, refused, or modified, and, if modified, what the modification consisted of. The clerk certified that the record contained among other things, "instructions refused and given." The first seven or eight pages of these instructions cover various general propositions as to reasonable doubt and definitions of the crimes charged in the information, together with the general advice ordinarily given as to the duty of jurors, rules for determining credibility of witnesses, etc. These instructions bear no indorsement over the judge's signature, except that one was marked as having been given as modified. Immediately following are a number of instructions, apparently offered by the defendant, all of which are indorsed: "Refused, except as given in instructions of court. Charles Monroe, Judge." It is fairly apparent that all of the instructions not specially indorsed, as has been stated, were given by the court. Appellant's counsel makes no contention to the contrary, but insists that the bare failure of the trial judge to particularly indorse each instruction was error prejudicial to the appellant. It is not shown that the instructions were carried to the jury room, or that the jury was in any way mislead by the absence of specific indorsements upon the documents. The law does not provide that instructions in a criminal case must be transmitted to the jury while it deliberates upon a verdict. Section 1137, Penal Code, provides that the jury "may" take "the written instructions given." If such had been the fact, it would be incumbent upon appellant to show that the jury received the written instructions and used them in its deliberations before any claim could be made of misleading or confusing effect arising from the failure of the judge to properly indorse the same. Appellant concededly was advised as to what the instructions were, as given and refused; he was present with his counsel at the time the charge was delivered, and, observing any omission on the part of the trial judge to indorse the proper statements upon the instructions, could have made application to have that done at the time, or thereafter, when the record was prepared. The existence of the indorsements or the lack thereof could have in no way influenced the verdict of the jury, and appellant is not here claiming that he was not advised or is unable to ascertain which of the instructions set forth in the record were actually given. The Attorney General concedes that all of the unindorsed instructions were in fact given.

[5] Appellant offered evidence by his own testimony and that of his sister, brother-in-law and a drug clerk tending to show that he could not have been at the house of Mrs. Smith at "about" the time claimed. This testimony so given did not exclude the possibility of defendant having had the opportunity to be present at the place charged, and at the time shown, but we may assume that it would have justified the jury in so finding, and thus give full effect to the argument of counsel in referring to an instruction on the question of alibi as given by the court. The particular part of the instruction objected to is that which advised the jury that such a defense was capable of being and that it had been "occasionally successfully fabricated," and that, when false, its detection might be a matter of great difficulty, advising the jury further that testimony offered for the purpose of establishing that defense should be closely scrutinized. The case of People v. Smith (Cal. Sup.) 207 Pac. 518, is cited as holding that such an instruction is erroneous. Our Supreme Court, in People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. 183, held an instruction in substance like that referred to to be without error. Later, in the case of People v. Levine, 85 Cal. 39, 22 Pac 969, 24 Pac. 631, and People v. Lattimore, 86 Cal. 403, 24 Pac. 1091, the court disapproved of the instruction, but in none of those cases held the error to be sufficient to require a reversal of the judgment—this because, upon a consideration of the entire charge of the court, it appeared that the jury could not have been misled. In People v. Smith, supra, the case of People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 55 Pac.

137, is referred to as holding a similar instruction to be reversible error. An examination of the latter decision will show that the case was reversed not because the instruction advised the jury to especially scrutinize evidence offered to sustain the defense of an alibi, but rather because the instruction there in effect required the jury to find that there was a "preponderance" of evidence in favor of the defense of alibi before such defense could be considered in the case; the law, of course, being that a reasonable doubt only is required to be raised in order to entitle the defendant to an acquittal. In this case it may be said, as was stated by the court in People v. Lattimore, supra:

"The charge of the court, taken as a whole, was so full and fair to the defendant that we cannot see that any injury resulted to the defendant from this unnecessary instruction in regard to the scrutinizing of the evidence given in support of the defense of alibi."

Appellant complains further of alleged prejudicial conduct on the part of the trial judge in asking leading questions of the defendant, which, it is argued, indicated to the jury a state of mind on the part of the judge adverse to the defendant. The record shows that the judge occasionally during the examination of defendant asked questions, but it was his right so to do, and, considering all of those interrogatories, it cannot be said that they indicated an unfair attitude of mind, or that the asking of them would have the effect of influencing the jury unduly. This is not a case where the jury was called upon to balance with exceedingly close judgment the evidence offered on the part of the prosecution and defense. The case against the defendant was made out upon abundant evidence. He was clearly identified by the complainant and was arrested soon after the commission of the crimes while endeavoring to sell the diamond ring which had been taken from Mrs. Smith's finger at the time of the robbery. It was shown by his own admission that he had, at a prior time, been convicted of the crime of burglary in the state of Texas, that he had been convicted of the crime of burglary in the state of California, and that he was on parole from the state prison when the crimes herein charged were committed. An alleged error referring to the exhibition of a photograph in court calls for no particular discussion. Whether the jury saw the picture does not appear; if it did not, then no error resulted.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HAHN. (Cr. 630.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 5, 1922. Rehearing Denied Sept. 2, 1922.)

1. Robbery ⟸24(3)—Evidence of identity held sufficient to support conviction.

On a trial for robbery, evidence of identity held sufficient to support a verdict of guilty.

2. Criminal law ⟸785(16)—Instruction as to distrusting witness testifying falsely held sufficient.

An instruction that a witness willfully false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others, and that, if the jury finds that a witness has deliberately and willfully testified falsely as to any material matter, and are convinced that he has stated what was untrue, not as a result of mistake or inadvertence, but willfully and with design to deceive, they may treat all of his testimony with distrust, is a sufficient instruction on the subject, and gives defendant no cause for complaint.

3. Criminal law ⟸782(10), 1172(2)—Instruction as to considering evidence in conformity with legal rules, and as to effect of number of witnesses, of no assistance, but not harmful.

Instruction in language of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, that the jury's power of judging the effect of evidence is not arbitrary, but to be exercised with legal discretion, and in subordination to the rules of evidence, and that they are not bound to decide in conformity with declarations of any number of witnesses not producing conviction against a less number, or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying their minds, is not harmful, though of no great assistance.

4. Criminal law ⟸46, 1172(6)—Instruction as to mental capacity held correct, and not prejudicial, though unnecessary.

An instruction that in every crime there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent or criminal negligence, that the intent is manifested by the circumstances and the sound mind and discretion of the person accused, and that all persons are sound mind who are neither idiots, lunatics, nor affected with insanity, embodies a correct legal principle, and is not prejudicial though there is no claim or evidence to the contrary.

5. Criminal law ⟸829(9, 18)—Refusal of charges as to burden of proof and reasonable doubt covered by those given not error.

The refusal of instructions as to burden of proof and reasonable doubt which were amply and clearly covered by charges given was not error.

6. Criminal law ⟸811(4)—Refusal to single out defendant's failure to flee and charge thereon not error.

While defendant's conduct in making no effort to flee after offense was committed was proper subject for argument, the court properly refused to single it out and charge thereon, and, instead, properly charged that it was the jury's duty to carefully and candidly consider the entire evidence and to consider it in the light most favorable to defendant if reasonable and proper, and that if, after considering all the evidence, they had a reasonable doubt of defendant's commission of the offense charged, they should acquit.

7. Criminal law ⟸806(1)—Court not required to repeat instructions already given.

Where a requested instruction had already been given upon request of the people, the court was not required to repeat it.

8. Criminal law ⟸782(4)—Instruction as to proof of identity properly refused because uncertain, and because requiring determination of issue from testimony of one witness.

Instruction that one of the material facts was the identification of defendant by the complaining witness, and that in determining such fact the jury must construe the testimony in the most favorable light toward the defendant, and, unless satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that he had been fully identified by the complaining witness, it was the jury's duty to acquit, was properly refused as "fully identified," was uncertain and meaningless, and the instruction should have required that the identity be established from the whole case rather than the testimony of one witness, especially where the general instructions fully covered the subject.

9. Criminal law ⟸776(5)—Instruction as to evidence of good character held sufficient.

Instruction that defendant had given proof of his previous good character for honesty and integrity, that good character when proven was a fact in the case, and a circumstance tending in greater or less degree to establish innocence, and was not to be put aside to ascertain if the other facts and circumstances by themselves established guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and that, if defendant proved good character, this might be sufficient to create or generate a reasonable doubt, though such doubt would not otherwise have existed, was a sufficient charge on the subject.

10. Criminal law ⟸719(1), 1171(1)—Without evidence of character of resort, disparagement of reputation proved by its habitués held improper, but not prejudicial.

A remark in argument that reputation as to honesty and integrity established by habitués of "the Mecca" was one not appealing to the jury or any respectable people was improper where there was no evidence of the character of the resort mentioned, but not ground for reversal where the evidence of guilt was strong and convincing.

11. Criminal law ⟸728(5)—Objection to argument waived when court not requested to instruct jury to disregard it.

Defendant waived his objection to an improper remark in the argument by not requesting the court to instruct the jury to disregard it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Charles Hahn, whose true name is Charles Scheckmaster, was convicted of robbery, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

J. S. Daly, of Sacramento, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was convicted of robbery, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] One point is that the evidence was insufficient, particularly as to the identification of the defendant by the prosecuting witness to support the verdict. How utterly insubstantial is this claim may be seen from the following testimony. John Gibson, the prosecuting witness, testified:

"I was going home; I was going up Fourth street to go to bed, and I met that big fellow there, and two young fellows, and that fellow. Q. When you say that big fellow, you are referring to the defendant, Scheckmaster? A. Scheckmaster, yes; and I saw all three of them standing near the corner, and I passed by, and, as soon as I passed their corner, two of them jumped in front of me, and this big fellow threw his arm around me. Q. Where did he put his arm around you? A. Like this (indicating); and these other fellows went through my pockets. Q. What, if anything, did they take off of you at that time? A. $50.50 * * * Q. Now, Mr. Gibson, are you sure that the defendant Scheckmaster was the man that held you at the time and in the manner you have described? A. Yes, sir."

He further testified that he saw the defendant and one Hilger, who had been convicted of the same charge by a jury, together that afternoon.

Police Officer J. F. Pierini testified:

That he was on the scene shortly after the holdup; that "I saw two fellows running towards Fourth street, and this fellow Hilger ran towards me. Q. How far away from you were they at that time? A. Well, I couldn't observe the distance, because they were running. I had hold of Hilger taking him over to Jack Gibson who was sitting in the doorway. * * * There was one big man and the others were not very big; about the size of Hilger. Q. But one of them was a large fellow? A. Yes, sir. Q. And, in reference to this defendant, comparatively, was he about the same build? A. About the same. Q. Of course, as I understand you, you did not see his face, and you do not attempt to say that he is actually the defendant? A. No; I arrested the defendant on Jack Gibson's description. * * * I searched Hilger, and took Gibson up and asked him who the fellows were, and he gave me a description of the man that strong-armed him; gave me the description of a man wearing corduroy pants, a blue shirt, and a sweater underneath, and having a dark coat, slouch hat, and a Jewish looking fellow, Roman nose, wearing glasses."

It is indeed rather remarkable that such detailed description of the defendant could be given by the victim, but it would have been even more remarkable if, in view of the foregoing testimony, the jury had failed to convict the defendant.

The other objections relate principally to the action of the court in the matter of instructions, and we find therein no substantial merit.

[2] The requested instruction as to the discredit of a witness who has testified falsely, in a material part of his testimony was covered as follows:

"A witness willfully false in one part of his or her testimony is to be distrusted in others; that is to say, if you find that a witness has deliberately and willfully testified falsely as to any material matter, and the jury are convinced that such witness has stated what was untrue, not as the result of mistake or inadvertence, but willfully and with design to deceive, you may treat all of his or her testimony with distrust."

Of course, it is entirely useless to give such instruction, as the average man does not need to be told that he should distrust a deliberate liar, but, at any rate, appellant has no cause for complaint in that respect.

[3] Appellant thinks the court committed error in giving this instruction:

"Your power of judging of the effect of evidence is not arbitrary, but is to be exercised with legal discretion and in subordination to the rules of evidence. You are not bound to decide in conformity with declarations of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in your minds, against a less number or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying your minds."

The Legislature has prescribed that this instruction shall be given (section 2061, Code Civ. Proc.), and, while it may be of no assistance to the jury, involving, as it does, a mere legal platitude, it assuredly can do no harm. It is given in nearly every case, and this is the first time that we have known such action to be criticized.

[4] It may be that there was no necessity for giving this instruction:

"In every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent or criminal negligence. The intent or intention with which an act is committed is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the person accused. All persons are of sound mind who are neither idiots, lunatics, nor affected with insanity."

It embodies, at any rate, a correct legal principle, and if, as argued by appellant, there was no claim or evidence to the contrary, it is manifest that the instruction could have resulted in no prejudice.

[5] The instructions as to the burden of proof and of reasonable doubt, proposed by defendant, were amply and clearly covered by the charge of the court.

[6] There was no error in the refusal of the proposed instruction in reference to the conduct of the defendant in making no effort to flee after the offense was committed. It was a subject for legitimate argument by counsel before the jury, but the court was not called upon to single out a particular circumstance in evidence, but pursued the proper course in directing the jury that—

"In arriving at your verdict, it is your duty to carefully and candidly consider the entire evidence in the case," and "it is the duty of the jury to consider the evidence in the light most favorable to the defendant if it is reasonable and probable, and if the jury, after considering all the evidence, have a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant committed the offense charged in the information it is their duty to acquit."

[7] The instruction proposed by defendant, beginning, "The defendant in this case is entitled to the independent judgment of every juror who has been selected to try him," was given on request of the people and, manifestly, the court could not be expected to repeat it.

Appellant has no ground for complaint because his proposed instruction as to the testimony of the defendant was refused, since it was covered by this direction:

"The jury has no right to disregard the testimony of the defendant on the ground that he is the defendant and stands charged with the commission of a crime. The law presumes the defendant to be innocent until he has been proven guilty; the jury should fairly and impartially consider his testimony together with all the other evidence in the case."

[8] The refusal to give this proposed instruction:

"You are instructed that one of the material facts in this case is the identification of the defendant in the robbery by the complaining witness, John Gibson, and you are further instructed that, in determining the testimony upon that fact, you must construe it in the most favorable light toward the defendant, and, unless you are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant has been fully identified by the complaining witness, John Gibson, then it is your duty to find the defendant not guilty"

—was entirely justified for the reasons stated by the trial judge, as follows:

"First. There is a general instruction given to consider testimony most favorably to defendant. Second. The jury are instructed elsewhere that before defendant can be convicted it must be shown that he committed the crime. Third. The term 'fully identified' as used is uncertain and meaningless. Fourth. The general instructions amply cover the ground. Fifth. The proper instruction would be that if from the whole case rather than from the testimony of one witness the identity has not been established."

[9] Appellant's complaint of the refusal to give the proper instruction as to evidence of good character is completely answered by quoting the following, which was given:

"The defendant has given proof of his previous good characer for honesty and integrity. The good character of the defendant, when proven, is itself a fact in the case. It is a circumstance tending in a greater or less degree, to establish his innocence, and it is not to be put aside by the jury, in order to ascertain if the other facts and circumstances, considered by themselves, do not establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. If the defendant be proved of good character for honesty and integrity such good character may be sufficient to create or generate a reasonable doubt of his guilt, although no such doubt would have existed but for such good character."

[10, 11] In this connection appellant justly criticizes the assistant district attorney in stating to the jury in his closing argument:

"Now the reputation of a man, I submit to you, as to honesty and integrity, that is established by the habitués of the Mecca, is one which I am sure would not appeal to this jury, or any 12 respectable people in Sacramento."

There was no evidence offered as to the present character of this resort, which it seems, was formerly the "Casino" of rather unsavory reputation, and the prosecutor should have omitted the innuendo. However, the court was not requested to instruct the jury to disregard it, and thus appellant waived his objection to it. In fact, in view of the strong and convincing evidence of the guilt of the defendant, an error of such trivial importance should not be treated seriously.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re VAUGHAN. (Cr. 2403.)

1. Attorney and client ⟸53(2)—Evidence in disbarment proceeding held to support charges.

Evidence in disbarment proceeding held sufficient to sustain charges that accused made a false affidavit to obtain a continuance, and used bonds recovered from a third person on behalf of a client to secure a personal loan.

2. Witnesses ⟸293½—Defendant not entitled to decline to testify in disbarment proceeding.

While a disbarment proceeding is a quasi criminal action, it is not such a criminal prosecution as entitles defendant to decline to testify on the ground that he cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself under Const. art. 1, § 13, though he may decline to answer questions tending to incriminate him.

3. Attorney and client ⟸49—Purpose of disbarment proceeding stated.

The purpose of a disbarment proceeding is to determine the fitness of an officer of the court to continue in that capacity, and not to punish accused.

4. Attorney and client ⟸54—Refusal to wait longer for depositions held not error.

In disbarment proceeding, where accused was given ample time to prepare depositions and notice of the day on which they would be required, and though the time was extended they were not received within the extended time, the court did not err in refusing to wait longer for them, especially where the only matter thereby shown not already in evidence was immaterial.

5. Health ⟸24—Duty of one quarantined to stay inside, whether house guarded or not.

It was the duty of one whose house was quarantined to stay inside, whether the house was being guarded or not.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Proceeding to disbar Arthur C. Vaughan, attorney and counselor at law. From a judgment of disbarment, respondent appeals. Affirmed.

John L. Richardson, T. E. Parke, Davis, Rush & McDonald, S. W. Thompson, Samuel R. Blake, William B. Beirne, and Arthur C. Vaughan, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. P. Jennings, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This proceeding was instituted in the superior court of Los Angeles county by the Los Angeles Bar Association to secure the disbarment of Arthur C. Vaughan, an attorney, who was charged with violating his oath as attorney and with the commission of acts involving moral turpitude, dishonesty, and corruption. The cause having been heard, it was adjudged that accused be disbarred, his name be stricken from the roll of attorneys, and that he be permanently deprived of the right to practice as an attorney or counselor in the courts of this state. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

Three separate offenses were charged in the accusation. It was alleged that in 1916 one H. P. Proctor employed appellant to take an appeal in a case entitled Riva v. Rabe et al., to which action Proctor was a party; that Proctor paid appellant, at the latter's request, $120, for the specific purpose of being used as expenses in preparing and printing the transcript and briefs on appeal; that appellant for a long time represented to Proctor that he was attending to the matter of the appeal, but that he did not do so; that he converted the $120 wholly to his own use, knowing he had no right to do so, and that he failed and refused to return the money to Proctor, although the transcript and briefs were never filed. As a second act of misconduct it was alleged that for the purpose of obtaining an extension of time to file a supersedeas bond in the case of Gordon v. Hillman (Cal. App.) 191 Pac. 62, then pending before this court, appellant made and filed an affidavit in this court, wherein he stated he made the affidavit on behalf of his client because "said C. D. Hillman is confined to his residence, and is not permitted to leave because of the quarantine existing," and with which affidavit he inclosed a letter from the health department, wherein it was said the residence of C. D. Hillman had been under quarantine, and that Hillman had not been permitted to leave the house; that these statements were untrue, and that appellant well knew that Hillman had not been confined to his home, but that he had been in court on one of the days the alleged quarantine had been in effect, and that the affidavit had been filed with the purpose of misleading and deceiving this court. The allegations of the third count were to the effect that during the year 1916 appellant was employed by one Edna A. Brown to procure from one Peck certain bonds which had been deposited with Peck by their owner, one E. S. Crocker, as security for a contract Edna A. Brown had with Peck; that appellant recovered the bonds from Peck; that, knowing the bonds were the property of Crocker, and that Edna A. Brown was obligated to return them to him, appellant delivered them to one Orvill Lathrop as security for a personal loan of $600, which sum was obtained for his own use.

In his answer appellant alleged he had conducted the case of Riva v. Rabe to Proctor's satisfaction, and had prepared the brief and transcript, although the taking of the appeal was delayed; that he had offered to turn over the case, together with the money paid him, to other counsel, and denied he had converted the money to his own use, or had failed or refused to return it to Proctor. Answering the second count, he denied he intended to deceive this court by filing the affidavit, admitted he knew Hillman was in court on one occasion during the quarantine, and alleged that Hillman told him he got away through the rear of his premises, but did not know whether he would be able to get out again; that he was later informed Hillman was confined to his home, and had requested him to get an extension of time to file the bond; that he procured the letter from the board of health, saying Hillman would not be permitted to leave during the quarantine, and that the affidavit was made in good faith. With reference to the third count, appellant denied the allegations of the accusation, and alleged that he had turned the bonds over to Lathrop with Edna A. Brown's consent to raise money to apply on an attorney's fee which she owed him.

1. Appellant contends the evidence is insufficient, under all three counts, to warrant a judgment of disbarment. In its judgment the court recited that it appeared appellant was guilty of each of the acts charged against him, and that each of the acts did involve moral turpitude and dishonesty on his part. It is evident from this statement that the court regarded each of the acts charged as sufficient to constitute a cause of disbarment, and that its judgment was not dependent on proof of the three charges as a whole.

With reference to the first charge, it appears that the appeal on behalf of Proctor was not instituted until after this action was commenced. Appellant denied he appropriated the $120, and testified that such of it as was not used in prosecuting the appeal he kept in specie in a box at his home, and that he still had about $50 of it there at the time this cause was heard. Respondent offered no affirmative testimony to disprove this statement, but apparently relied on the cross-examination of appellant to discredit his story. It must be assumed from the judgment of disbarment that the trial court did not believe appellant's account of the disposition of the money, but concluded that it had been converted to his own use. However this may be, there can be no doubt of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the other two charges.

[1] The evidence under the second count shows that for a few days preceding January 24, 1919, appellant and his client, C. D. Hillman, had been in San Francisco appearing before this court in the matter of giving a supersedeas bond, which was continued until February 4, and that they had returned to Los Angeles by January 26. It was admitted Hillman was in court with appellant in Los Angeles on January 27. On February 1 appellant filed the affidavit in question with this court, in which he stated that Hillman's house was quarantined, and that Hillman was unable to attend to the matter of the bond; that appellant made the affidavit on Hillman's behalf because Hillman was "confined to his residence, and is not permitted to leave because of the quarantine existing." Attached to and made a part of the affidavit was a letter from the health department, stating that Hillman's house had been under quarantine since January 21, and that Hillman "has not been permitted to leave the premises." The plain purport of the affidavit and letter is that Hillman was at all times confined to his premises, and could not get away, either to attend to the securing of the bond or the making of the affidavit. Inasmuch as Hillman was in court with appellant at least once during the time referred to, the affidavit is manifestly false. The request for an extension of time was therefore based on an untruth, and the effect of the affidavit could only have been to mislead this court. It follows there is no merit in appellant's contention that the court erred in refusing to dismiss the case as to this count or in impliedly finding that the allegations of the accusation with reference to it were true.

The testimony of Edna A. Brown, given by deposition, and that of E. S. Crocker, is sufficient to support the implied finding that appellant committed the act charged in the third count. E. S. Crocker testified, among other things, that he delivered the bonds to Peck. Edna A. Brown testified that she employed appellant to procure the return of the bonds for her; that he informed her that he had recovered them; that when she went to get them "I asked Mr. Vaughan for the bonds, and he said that he had pledged them at the bank for a few days; that he needed some money badly, and got some at the bank —about $200 or $250. I was quite astonished and said: 'Why, Mr. Vaughan, why did you do that?' for I never authorized Mr. Vaughan to pledge the bonds for his or anybody's use. He said as long as he was my attorney he thought it would be all right"; that she told him the bonds belonged to E. S. Crocker, she thought at the time she asked him to get them back from Peck, and that she had demanded them from appellant several times. Appellant testified that he borrowed $600 on the bonds. This evidence is sufficient to justify the trial court in concluding that the allegations of the accusation with reference to this count are true, and it must be assumed the trial court rejected as untrue appellant's explanations of his acts, which were the same as those alleged in the answer.

[2, 3] 2. It is insisted by appellant that the court erred in allowing him to be called to the stand and compelled to testify over his objection. He contends the disbarment proceedings are in the nature of a criminal action, and that the accused in such a case should be accorded the same right to refuse to testify as is a defendant charged with the commission of a crime. This position cannot be maintained. Although it has been held that an accusation is in the nature of a criminal charge (Matter of Haymond, 121 Cal. 385, 53 Pac. 899) and that a proceeding on such a charge is a quasi-criminal action (In re McCowan, 177 Cal. 93, 170 Pac. 1100) "this court has uniformly treated disbarment proceedings as peculiar to themselves, and governed exclusively by the Code sections specifically covering them." Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 108 Pac. 322. The purpose of such a proceeding is to determine the fitness of an officer of the court to continue in that capacity, and it has been said the disbarment of attorneys is not intended for the punishment of the individual, but for the protection of the courts and the legal profession. Ex parte Finley, 97 S. C. 37, 81 S. E. 279. The proceeding differs from a criminal action in several ways. Thus it is provided in section 297 of the Code of Civil Procedure that if the accused "refuse to answer the accusation, the court shall proceed to judgment of removal or suspension." "The rule in criminal cases that the failure of the accused to testify in his own behalf shall not be considered against him does not apply to proceedings for disbarment of an attorney, and such failure may be considered in weighing the evidence offered against him." 6 C. J. 608. In the case of In re Wellcome, 23 Mont. 450, 59 Pac. 445, the court said:

"It is urged by counsel that the failure on the part of the accused to be sworn in his own behalf may not be used to his prejudice. Counsel say that this is, to all intents and purposes, a criminal investigation, and that the rule laid down on this subject in section 2442 of the Penal Code should be applied. The answer to this is that 'this is not a criminal prosecution, nor an aid to a criminal investigation, but is to ascertain if the accused is worthy of the confidence, and is possessed of that good moral character, which is a condition precedent to the privilege of practicing law and continuing in the practice thereof.' In re Wellcome, 23 Mont. 213, 58 Pac. 47. This is a special proceeding of a civil nature, and the rules applicable to criminal cases do not apply. In re Wellcome, 23 Mont. 259, 58 Pac. 711; In re Randel, 158 N. Y. 216, 52 N. E. 1106. If the accused is not guilty, nothing would have been easier than for him to deny all knowledge of the charges laid at his door. His having failed to testify in his own defense, when he should do so, and deny the statements of Whiteside and Clark, not only justifies, but irresistibly impels, this court, upon the evidence before it, which is credible, to the conclusion that he is guilty."

In our opinion, in view of these considerations, this is not such a criminal prosecution against appellant as would entitle him to decline to testify on the ground that he cannot be compelled "to be a witness against himself" (Const. Cal., art. 1, § 13), but he may be called and examined for the information of the court, without, of course, infringing his right to decline to answer questions propounded to him on the ground that his testimony would tend to incriminate him.

[4, 5] 3. It is insisted the court committed error in refusing to continue the case until the depositions of C. D. Hillman and his wife concerning the matters charged in the second count of the accusation could be obtained. The record shows the taking of these depositions was discussed by the parties in court at the opening of the trial on December 16, 1920, and that it was stipulated the case would be held open for their reception until December 23. Several times during the course of the trial the depositions were mentioned, and counsel for appellant was reminded by the court that they would be due on that date. The depositions were not procured by December 23, and appellant was given until 4:30 p. m. of December 28 to present them to the court. They were not presented by noon of December 29, and although it was shown they were in the mail from San Francisco to Los Angeles, the court, due partly to the pressure of its business, declined to continue the action further for their introduction. The court remarked that from the statement of counsel for appellant as to what he proposed to prove by them that the only matter to be contained in the depositions which was not already in evidence was a statement that Hillman's house was watched during the quarantine, so that he could not get out. The statement of the trial judge indicated that in rendering the decision he was considering the matters already in evidence which would have been contained in the depositions. As to those matters which were not in evidence, it would have made no difference whether the house was watched or not, for, as remarked by the trial judge, if it was quarantined it was Hillman's duty to stay inside without being guarded. The important factor was that, while giving the quarantine as an excuse for being unable to confer with his client, appellant did communicate with him and appeared in court with him, and therefore there could have been no prejudice in the ruling. Appellant was given ample time to prepare the depositions and notice of the day on which they would be required, and in view of these circumstances it cannot be said the court erred in refusing to wait longer for them.

4. Appellant assigns error to the admission of certain evidence tending to prove the allegations of the first count, and the refusal of the court to dismiss the accusation as to that count. But in view of our conclusion as to the sufficiency of the evidence on the three counts, it is unnecessary to discuss this point.

In re CONNICK'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9949.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 12, 1922.)

Executors and administrators ⟹17(7)—Death of nominator prior to appointment destroyed nominee's right to administer.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1365, 1379, authorizing the surviving husband or wife, or such other person as is entitled to administer, to appoint an administrator, a person other than the surviving husband or wife has no right to appoint a nominee, unless nominator is himself competent to serve as determined by state of facts at time of appointment; hence the death of a nominator other than the surviving husband or wife before the appointment destroys nominee's right to administer.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Catherine Matilda Connick, deceased. From an order denying the petition of Achsa J. Connick to be appointed administratrix and granting the petition of Henry A. Hansen, Public Administrator of Humboldt County, petitioner Achsa J. Connick appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. G. Weaver, of Eureka, for appellant.

Jas. W. Henderson, of Eureka, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This appeal is from an order of the superior court denying the petition of one Achsa J. Connick to be appointed administratrix of the estate of Catherine Matilda Connick, deceased, and granting the petition of Henry A. Hansen, public administrator of the county of Humboldt, to be appointed administrator of said estate. The facts as shown by the record are undisputed, and are briefly these: Catherine Matilda Connick died on December 24, 1905, leaving as her sole heir at law her son, Amos H. Connick. On November 9, 1920, Amos H. Connick, being himself competent to be appointed administrator of his mother's estate, executed a request to the court in writing for the appointment of H. G. Gross, C. H. Palmtag, and Achsa J. Connick to act as administrators of said estate, waiving therein his own right to act as such administrator. On April 6, 1921, said Amos H. Connick died. Thereafter H. G. Gross and C. H. Palmtag each executed their waiver in writing of their right to administer said estate under said requested appointment, and requested the court to appoint Achsa J. Connick as the sole administratrix of the estate of said Catherine Matilda Connick, deceased. On April 9, 1921, said Achsa J. Connick filed her petition to be appointed administratrix of said estate, alleging therein that she was a niece of said Catherine Matilda Connick, deceased, and as such was entitled to letters of administration therein. On April 14, 1921, Henry A. Hansen, public administrator of the county in which the proceedings for the administration of said estate were pending, filed his written opposition to the petition of said Achsa J. Connick for letters of administration of said estate, alleging that said Achsa J. Connick was not an heir of said deceased, and that there was no heir of said deceased now residing in the state of California. He, therefore, made application to be appointed the administrator of said estate as the only person qualified to become such, and prayed that his said application be granted, and that letters of administration be issued to him. These opposing petitions were set for hearing for April 24, 1921, but on that day Achsa J. Connick obtained an order continuing the hearing thereon until May 2, 1921. On April 29, 1921, said Achsa J. Connick for the first time filed the document wherein Amos H. Connick requested the court to appoint her as the administratrix of said estate and had waived his own right to administer thereon. On May 2, 1921, the hearing upon both petitions came on before the court, upon and after which the order was made denying the petition of Achsa J. Connick to be appointed administratrix of said estate, and granting the petition of said Henry A. Hansen for letters of administration therein. It is from this order that Achsa J. Connick has taken and prosecutes this appeal.

The sole question presented upon this appeal is as to the prior right of the appellant to be appointed administratrix of said estate; she insists that she had that right by virtue of the written request for her appointment executed by Amos H. Connick, the sole heir of said decedent, a short time prior to his death. She insists that her right to such appointment became absolute upon the death of said Amos H. Connick and was unaffected thereby, and hence that the trial court should have granted her said application. We are unable to agree with this contention. The privilege of seeking appointment as administrator of the estate of a deceased person, which is predicated upon the written request of the surviving husband or wife of the decedent or of such other person as is entitled to administer, is entirely of statutory origin, and arises by virtue of sections 1365 and 1379 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The first of these sections confers upon the surviving husband or wife the right of requesting the appointment of some competent person, and it has been held that this right inheres in the surviving husband or wife, even though they are not themselves competent to receive the appointment. Estate of Cotter, 54 Cal. 215; Estate of Stevenson, 72 Cal. 164, 13 Pac. 404; Estate of Dorris, 93 Cal. 611; Estate of Myers, 9 Cal. App. 694, 100 Pac. 712. These cases do not, however, hold, as is insisted by the appellant, that the nominee of a surviving husband or wife has the absolute right to be appointed by virtue thereof, but, on the contrary, it has been held that the nomination of a surviving husband or wife can be retracted or revoked by the nominor at any time before the hearing upon the application based thereon. Estate of Shiels, 120 Cal. 347, 52 Pac. 808; Estate of Lowe, 178 Cal. 111, 172 Pac. 583. A similar right of retraction of the nomination of a person for appointment as administrator, conferred under the terms of section 1379 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was also recognized in the early case of Estate of Kirtlan, 16 Cal. 165, the limitation in each class of cases being that the nominor, whether husband or wife of the decedent or other person entitled to administer, may be estopped to withdraw such nomination where the nominee has gone to the trouble and expense of seeking the appointment on the faith of the nomination. Estate of Kirtlan, supra; Estate of Lowe, supra. The only real difference between the two sections of the Code of Civil Procedure above referred to is that by virtue of section 1365 a surviving husband or wife, though themselves incompetent to serve, may confer upon some competent person the right to be appointed, while by section 1379 only the nominee of one who is himself competent to serve can be considered by the court. Estate of Bedell, 97 Cal. 339, 32 Pac. 323. The effect of these decisions is not only to destroy that portion of appellant's contention that the nominee of a person other than the surviving husband or wife entitled to administer gains thereby an absolute and irrevocable right to seek such administration which cannot be affected by the subsequent change in the status of the nominor; but it would also seem to follow logically therefrom that the right of such nominee to receive the appointment as administrator must be determined by the state of facts existing at the time such appointment is to be made, and if at such time the nominor has either rightfully withdrawn his nomination or has become himself for any reason incompetent or no longer entitled to be appointed such administrator, the right of his nominee to receive such appointment must also be held to have ceased. It follows that the trial court was correct in its refusal to appoint the appellant herein as administratrix of said estate and in the making of its order appointing the public administrator to serve as the administrator thereof.

Order affirmed.

1. Judgment ⟸98—When all defendants served, clerk may enter one's default, but cannot enter judgment.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1, and section 414, where in an action against several defendants all have been served and are before the court, the clerk has authority to enter default of one of the defendants, but not to enter judgment on such default.

2. Judgment ⟸238—Action against corporation and stockholders within statute as to entry of judgment against some defendants.

In action against corporation for breach of contract and against the stockholders on their liability as such, the liability being several, Code Civ. Proc. § 579, authorizing judgment against one or more defendants, leaving the action to proceed against the others applies.

3. Judgment ⟸271—Discretion as to entering judgment against some defendants must be exercised by court and not by clerk.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 579, providing that when a several judgment is proper the court in its discretion may render judgment against one or more defendants, leaving the action to proceed against the others, the discretion is a judicial one, to be exercised by the court and not by the clerk.

4. Judgment ⟸18(2)—Not void if court has jurisdiction and complaint apprises defendant of nature of demand.

A judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, whether or not the complaint states a cause of action, so long as it apprises defendant of the nature of plaintiff's demand.

5. Sales ⟸377—Complaint held sufficient to give court jurisdiction.

In action against corporation for breach of contract of sale and against the stockholders on their liability as such, complaint held sufficient to give the court jurisdiction, though not alleging the market value at place of delivery; that title had passed to defendants, or that plaintiff had a lien; that the goods were in existence or in plaintiff's possession; that the contract was a sale, and not an agreement to sell or the value of the goods in the nearest market.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by the Trans-Pacific Trading Company against the Patsy Frock & Romper Company and others. From a default judgment and an order denying a motion to set aside the default and judgment, defendant William I. Zidell appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Wm. I. Zidell, one of the defendants, appeals from a judgment entered against him on his default, and from an order denying his motion to set aside the default and judgment.

Respondent, the Trans-Pacific Trading Company, commenced this action on December 1, 1920, alleging in its complaint that the Patsy Frock & Romper Company and itself were duly organized corporations; that defendant Patsy Frock & Romper Company and appellant executed a written order directed to respondent, by which the defendants agreed to buy 330 bolts of Japanese cotton crepe for a total sum of $5,940; that on April 21, 1920, respondent accepted the order; that it delivered to defendants and received payment for 164 bolts of the crepe; that thereafter, on April 27, 1920, without cause or reason therefor, defendants notified respondent that they would not accept or receive any more of the crepe; that on November 17, 1920, after giving defendants reasonable notice, and giving the notice required by law, respondent sold the balance of the crepe in open market at the best price obtainable, for the sum of $996; that the expense of the resale was $55; that the difference between the resale price and the contract price was $1,992. It was alleged that appellant owned 500 shares, defendant Florence Westover 250 shares, and defendant S. B. Lafferty 250 shares of the total of 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant Patsy Frock & Romper Company, and that there was due and owing from them $996, $498, and $498, respectively.

For a second cause of action respondent alleged that on May 12, 1920, the defendant Patsy Frock & Romper Company and appellant ordered 500 bolts of Japanese cotton crepe at a total price of $8,200; that respondent on May 13, 1920, accepted the order; that defendants refused to accept any of the crepe, which was sold, at an expense of $55, for $3,000, or $5,200 below the contract price; and that there was due and owing from appellant $2,600, from defendant Florence Westover $1,300, and from defendant S. B. Lafferty $1,300. Judgment was prayed against the corporation for $7,192; against appellant Wm. I. Zidell and defendants Florence Westover and S. B. Lafferty for $3,596, $1,798, and $1,798, respectively.

Appellant failed to appear and answer the complaint, and on December 21, 1920, his default was entered by the clerk. Pursuant thereto the clerk, on July 22, 1921, entered judgment against him as prayed. On August 11, 1921, more than six months after the entry of the default, appellant moved to set aside the default and judgment on the grounds that the complaint did not state a cause of action, and that no authority existed for the entry of the default and judgment by the clerk. The motion also asked for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In support of his motion appellant filed affidavits of himself and of Edwin A. Meserve, his attorney, which were to the effect that appellant's failure to appear in the action was due to a misunderstanding between appellant and the said Edwin A. Meserve, appellant supposing that the said Edwin A. Meserve was appearing for him, and the said Edwin A. Meserve believing he had been retained by defendant S. B. Lafferty to represent all the defendants except appellant, who, he believed, was represented by other counsel. On August 26, 1921, the motion was denied, and this appeal is from that order and the judgment.

[1] Respondent's entire argument is addressed to the question of whether or not the judgment is void because the complaint failed to state a cause of action. Appellant, however, also contends that the clerk was without power to enter the default and judgment against appellant.

Section 585, subdivision 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, is as follows:

"In an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if the defendant has been personally served and no answer has been filed with the clerk of the court within the time specified in the summons, or such further time as may have been granted, the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the default of the defendant, and immediately thereafter enter judgment for the amount demanded in the complaint, including the costs, against the defendant, or against one or more of several defendants in the cases provided for in section four hundred and fourteen."

Section 414 provides that—

"When the action is against two or more defendants jointly or severally liable on a contract, and the summons is served on one or more, but not on all of them, the plaintiff may proceed against the defendants served in the same manner as if they were the only defendants."

In Crossman v. Vivienda Water Co., 136 Cal. 571, 69 Pac. 220, the same point, that under section 414 the clerk could not enter the judgment because all the parties had been served with summons and were before the court was presented, but not decided. It is clear that no authority is vested in the clerk by the sections above quoted to enter a judgment when all the defendants have been served and are before the court, even though a joint and several judgment would be proper. Section 414 is expressly limited to cases where some only of the defendants have been served with summons. In Junkans v. Bergin, 64 Cal. 203, 30 Pac. 627, the court declared:

"The clerk is a minister or servant of the law, to act in that state of the case in which the law orders him to act. Then only is his action valid."

And in Stearns v. Aguirre, 7 Cal. 443, 449, it was said:

"If a judgment is pronounced by a court having jurisdiction, no matter how irregular it may be, it must stand until set aside, or reversed on appeal; but when entered by a mere ministerial officer, without authority of law, it is wholly void."

However, it is apparent that the words of limitation—"in the cases provided for in section four hundred and fourteen"—relate only to the provision for entry of the judgment by the clerk, and not to the entry of the default. The clerk is directed to enter the default of a defendant in all cases of the class mentioned in subdivision 1 of section 585, but to enter judgment only in the cases provided in section 414. That this is the meaning of the section is shown by the statement of this court in Alpers v. Schammel, 75 Cal. 590, 593, 17 Pac. 708, 709, wherein two of three defendants were served and appeared, but where there was no evidence that the third had been served. A verdict was rendered against all three, concerning which it was said:

"This verdict could only regularly have been against the defendants who appeared and answered. It could not have been against Bolte if he was served, and had lived until the trial, unless he had answered. If he was served and failed to answer, then his default should regularly have been entered." (Italics ours.)

It follows that the act of the clerk in entering the default was proper, but that he acted in excess of his powers in entering the judgment.

[2, 3] In the case at bar all the defendants had been served, and the complaint prayed judgment against appellant and his codefendants, except the corporation, for the amount of their liability as stockholders. The liability of the defendants and appellant as stockholders being several (Brown v. Merrill, 107 Cal. 446, 40 Pac. 557, 48 Am. St. Rep. 145), the case falls under section 579 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides:

"In an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper."

Under this section the discretion vested is a judicial one, to be exercised by the court, and not the clerk. The court erred in refusing to exercise this discretion and vacate the judgment entered by the clerk against appellant. If the trial court sees fit to render another judgment of like effect, its action will be valid unless it involves an abuse of discretion. If it refuses to do so, the case can proceed to trial upon the issues tendered by the answers of the other defendants, and at its conclusion a judgment may be rendered settling the rights and obligations of all the parties, including those of appellant.

[4, 5] 2. Appellant's second point is that the judgment is void because the complaint does not state a cause of action, in that there is no allegation as to what was the market value of the goods in question at the place of delivery; that title to them had passed to appellant and his codefendants, or that in consequence thereof respondent had a lien on the goods in his possession for the purchase price; that the goods were in existence or in respondent's possession; that the contract between the parties was a sale and not an agreement to sell, or as to what the value of the goods was in the market nearest the place where the goods should have been delivered. It was said in Christerson v. French, 180 Cal. 523, 182 Pac. 27:

"The respondent contends further that the judgment is void because the complaint fails to state a cause of action. It is well established that a judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, irrespective of whether or not the complaint states a cause of action so long as it apprises the defendant of the nature of the plaintiff's demand. [Citing cases.] We think the complaint herein sufficiently states a cause of action to inform the defendant of the nature of the claim against him and to give the court jurisdiction of the cause."

It appears from the description we have already given of the complaint that it was ample to give the court jurisdiction of the cause.

The order is reversed, and the trial court is directed to vacate the judgment entered by the clerk, the default to stand.

MURPHY v. KOFORD, Superior Court Judge. (S. F. 10106.)

Appeal and error ⊂=465(2)—Appellant entitled to have stay bond fixed, though appeal was frivolous.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 945, appellant was entitled to have the trial court fix a stay bond for an appeal from an order granting a writ of execution for the sale of described realty, even though the appeal was vexatious and frivolous and the order would necessarily be sustained.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Ella M. Murphy against Joseph S. Koford, as Judge of the Superior Court for the County of Alameda, Cal. Writ granted.

Hayes, Oliphant & Dukette, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Keyes & Erskine and Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. The petitioner asks for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court to fix a bond on appeal from an order of the court below declaring that the defendant in the action was entitled to a writ of execution upon a previous judgment for the sale of the property therein described. The order was made on the 30th day of September, 1921.

The judgment upon which the order was made was dated September 28, 1920, and declared that the defendant would be entitled to a writ of execution for the sale of the property described, unless the plaintiff, within 90 days from the date on which defendant offered her a deed, duly signed and acknowledged, for said property, should tender to the defendant the sum of $4,485, with interest thereon after said tender. On December 31, 1920, a deed was tendered her by said defendant, and the time for payment was extended to July 15, 1921, by stipulation. On that day the plaintiff appeared at the office of Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, and tendered said amount to Fred G. Athearn, one of the attorneys for the said defendant. Athearn, at that time, did not have charge of the matter, and was ignorant of the details of the said transaction. On that account he said he would neither accept nor refuse the tender. He did, however, tender the deed which had been previously tendered by said defendant to Ella M. Murphy, and it was rejected because of alleged defects therein. From the said order of September 30, 1921, she has appealed, and now applies to this court, as aforesaid, for an order fixing the amount of bond to be executed on behalf of said plaintiff, which the court below refused.

It cannot be said that the order of September 30, 1921, does not require the sale of real property. It expressly directs that a writ of execution issue to the sheriff, commanding him to sell the real property described in the previous judgment, to satisfy the sum of $4,485, with interest thereon from December 31, 1920. It required a finding, and the finding was made, that the defendant had tendered a deed on that date to the plaintiff. Hence the provisions of section 945 of the Code of Civil Procedure apply to the case, and the plaintiff is entitled to a stay of execution on giving the required undertaking.

The only objection that is made to the application is that the appeal is vexatious and frivolous because it is without merit, and the order would necessarily be sustained. This is not sufficient. The statute gives a party a right of appeal, and authorizes a stay of execution on the filing of the undertaking. This is without regard to the merits of the appeal. A stay may be had as well on a frivolous appeal as on any other. We are not at liberty to add to the statutory requirements.

Let a writ issue as prayed for.

INDUSTRIAL LOAN & INVESTMENT CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 10381.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 15, 1922.)

Exemptions ⊂=92—Party cannot by contractual stipulation waive prospective exemption.

A provision in a note that all of the parties waive their rights of exemption as to debt does not disentitle the party against whom the judgment thereon had been rendered to a salary exemption, under Code Civ. Proc. § 690, as a debtor cannot in advance waive the privilege of claiming an exemption.

In Bank.

Application for writ of prohibition by the Industrial Loan & Investment Company of San Francisco, to be directed to the Superior Court of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and Judge James M. Troutt. Writ denied.

William Sea, Jr., of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Cameron H. King, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, C. J. The petitioner recovered a judgment in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against Cameron H. King for a certain sum of money. On the 28th day of August, 1922, he filed a transcript of said judgment and an affidavit of his attorney setting forth that money was due and unpaid thereon, and that the transcript and affidavit were so filed for the purpose of holding up the salary of said King as an employee of the said city and county for payment by warrant of said auditor for the month of July, 1922, and applying the same on said judgment; that said King threatens that he will make an affidavit to the judge claiming said salary, under section 690, subdivision 10, of the Code of Civil Procedure, as exempt from execution, and said judge threatens that if said affidavit is presented he will sign an order releasing the said salary warrant of said King for the month of August, 1922. Wherefore he asks a writ of prohibition to prevent the judge from signing such an order.

Petitioner avers that the defendant in signing the note upon which the judgment was founded waived the exemption laws by inserting the following clause in said note:

"The parties to this instrument, whether maker, indorser, surety or guarantor, each for himself, hereby severally waive as to this debt, or any renewal thereof all right of exemption under the Constitution and laws of California or of any other state, as to personal property."

He claims that by virtue of this clause in the contract defendant has waived all exemption provided by the statute. In making this claim he is relying on the decisions of this court in Keybers v. McComber, 67 Cal. 400, 7 Pac. 838; Borland v. O'Neal, 22 Cal. 506, and Stanton v. French, 83 Cal. 194, 23 Pac. 355.

Each of these cases involve a claim made by the debtor, or some one in his behalf, at the very time of the levy. In each of them it is said that the exemption of property is a personal privilege which the debtor may waive, and that a failure to claim the exemption at the time it is levied on by the officers is a waiver of such privilege. But this rule does not apply to stipulations in an executory contract such as that sued on here. As to such cases the rule is that the debtor cannot waive the privilege of claiming the exemption in advance. This rule is based on the theory that exemption laws are made for the benefit of the debtor and his family, and that it is against public policy for him to waive any benefits of the law in advance of the time when it is necessary for him to do so. If it were not for this rule, it is said, creditors would insist on inserting the clause waiving exemption laws in every executory contract. These would usually be made at a time when the debtor was in need of money, and would be enforceable at some time in the future when, perhaps, he or his family would require the exemption. By doing so he would waive practically all the benefits of the exemption law. We approve of this doctrine, and hold that such a waiver cannot be enforced. This rule has been followed by all the states except Pennsylvania. See cases cited in note to paragraph 192, 25 Corpus Juris, page 111.

The writ of prohibition is denied.

We concur: LENNON, J.; WASTE, J.; WILBUR, J.; RICHARDS, Justice pro tem.

BULLARD v. BULLARD. (S. F. 9835.)

1. Divorce ⟸101—Allegation in cross-complaint as to plaintiff's residence essential when divorce granted thereunder.

Assuming that Civ. Code, § 128, prohibiting a divorce unless plaintiff has been a resident of the state one year, of the county three months, etc., is satisfied where a divorce is granted defendant on his cross-complaint, if plaintiff has been a resident for the required times, an allegation in the cross-complaint, showing such residence, is essential.

2. Pleading ⟸402, 435—Failure of cross-complaint for divorce to allege facts concerning plaintiff's residence not cured by other pleadings or findings.

The failure of a cross-complaint for divorce to allege that plaintiff has been a resident of the state one year and of the county three months, as required by Civ. Code, § 128, cannot be cured or helped by allegations or admissions in the other pleadings, nor aided by the findings.

3. Divorce ⟸127(3)—Plaintiff's uncorroborated testimony insufficient to support finding as to her residence.

Under Civ. Code, § 128, prohibiting divorces unless plaintiff has been a resident of the state one year, etc., plaintiff's uncorroborated testimony as to her residence is legally insufficient to sustain a finding.

4. Divorce ⟸62(1)—Provision that cross-complainant need not have been resident does not apply to cross-complaint for divorce in suit for separate maintenance.

The proviso of Civ. Code, § 128, added in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 686), that cross-complainant in action for divorce need not be or have been a resident of the state or county, does not apply to a cross-complaint for divorce in an action for separate maintenance, in which there is no residence requirement, since this would permit a divorce between spouses, neither of whom was a resident.

5. Divorce ⟸62(1)—Failure of cross-complaint for divorce to allege facts concerning plaintiff's residence not waived.

The failure of a cross-complaint for divorce in suit for separate maintenance to allege that plaintiff had been a resident of the state one year, etc., as required by Civ. Code, § 128, goes to the very foundation of defendant's right to a divorce, and is not waived by the omission to call it to the trial judge's attention.

6. Divorce ⊜62(1)—Failure to allege facts concerning plaintiff's residence in cross-complaint does not affect jurisdiction.

Failure of nonresident's cross-complaint for divorce to allege facts as to plaintiff's residence required by Civ. Code, § 128, does not deprive the court of jurisdiction, but renders it erroneous for the court in the exercise of jurisdiction to grant a divorce.

7. Divorce ⊜62(1)—Right to file cross-complaint not conclusive of right to divorce.

That under Code Civ. Proc. § 442, nonresident defendant may file cross-complaint for divorce in suit for separate maintenance is not conclusive that he is entitled to the relief sought.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Minnie Grace Bullard against Harry Bullard. From a decree for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco (F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Walter E. Dorn and L. W. Lovey, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

MYERS, Justice pro tem. Appellant commenced this action, for separate maintenance without divorce, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, where she resided. Defendant, a resident of Alameda county, filed a cross-complaint for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The trial court denied plaintiff any relief, and awarded the defendant an interlocutory decree of divorce on his cross-complaint, from which the plaintiff appeals.

Appellant urges, with much force and reason, that the acts of alleged cruelty relied on (consisting solely in the use of offensive language on five occasions) could not possibly, under the circumstances as disclosed by the evidence, have inflicted grievous mental suffering upon the respondent, and that therefore the finding of the trial court upon this issue is without support in the evidence. But, inasmuch as this judgment must be reversed on another ground wihch is determinative against any right of recovery upon the cross-complaint herein, it is unnecessary to here determine the question thus raised.

[1-3] The defendant, to whom the decree of divorce was awarded upon his cross-complaint, was at no time a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, in which the action was commenced and tried. Section 128 of the Civil Code provides that—

"A divorce must not be granted unless the plaintiff has been a resident of the state one year, and of the county in which the action is brought three months, next preceding the commencement of the action."

There is much reason for concluding that in construing this section, as applied to a case wherein the action is for separate maintenance with a cross-action for divorce, the word "plaintiff" should be construed to mean "cross-complainant." But it is not necessary here to so hold. If we should assume, in accordance with defendant's contention, that the requirements of this section would be satisfied in such a case if the original plaintiff were a resident of the state and county for the prescribed period, we are met by the fact that there is no allegation of such a situation in defendant's cross-complaint. The only allegation as to residence in the cross-complaint is an allegation that the defendant was a resident of the county of Alameda, state of California. There is no allegation as to the plaintiff's residence. An allegation of the residence required by statute is necessary to state a cause of action for divorce, and is equally essential in a cross-complaint for divorce. Coulthurst v. Coulthurst, 58 Cal. 239, 240. The absence of such allegation in a cross-complaint cannot be cured or helped by any allegations or admissions contained in any of the other pleadings. Dunham v. McDonald, 34 Cal. App. 744, 749, 168 Pac. 1063. Neither can it be aided by the findings in this respect. Collins v. Bartlett, 44 Cal. 371, 381. Furthermore, assuming the sufficiency of the finding as to plaintiff's residence, it is supported only by the uncorroborated testimony of the plaintiff herself, and this is legally insufficient to sustain it. Flynn v. Flynn, 171 Cal. 746, 748, 154 Pac. 837.

[4] It was urged upon the oral argument that the objection here under consideration is met by the proviso which was added in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 686) to section 128, Civil Code, providing that—

A "cross-complainant in an action for divorce need not be or have been a resident of the state or of the county in which the action is brought or pending in order to entitle such cross-complainant to a divorce in said action."

To the point that this proviso does not apply here because this is not "an action for divorce," but an action for separate maintenance, the suggestion is made that this is a "cross-action for divorce," and should therefore be held to be within the application of the proviso. Such a construction, aside from the fact that it would be somewhat strained, would do violence to the apparent intent and purpose of the Legislature, and ought not to be adopted. That purpose was "to prevent a fraudulent use of the courts of this state by temporary residents to obtain the divorces here which they could not obtain in the states where they properly resided." Hiner v. Hiner, 153 Cal. 254, 260, 94 Pac. 1044, 1047. Inasmuch as there is no residence requirement in an action for separate maintenance (Hiner v. Hiner, supra), such a construction of the statute would make possible the procuring of a divorce in the courts of this state between two spouses, neither of whom had ever been a resident here. All that would be required would be that the nonresident wife should commence an action here for separate maintenance had the nonresident husband file a cross-complaint therein for divorce.

[5] We must hold that the granting of the decree of divorce to the defendant herein, who was a nonresident of the county in which the action was commenced and tried, was in violation of the mandatory provisions of this section. It should be noted that this point was not called to the attention of the learned judge at the trial below. But as it it one which goes to the very foundation of the defendant's right to recover it cannot be held to have been waived by such omission.

[6, 7] The point as presented in appellant's brief was to the effect that "the court was without jurisdiction to grant the defendant a divorce," because of the matters stated above. To this the respondent makes answer that by the filing of the complaint for separate maintenance and the service of summons upon the defendant the court acquired jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, which it thereafter retained for all purposes of the action. Both of these arguments misconceive the real nature of the objection. It is not a question of the lack of jurisdiction, as was pointed out by this court in Estate of McNeil, 155 Cal. 333, 100 Pac. 1086, but of error in the exercise of jurisdiction. The court undoubtedly had jurisdiction in this case, but erred in deciding that the defendant was entitled to a decree of divorce. In response to the contention that defendant had a right to file the cross-complaint herein, which was expressly granted to him by section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure, applicable alike to resident and nonresident defendants, it may be conceded that he had such right. But it does not follow that he was entitled to the relief therein sought.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE ex rel. LAWYERS' INSTITUTE OF SAN DIEGO v. MERCHANTS' PROTECTIVE CORPORATION. (L. A. 7119.)

1. Corporations ⟸377½, New, vol. 21 Key-No. Series—Not authorized to practice law.

Civ. Code, § 286, providing that private corporations may be formed for any purposes for which individuals may lawfully associate themselves, does not authorize the organization of a corporation to practice law, as individuals cannot practice law without a special license.

2. Corporations ⟸372—Where statement of powers ambiguous, corporation's interpretation of charter considered.

Where the statement of the powers in a charter are ambiguous, the court is entitled to consider the interpretation which the corporation has put upon its charter.

3. Corporations ⟸377½, New, vol. 21 Key-No. Series—Corporation furnishing legal services to members "engaged in practice of law."

Where a corporation charged a yearly membership fee for dispensing legal advice and services of the sort usually furnished by attorneys to their clients, and part of this membership fee was paid to attorneys for rendering services as agents and representatives of the corporation, the corporation was engaged in the practice of law, in view of Const. art. 6, § 22, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 171, 281, and 1209, subd. 13.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Proceeding in the nature of quo warranto by the People of the State of California on the relation of the Lawyers' Institute of San Diego, against the Merchants' Protective Corporation. From a judgment revoking defendant's charter, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James MacIntosh and Joseph P. Sproul, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Leon French, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Harrison G. Sloane, of San Diego, for relator.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This appeal is from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor after order overruling defendant's general and special demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint, the defendant having failed to answer within the time allowed by said order. The proceeding is in the nature of quo warranto wherein the state, on the relation of the Lawyers' Institute of San Diego, puts in issue the right of defendant to engage in the practice of law, not having or being able to acquire a license so to do. The plaintiff alleged that on or about May 27, 1915, the said defendant, a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of Indiana, caused a copy of its articles of incorporation and amendments thereto to be filed with the secretary of state of the state of California; that the purposes of said corporation, as set forth in said articles of incorporation, are "for the purpose of furnishing its members legal services," etc., and, as set forth in the amendment to its said articles of incorporation, are "to combine a large number of persons, firms, and corporations into a central organization who shall pay a stipulated price for the services of the organization and its employees; to appoint attorneys to look after the collection of the accounts and bills receivable and render such other professional services as are needed and required by the various members and subscribers thereto." The complaint further alleges that said defendant corporation "has engaged in, without lawful authority, grant, license, or franchise, the business of practicing law in the state of California and in particular in the county of San Diego, state of California; that it has retained and employed attorneys at law duly admitted to practice in the state of California * * * as its agents and representatives in rendering legal service to patrons of said corporations." The complaint proceeds to set forth in haec verba the agreement of employment between said defendant and said attorneys and also the membership agreement of its patrons under and in pursuance of which said corporation has rendered legal services to various of its patrons through the said attorneys at law, its agents and representatives, as follows:

"By giving to said patrons legal advice and consultation on business, personal or private matters; by defending its patrons in actions brought against them in police courts or justices' courts; by giving to said patrons legal advice and information upon new state laws and ordinances."

Finally, the complaint alleges upon information and belief:

"That the sole business and occupation heretofore or now carried on by said defendant in the state of California is the practice of law in the manner hereinbefore designated."

The plaintiff prays judgment that the defendant be excluded from engaging in the practice of law in the state of California and from the exercise of all corporate rights, privileges, and franchises therein. Defendant having failed to answer after its demurrer was overruled, its default was duly entered, and thereafter the court proceeded to take evidence in said matter, and, having done so, found that all the allegations of the plaintiff's petition were true. It therefore by its judgment granted the relief prayed for in said complaint. The appeal is from such judgment.

[1] The appellant's first contention upon this appeal is that the acts complained of in this proceeding were done by it under its lawful franchise from the state of California granted to it under general law; that section 286 of the Civil Code defines the purposes for which private corporations in this state may be formed as follows:

"Private corporations may be formed for any purpose for which individuals may lawfully associate themselves."

The appellant argues that, since individuals may lawfully associate themselves for the practice of law, it may also do so in its corporate capacity, under the specific terms of the foregoing section of the Civil Code. The vice of this contention consists in its assumption that individuals may generally, and as a matter of right, associate themselves together for the practice of the law; but this assumption is fallacious, since, under the laws of California, individuals may not, either singly or in association, engage in the practice of the law without having a special license so to do, and hence the individuals forming this corporation could not, under the section of the Code relied upon, gain any other or further right by the act of incorporation than that lawfully possessed by them, either singly or in the aggregate, without incorporation. Its contention in this respect is therefore without merit.

[2] The appellant's next contention is that its charter is the sole source to which the court could look for its powers in this proceeding, and that by the terms of its said charter, as embraced in the articles of incorporation and the amendments thereto, it did not purport to be formed for the purpose of engaging in the practice of law. That the articles of incorporation of defendant as originally framed, in stating that "the object of this company shall be for the purpose of furnishing to its members legal services," were sufficiently broad to embrace within its said terms the doing of all those acts which, as we shall see hereafter, constitute "the practice of law," would seem to be perfectly clear; and, if it be claimed by the appellant that this broad statement of its purposes has been modified by the later amendment of its articles, which embrace, among other enumerated powers, that of appointing attorneys to "render such other professional services as are needed and required by the various members and subscribers thereto," the utmost that can be said of this amendment is that it merely renders doubtful the otherwise broad and clear statements of its corporate purposes and powers. In such a case the court would be entitled to look to the acts of the defendant under its charter as originally framed and as thus amended, and to determine therefrom what its own interpretation of its charter and powers might be. This would be particularly true with respect to the agreements and engagements which the defendant entered into with its members and patrons and with such attorneys as it employed to handle their legal affairs. These were set forth fully in the complaint, and the reading of them leaves little doubt that the construction which the corporation placed upon its own power under its original and amended articles of incorporation was such as to bring it fully within the description of those engaging in the practice of law as hereinafter defined.

[3] The phrase "practicing law," or its equivalent, "the practice of law," has long had a sufficiently definite meaning throughout this country to be given a place in both constitutional and statutory law without further definition. The Constitution of this state employs it in section 22 of article 6 thereof, declaring that—

"No judge of a court of record shall practice law in any court of this state during his continuance in office."

By section 281 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that—

"If any person shall practice law in any court, except a justice's court or police court, without having received a license as attorney and counselor, he shall be guilty of a contempt of court."

Section 171 of the same Code extends this prohibition to county clerks. They are therein forbidden to practice law in any court of this state or to act as attorney, agent or solicitor in the presentation of claims before any department of the state or general government or in the courts of the United States during their continuance in office. Section 1209, subd. 13, of the same Code, relating to contempts, declares that "practicing law" or advertising or holding one's self out as practicing or as entitled to practice, etc., without having received a license as attorney and counselor, issued under the laws of this state, constitutes contempt of court.

While these provisions have particular relation to the practice of the law in courts of justice, the term has not been generally thus confined. In the case of Eley v. Miller, 7 Ind. App. 529, 34 N. E. 836, which involved the violation of a statute prohibiting county auditors from practicing law, the court said:

"As the term is generally understood, the practice of the law is the doing or performing services in a court of justice, in any matter depending therein, throughout its various stages, and in conformity to the adopted rules of procedure. But in a larger sense it includes legal advice and counsel, and the preparation of legal instruments and contracts by which legal rights are secured although such matter may or may not be depending in a court."

In the case of People v. Alfani, 227 N. Y. 334, 125 N. E. 671, wherein the defendant was charged with violating section 270 of the Penal Code of New York, prohibiting persons from practicing as attorneys at law without being licensed and admitted so to do, the court, in an elaborate and well-reasoned opinion, in which numerous cases from all parts of the country are reviewed, has this to say:

"It is common knowledge for which the above authorities were hardly necessary, that a large, if not the greater, part of the work of the bar today is out of court or office work. Counsel and advice, the drawing of agreements, the organization of corporations and preparing papers connected therewith, the drafting of legal documents of all kinds, including wills, are activities which have long been classed as law practice. The Legislature is presumed to have used the words as persons generally would understand them, and not being technical or scientific terms 'to practice as an attorney at law' means to do the work, as a business, which is commonly and usually done by lawyers here in this country."

Other cases to the same effect are: In re Lizotte, 32 R. I. 386, 79 Atl. 960, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 794; Meisel & Co. v. Nat. Jewelers, etc., 90 Misc. Rep. 19, 152 N. Y. Supp. 913; People v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 180 App. Div. 648, 168 N. Y. Supp. 278; Matter of Rothschild, 140 App. Div. 583, 125 N. Y. Supp. 629; In re Duncan, 83 S. C. 186, 65 S. E. 211, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 750, 18 Ann. Cas. 657; People v. People's Trust Co., 180 App. Div. 494, 167 N. Y. Supp. 767; Thornton on Attorneys at Law, § 69.

A most recent case expressing the same views is that of State ex rel. Lundin v. Merchants' Protective Ass'n, 105 Wash. 12, 177 Pac. 694. This was a quo warranto case in which this identical appellant was the defendant and in which this precise issue was involved, and the same defenses herein insisted upon were urged. The Supreme Court of Washington, speaking of this defendant, said:

"If it is doing the things that it assumes to do in its articles, it is giving legal advice and counsel, and prosecuting without fee, other than the membership fee, the suits of its subscribers in the police and justice courts, and it is advising them upon all state laws and city ordinances, and will, if need be, prosecute criminally those who have offended against its membership. This is a practice of the law"—citing the cases above cited.

The final contention of the appellant herein is that it is not engaged in the practice of the law, for the reason that its articles declare, and its contracts with its membership agree, that it will furnish to its members legal services through the appointment of attorneys to look after the collection of accounts and bills receivable "and render such other professional service as may be needed and required by the various members and subscribers thereto," and that thus it is merely an agency for the bringing of attorneys and clients together, and is not itself engaged in practicing law.

That this statement of the objects and purposes of the defendant's incorporation is much too narrow is shown by the certificate which it issues to its membership and by the agreement which it makes with its attorneys. In the first of these it certifies that its members are entitled "to legal advice and consultation on all such personal or private matters without charge, at the office of the attorneys whose names appear on this certificate and who are retained by and at the expense of this corporation." It further certifies that members will receive "free legal advice and information upon all the new state laws and ordinances of this city." It thus appears that the relation of attorney and client thus to be created is not that relation between the listed attorneys and the membership of the corporation, but is that relation between the said attorneys and the corporation itself. They are its retained and paid attorneys. Like every other corporation it must act through the agency of natural persons, and these attorneys are its agents and their acts are its acts, and it, through them, is the actual and responsible actor and adviser of its membership in the various legal matters the aforesaid certificate of membership relates. This interpretation of the defendant's agreement with its membership is enforced by the contract which it makes with its attorneys. The opening clause of said contract designates the corporation as the first party and the attorney or attorneys as the second party and proceeds as follows:

"Whereas the parties hereto are mutually desirous of entering into an agreement whereby the second parties are to represent the first party as its attorneys in the city of San Diego," etc. "Now, therefore, it is mutually agreed by and between the parties hereto that the second parties shall act as attorneys and are hereby retained by said first party as its attorney to render all those certain services to persons, partnerships or corporations in the city and county of San Diego, California, holding membership or memberships in the said the Merchants' Protective Corporation as said services are set forth and specifically mentioned in the certificate of membership issued by said first party to its members," etc.

The complaint herein alleges, and the court finds, that the method of compensation provided to be paid by the defendant to its said attorneys was as follows: A membership fee of $10 per year was paid to it by its members. Of this sum $2 for each member was paid to the said attorneys for their services "as agent and representative" of the corporation in the business of each of its said patrons for the period of one year; the remaining $8 of said fee was retained by said corporation.

This brings us to the final question, which is as to whether such a corporation thus organized, thus employing attorneys as its agents and representatives, and thus dispensing legal advice, counsel, information, and services of the sort usually and generally furnished by regularly admitted and licensed attorneys and counselors to their clients in the practice of their profession, is engaged in the practice of law. The authorities, which are practically unanimous, furnish but one answer to this question, and that answer is well expressed in the case of State ex rel. Lundin v. Merchants' Protective Ass'n, supra, wherein the Supreme Court of Washington, quoting from Ruling Case Law, says:

"The practice of the law is not a business that is open to a commercial corporation. 'Since, as has been seen, the practice of law is not a lawful business, except for members of the bar who have complied with all the conditions required by statute and the rules of the courts, and as these conditions cannot be performed by a corporation, it follows that the practice of law is not a lawful business for a corporation to engage in. As it cannot practice law directly, it cannot do so indirectly, by employing competent lawyers to practice for it, as that would be an evasion which the law will not tolerate.'" 2 R. C. L. 946; In re Co-op. Law Co., 198 N. Y. 479, 92 N. E. 15, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 55, 139 Am. St. Rep. 839, 19 Ann. Cas. 879.

The essential element underlying the relation of attorney and client is that of trust and confidence of the highest degree growing out of the employment and entering into the performance of every duty which the attorney owes to his client in the course of such employment. It is the existence of this essential element as the basis of said relation which has called into being the various statutory regulations governing the admission of attorneys and counselors at law and which embody certain requirements of character, integrity, and learning as the prerequisites of such admission to the right and privilege of practicing law. It is the possession or reputation for the possession of these personal qualifications which constitutes, as a rule, the main inducement for the formation of the personal and confidential relation of attorney and client. The intervention of a corporation between the membership it secures and the attorneys it employs, which corporation can in and of itself possess none of these qualifications, obviously leaves out of view the necessity for their existence. The essential relation of trust and confidence between attorney and client cannot be said to arise where the attorney is employed, not by the client, but by some corporation which has undertaken to furnish its members with legal advice, counsel, and professional services. The attorney in such a case owes his first allegiance to his immediate employer, the corporation, and owes, at most, but an incidental, secondary, and divided loyalty to the clientèle of the corporation. This phase of the question was very fully considered in the case of In re Co-operative Law Co., 198 N. Y. 479, 92 N. E. 15, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 55, 139 Am. St. Rep. 839, 19 Ann. Cas. 879, wherein the court says:

"The relation of attorney and client is that of master and servant in a limited and dignified sense, and it involves the highest trust and confidence. It cannot be delegated without consent and it cannot exist between an attorney employed by a corporation to practice law for it, and a client of the corporation, for he would be subject to the directions of the corporation and not to the directions of the client. There would be neither contract nor privity between him and the client, and he would not owe even the duty of counsel to the actual litigant. The corporation would control the litigation, the money earned would belong to the corporation and the attorney would be responsible to the corporation only. His master would not be the client but the corporation, conducted it may be wholly by laymen, organized simply to make money and not to aid in the administration of justice which is the highest function of an attorney and counselor at law. The corporation might not have a lawyer among its stockholders, directors or officers. Its members might be without character, learning or standing. There would be no remedy by attachment or disbarment to protect the public from imposition or fraud, no stimulus to good conduct from the traditions of an ancient and honorable profession, and no guide except the sordid purpose to earn money for stockholders. The bar, which is an institution of the highest usefulness and standing, would be degraded if even its humblest member became subject to the orders of a money-making corporation engaged not in conducting litigation for itself, but in the business of conducting litigation for others. The degradation of the bar is an injury to the state."

We are satisfied that the foregoing principles should be determinative of the case before us. The appellant herein, both in its articles of incorporation and in its agreements with its membership, is assuming to do those things in the way of furnishing legal advice, counsel and services which are usually done by attorneys and counselors in the ordinary practice of the legal profession. In so doing it has attempted to enter a domain which as a corporation it may not lawfully invade. The appellant is a creature of the state, and hence the state possesses the right through the medium of this writ to prevent the unlawful exercise of its chartered powers. This the trial court has by its judgment properly done.

CAPUCCIO v. CAIRE et al. (L. A. 6845.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂=113(1)—Order refusing to vacate decree held not appealable.

Since an order refusing to vacate a decree is in substance an order denying a new trial, an appeal therefrom is not permissible.

2. Partition ⊂=19—Stockholders of defunct corporation held to have right of possession necessary to maintain suit.

Where a charter of a corporation has been forfeited for nonpayment of license taxes, and all claims and demands against the defunct corporation had been satisfied, the stockholders, as the legal or equitable owners of their respective interests in the real estate of the defunct corporation, are entitled to possession thereof, and may maintain a suit for partition under Code Civ. Proc. § 752.

3. Corporations ⊂=619—Limitation as to invalidation of acts of trustees of dissolved corporation inapplicable to partition suit among stockholders.

Code Civ. Proc. § 341, subd. 3, as added by St. 1917, p. 381, requiring actions to set aside any action by trustees of a dissolved corporation to be brought within six months, does not apply to an action for partition of real property belonging to the former stockholders, regardless of any attempted revivor of the corporation by the former directors.

4. Abatement and revival ⊂=17—Objection of other action pending must be specifically pleaded.

An objection to an action because of the pendency of another action at the time of its institution is in the nature of a plea in abatement, which, being dilatory, must be specially pleaded.

5. Partition ⊂=27—Suit by stockholders for accounting held not bar to subsequent action by a stockholder in partition of realty.

A suit in equity for an accounting and to determine the rights and interests of the stockholders of a dissolved corporation is not an action the pendency of which will bar another suit by a stockholder for the partition of real estate formerly belonging to the corporation, the two actions not involving the same cause of action, the same remedy, nor the same parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Aglae S. Capuccio against Arthur J. Caire and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants other than Edmund A. Rossi appeal. Affirmed.

J. F. Bluxome and Frank P. Deering, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

D. Freidenrich and Ambrose Gherini, both of San Francisco, and Orrin K. McMurray, of Berkeley, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This action was instituted by the plaintiff for the partition of the lands of Santa Cruz Island, situate off the coast of the county of Santa Barbara, and consisting of about 58,800 acres of land, of which the plaintiff alleged that she and the defendants were tenants in common. The facts as set forth in the complaint and as found by the trial court may be briefly summarized as follows: Prior to the year 1911 the said Santa Cruz Island was owned and possessed by a corporation known as the "Santa Cruz Island Company," the capital stock of which was divided into 100 shares, of which the plaintiff herein was the owner and holder of 7 shares, and of which remaining shares the defendants herein were the several owners and holders in various proportions. The license tax of said corporation due to the state of California for the year 1911 was not paid, as a result of which the charter of said corporation was forfeited to the state of California on the 30th day of November, 1911. At the date of said forfeiture the plaintiff, Aglae S. Capuccio, and the defendants, Arthur J. Caire, Fred F. Caire, Albina C. S. Caire, and Delphine A. Caire, constituted and were the directors of said corporation, and, under the provisions of the law then obtaining with relation to the properties and affairs of corporations whose charters had been forfeited, became the trustees of said defunct corporation for the purpose of liquidation of its affairs; at the time of the forfeiture of the charter of said corporation there was no provision of law for the revivor or rehabilitation of corporations whose charters had been thus forfeited, but by the amendment of the statute in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 680) a method was provided for the revivor of the charters of corporations which had theretofore been or which might thereafter be forfeited; and in accordance with the method thus provided the said trustees of said corporation undertook to meet and take the necessary steps for the revivor of said corporation. Four of the five trustees, owning 79 of the 100 shares of the stock in the corporation were present at such meeting, and acted unanimously in taking the requisite steps to revive the corporate charter, but the plaintiff herein was not present at such meeting, and did not consent thereto, and it is not claimed that by any act or omission on her part she has ever consented to the revivor of said corporation or to any other of the subsequent acts of said revived corporation or of the trustees or directors thereof in attempting to deal with the property owned by said corporation at the date of the forfeiture of its said charter. Immediately after the attempted revivor of said corporation the trustees who had sought to accomplish the same turned over all of the assets of the theretofore defunct corporation in their hands, including the real estate in question herein, to the revived corporation, and the latter has ever since been in the possession and use thereof. In the month of January, 1917, a meeting was called of the trustees of the formerly defunct corporation, at which a resolution was attempted to be adopted, confirming the title of the revived corporation to the real estate in question and authorizing a conveyance thereof by said trustees to said corporation; and, in accordance with said resolution, the four of said trustees who had been present and adopted the same joined in a conveyance purporting to convey the whole of said real estate to said revived corporation. The plaintiff herein, however, although notified of such meeting, did not attend the same, nor join in the execution of said conveyance, but, on the contrary, expressly protested against the action taken at said meeting and the execution of said conveyance pursuant thereto.

In the meantime there had been several actions instituted and proceedings taken which have an important bearing upon the present litigation. In the year 1912 one Edmund A. Rossi, to whom had been transferred the interest of his mother, Amelia A. Rossi, in said corporation and the properties thereof, commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the former directors and then trustees of said corporation to obtain a judgment, directing the distribution of certain moneys in the hands of said trustees among the stockholders of the defunct corporation, and also directing the sale of the real estate and personal property thereof, and the like distribution of the proceeds among said stockholders in the proportions of their several interests in said defunct corporation. The plaintiff herein was joined with the other trustees of said corporation as a defendant in said action, but, upon being brought into court, joined interests with the plaintiff therein as against her cotrustees. Upon the issues framed in said action the trial court made and entered an interlocutory judgment, declaring that the charter of the corporation had been forfeited on November 30, 1911; that the then directors thereof had thereby become trustees of said defunct corporation and its stockholders charged with the duty of liquidating its affairs and distributing among its stockholders their respective interests in its property after the payment of its debts. This decree directed the trustees to apply the money on hand to the settlement of the claims of creditors, and to render an account of the same. While this was in process of being accomplished the plaintiff in that action applied to the court for, and was granted, an order requiring the trustees to distribute to the plaintiff and other stockholders the surplus funds in their hands, and also to sell the real estate and personal property of the corporation in their possession, at public auction, and similarly distribute the proceeds arising from said sales. An appeal to this court was taken from this latter order and also from the order of the trial court refusing to vacate its interlocutory judgment and grant a new trial. Upon the determination of these appeals this court held that the title to the properties of a corporation prior to its dissolution through the forfeiture of its charter was wholly vested in the corporation, and that the directors of such corporation did not, by virtue of their office, hold or possess any title to, or any interest in, the property of the corporation; that the statute providing for the forfeiture of the charters of corporations, while it provided that the former directors thereof should become trustees of the corporation and its stockholders, did not purport to invest such trustees with any title to the property formerly belonging to such corporation, but merely with the temporary right of possession thereof for the purpose of settling its corporate affairs; and that the title to the property of such corporation belonged, upon the forfeiture of its charter, to the persons who were its stockholders when it ceased to be a corporation, citing Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 362, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192.

This court, however, further held that it was not a necessary part of the statutory duty of the trustees to find a buyer for, or to sell the lands of the corporation, otherwise than might be necessary to settle its corporate affairs, and that if they had money enough on hand to pay all debts and expenses, and if all other corporate affairs were disposed of, it would be no breach of their duty to deliver the possession of the land to the stockholders as tenants in common according to their interests therein; and that in the case before it the evidence did not sufficiently show any such breach of duty on the part of the trustees of said corporation in the course of the liquidation of its affairs as would serve to justify the making of the orders appealed from; it accordingly reversed the case. Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 161 Pac. 1161.

The decision of the above-entitled cause was handed down by this court on December 16, 1916. Thereafter, and on August 28, 1917, the said Edmund A. Rossi commenced another action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the same defendants as trustees of said corporation, and also individually, to obtain an accounting and distribution, according to their respective interests, to the stockholders of said corporation of the property owned by the corporation at the time of the forfeiture of its charter and of the proceeds thereof in the hands of the defendants as such trustees. The plaintiff in the present action was also made a defendant in that action both individually and as such trustee, and, upon appearing therein, joined with the plaintiff in seeking a like relief. The other defendants interposed a plea of the statute of limitations, alleging the action to be barred by subdivision 3 of section 341 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended July 27, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 381), and which, as thus amended, provided that an action "to set aside or invalidate any action taken or performed by a majority of the trustees of any corporation heretofore or hereafter dissolved by operation of law, including the revivor of any such corporation," would be barred unless brought within six months. This court declined to give application of the foregoing code amendment to that case, for the reason that a reasonable time had not elapsed between the adoption of said amendment and the institution of that action. The defendants, other than the plaintiff herein, interposed as a further defense to said action the facts above set forth showing the attempted rehabilitation of the corporation under the act of 1913, averring that the corporation had been restored to life thereby, and had since been functioning as a corporation, and that the entire interests of the former stockholders had been thereby vested in said revived corporation. The trial court adopted this view, and denied both the plaintiff in that action and the plaintiff in this action, who was a defendant therein, the relief which they each had sought. They united in prosecuting an appeal to this court, and thus the question as to the rights of a stockholder in and to his share of the properties of a defunct corporation, who had not consented to its revivor, was squarely presented for determination. Dealing with the precise facts presented in the present case, this court said:

"It is plain, in view of our decisions, that upon the death of this corporation without any existing provision of law for its rehabilitation, the corporation could no longer have any interest in the property, and those who were its stockholders at the time of its death were immediately vested with the right to have its affairs settled by the trustees designated by the statute for that purpose and the property remaining after such settlement distributed among them according to their respective interests. Such former stockholders immediately became the beneficiaries of a statutory trust created solely for that purpose. The former stockholders either had the equitable title to the property of the former corporation, subject to a charge in favor of the creditors to be enforced by the former directors as trustees for that purpose; or they had a legal title in such property subject to a power in the trustees to dispose of so much thereof as was necessary to pay the creditors."

The court then proceeded with a discussion of the effect of the subsequent legislation providing for the revivor of corporations whose charters had been forfeited prior to the enactment of such legislation, holding that the Legislature, under the warranty of the constitutional provision relating to the remission of forfeitures, had power to enact such retroactive legislation. The court then proceeds to say:

"We are forced to the conclusion, however, that so construing the rehabilitation provision here involved, its enforcement against a nonconsenting former stockholder who diligently asserted his rights, would be an impairment of a vested right in property prohibited by both state and federal Constitutions. In this regard the very able argument of learned counsel for respondents to our minds fails to give sufficient force to certain facts which, in view of our decisions, must be conceded, and which appear to us to make the question a very simple one. We are not dealing here with an unenforced penalty. The judgment of death pronounced by the law on this corporation had been carried into effect. The corporation was dead, and had died without any existing provision of law for its revivification. Taking for the purpose of this decision, the view most favorable to respondent, the legal title to the property of the former corporation had wholly vested in the trustees designated by the statute for the purposes of the trust declared by the statute, which were solely the liquidation of the affairs of the corporation and the distribution of the property remaining among the former stockholders. Subject to the expenses of the trustees and the payment of creditors, the former stockholders were the sole beneficiaries and the absolute owners in equity of the property. Under all the definitions this was certainly a vested property right. It cannot matter why such penalty of forfeiture of charter was imposed and enforced, or what the obligation to each other of the former stockholders would have been had such penalty not been enforced. The status with relation to the property had been created, and the terms of the trust upon which it was held defined. We do not see how it can be held that the rights of former stockholders under the trust defined by the statute, the right subject to the payment of the former corporation debts and expense of liquidation, to have the property distributed among them, was not a vested property right secure against impairment by subsequent act of the Legislature."

The court, in accordance with these views, reversed the judgment and order of the trial court, and remanded the cause for further proceedings therein. Rossi v. Caire, 186 Cal. 544, 199 Pac. 1042.

While the above-entitled action was pending in the trial court or on appeal the plaintiff herein commenced the present action for partition of the lands and premises of said corporation known as Santa Cruz Island. In her complaint herein she set forth at length the facts hereinbefore recited, relating to the forfeiture and subsequently attempted revivor of said corporation. She further expressly averred that the trustees of said defunct corporation, upon its attempted revivor, had divested themselves as trustees of all of its properties and effects, and had transferred the entire possession and control thereof to said revived corporation, which had, ever since said acts, been in the full possession and control thereof.

The plaintiff further averred that—

"All debts of said dissolved corporation and all claims and demands against it have long since been paid, satisfied and discharged."

The defendants upon their appearance did not deny these averments, but, on the contrary, expressly affirmed the same in their pleadings, alleging that their transfer of the possession and ownership of all of the property and effects of said former defunct corporation to the revived corporation was so far complete as to invest the latter with the full title to all of said properties and effects to the exclusion of the plaintiff and all of the other stockholders from all ownership and interest therein, other than as stockholders of and in the revived corporation.

The defendants did not deny the plaintiff's averment that all of the debts, claims, and demands against said corporation had been paid and satisfied, but contented themselves with the averment that there were certain unsatisfied and outstanding credits belonging to said corporation. The defendants further pleaded, by way of both demurrer and answer, that plaintiff's alleged cause of action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 341 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon the issues as thus presented the trial court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein it found that the charter of said corporation had become forfeited as alleged in the plaintiff's complaint, and that the trustees thereof, as alleged by plaintiff, had taken steps for the revivor of said corporation provided for in the subsequent acts of the Legislature permitting such revivor as specifically set forth in the defendants' answer, but that the plaintiff, as one of the trustees thereof and also as a stockholder therein, had never consented to such revivor. The court further found that immediately after the issuance by the Secretary of State of the certificate showing the rehabilitation of the corporate existence of said corporation as a result of such action on the part of a portion of its trustees on August 28, 1913, the four trustees who had taken such steps resulting in the issuance of such certificate had delivered all of the assets of the corporation and the possession of all of its properties to said revived corporation, which had ever since been in the use and possession thereof. The court further found that no action had ever been commenced to set aside or invalidate the revival of said corporation, nor to invalidate or set aside the action taken by the said majority of the said trustees of said corporation. The court further found that out of the assets of the property of said corporation other than its real estate, all debts of the said corporation had been paid. Finally the court found that by the forfeiture of the charter of said corporation the stockholders thereof had become tenants in common of the real property thereof subject to the payment of its debts, and that at the time of the commencement of this action the plaintiff herein and the defendant Edmund A. Rossi herein were cotenants in the ownership of said property with the other defendants herein, and held and possessed the same as such tenants in common in the respective proportions of their former interests and holdings as stockholders of said corporation prior to the forfeiture of its charter; and that the real property in question herein was susceptible of partition among the parties respectively entitled thereto as such tenants in common, and that such partition should be made among them according to their said several interests therein.

[1] As conclusions of law from the foregoing findings of fact the trial court repeated its finding as to the respective rights, interests, and ownerships of the said parties as tenants in common of said property, and directed the entry of an interlocutory decree for the partition thereof among them according to their respective interests therein. From the interlocutory decree accordingly entered the appellants herein have prosecuted this appeal. They have also appealed from an order subsequently made and entered by the trial court, refusing to vacate and set aside said decree, but since said order is in substance an order denying a new trial, the appeal therefrom is not permissible, and is therefore dismissed.

[2] The first contention of the appellants herein is that on the 16th of May, 1918, the date of the commencement of this action, the plaintiff herein was neither in possession, nor had the right of possession, of the real property described in her complaint, or of any portion thereof, and hence could not maintain this action under the express terms of section 752 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it read at the date of the commencement of the action. The appellants cite, in support of their said contentions, the cases of Jameson v. Hayward, 106 Cal. 682, 39 Pac. 1078, 46 Am. St. Rep. 268, and Geary v. Espinosa (Cal. App.) 196 Pac. 90. As to the first of these cases it may be said that the construction which had long theretofore been placed on the language of section 752 of the Code of Civil Procedure was fully recognized and adopted, to the effect that a party entitled to the present possession of an undivided interest in real estate, though not in the actual possession thereof, was entitled to commence and maintain an action in partition. Jameson v. Hayward, supra, pages 686, 687, and cases cited. As to the second of the cases above cited, it simply reaffirms the doctrine and construction enunciated in the former case. The question, then, is whether at the time of the institution of the present action the plaintiff was either in possession or had the right of present possession of the premises sought to be partitioned, or of any portion thereof. This question must, we think, be answered in the affirmative as to the plaintiff's present right of possession of her interest in said premises at the time of the institution of this action. In the case of Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 161 Pac. 1161, it was, as we have seen, definitely decided that upon the dissolution of a corporation through forfeiture of its charter under then existing laws, the corporation became no longer capable of holding title or the possession of property, and that its former property belonged to the persons who were its stockholders at the time it ceased to be a corporation, subject only to the right of possession in its trustees for the purpose of settling the corporate affairs; and that if such trustees "had money to pay all debts and expenses, and other corporate affairs were disposed of, they might deliver the possession of the land to the stockholders as tenants in common to do with it what they pleased."

In the second case of Rossi v. Caire, 186 Cal. 544, 199 Pac. 1042, much discussion was indulged in in the briefs of the respondents upon that appeal as to the correctness of the statement in the former case that upon the forfeiture of its charter the title to the property of the corporation vested in the stockholders subject to the claims of creditors and the expenses of liquidation and to the right of possession in the trustees for the purposes of such liquidation; it being claimed by the respondents that the title to the property vested in such trustees. The court declined to discuss or decide this controversy in that case, but, assuming, purely for the purpose of the decision, that the position of the respondents was well grounded in this regard, held that it would nevertheless remain true that the former directors would hold the title simply as trustees for the purpose of their statutory trust with the former stockholders as the sole beneficiaries, subject to the claims of creditors. The court in this connection said:

"The former stockholders either had the equitable title to the property of the former corporation subject to a charge in favor of the creditors to be enforced by the former directors or trustees for that purpose, or they had the legal title to such property subject to a power in the trustees to dispose of so much thereof as was necessary to pay the creditors"

—but the court went much farther in the decision of that case in its determination of matters germane to the matter before us, since the court therein held that, under the law as it then existed, providing for the forfeiture of the charters of corporations for the nonpayment of their license taxes, but not providing for their subsequent revivor, the rights of the stockholders, whether legal or equitable, in the property of such defunct corporations was a vested right which could not be injuriously affected by any attempt at the revivor of such corporations under the terms of later legislation undertaken without their consent. These matters having been thus determined, it would necessarily follow that the vested right of these nonconsenting stockholders to their interest in the property of this corporation would not only have been unaffected by any action on the part of any number of the trustees of said corporation looking to its revivor or to the delivery of possession of any or all of the property of the defunct to the revived corporation, but that such vested right, whether legal or equitable, to the ownership and to the possession of their said interests in such property would become absolute when the statutory trust of the former directors or trustees of the dead corporation had been fulfilled and when there no longer existed any debts, claims, or demands against said corporation which would require the further possession or right of disposition thereof in the trustees in order to their satisfaction; in the instant case it affirmatively apepars that at the time of the institution of this action all claims and demands against the defunct corporation had long since been satisfied and discharged out of the money or personal property thereof in the hands of its trustees, and that as to the real property in question here there no longer existed any right or duty in said trustees under or by virtue of their statutory trust affecting said real property, and hence that these respondents, as the legal or equitable owners of their respective interests in said real property, were entitled to the possession thereof. They were therefore entitled to institute and maintain this action for the partition of said real property as between themselves and the other co-owners thereof. Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 500, 24 Pac. 172, 25 Pac. 64; Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 422, 18 Pac. 866, 27 Pac. 1082; Varni v. Devoto, 10 Cal. App. 304, 101 Pac. 934. This conclusion is in no wise affected by the fact that the appellants herein had undertaken as early as 1913 to turn over the possession of the properties of the former corporation to the recently revived corporation, or by the fact that in the year 1917 they had also undertaken to convey the real property which is the subject of the present action to the revived corporation. Neither of said acts on the part of said appellants, assuming that they had any validity, could have done more than to invest the corporation, which they had sought to revive, with whatever rights they possessed or had power to deal with, but not with any vested right which the respondents had then become and have since remained invested with. The effect, if any, upon the status of the parties to the present action would only be that of placing the said revived corporation in the shoes of the appellants as co-owners with the respondents in the property in question. We think, however, that on the dissolution of the corporation the legal title to the corporate real estate became vested in the several stockholders according to their then interests in the stock.

[3] The appellants' next contention is that this action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 341 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring certain actions to be brought within six months. Said subdivision of said section reads as follows:

"To set aside or invalidate any action taken or performed by a majority of the trustees of any corporation heretofore or hereafter dissolved by operation of law, including the revivor of any such corporation."

The difficulty with this contention is that the present action is not such an action as is contemplated by the aforesaid amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure. It is an action for the partition of certain real property of which the plaintiff became the legal or equitable owner of an undivided interest in the year 1911, and of which interest she had remained invested up to the time of the institution of this action. As to such interest she was entirely unaffected by any action undertaken by the appellants herein as trustees of the former corporation from which her said interest had been derived, since she had never consented to such action. Rossi v. Caire, supra. There had, therefore, been no action taken or performed by the appellants as trustees of said former corporation, whether looking to the revivor of said corporation or the possession, control, or ownership of its properties, which was valid as affecting her interests, or which it required any action or proceeding on her part to have set aside. Not being required or obliged to bring any such action or proceeding she could not be barred from the institution or maintenance of her action for partition because she had not done so; she was simply in the position of any other owner of an undivided interest in real property seeking to have the said property divided between herself and her co-owners thereof through the medium of an action for partition, and her equal right to maintain such an action could not be taken away by any statute purporting to require her to seek to have set aside or invalidated some proceeding on the part of other persons to which she had in no manner consented and by which her vested property rights were in no wise affected, and in the legality or illegality of which she had no concern.

[4] The final contention of the appellants is that the plaintiff ought not to have been permitted to maintain the present action by reason of the pendency of another action at the time of its institution, to which she was a party and to which the appellants herein and also her corespondent Rossi herein were also parties, and which, according to the appellants' contention, involved the same properties and the same cause of action as are involved in the present action. The appellants refer to the second case of Rossi v. Caire, supra, which appears to have been pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco at the time of the commencement of the present action. It may be noted upon the threshold of this contention that such an objection or defense against the institution and maintenance of the present action would be in the nature of a plea in abatement, which, being a dilatory plea, must, under well-settled rules of procedure, be specially pleaded. The transcript before us contains nothing to indicate that such a plea was ever presented by the defendants in this action to the trial court in any pleading. Not having been so presented it would have been waived under well-settled rules regarding dilatory pleas.

[5] The appellants, however, assert in their brief that they did in fact apply to the superior court of the county of Santa Barbara, in which the present action was begun and was pending, for leave to file a supplemental answer setting up this defense in January, 1920, about a year and a half after the commencement of the present action, and when it was about to proceed to trial upon the pleadings and issues long since presented; and that the court denied their said motion. We cannot say, upon such a meager and quite irregular suggestion, that it was an abuse of discretion for the trial court to have refused to permit the making of such a belated defense; but, aside from this, it does not appear from the state of the record before us in the cases of Rossi v. Caire, supra, and of the present appeal, that such a defense was ever available to these appellants. The action of Rossi v. Caire, instituted in the city and county of San Francisco on August 28, 1917, by a plaintiff other than this plaintiff was not an action for partition of the real property involved in the present suit. Had it been such an action, it could not have been maintained in a county other than that in which said property was situated. Code Civ. Proc. § 392. It did not purport to seek a partition of real estate, but was simply a suit in equity, involving both real and personal property and requiring an accounting and determination of the rights and interests of the parties to said action therein; one of the essential parties to the present action, namely, Santa Cruz Island Company, which the appellants claim has succeeded to all of the rights and interests of the respondents and also of all of the other parties to the present action, was not a party to the action in Rossi v. Caire, supra, and hence could not be bound by any judgment rendered therein. Enough has been said to show that these two actions did not involve the same cause of action, the same properties, the same remedies, or the same parties, and hence that the pending of the one would not have been a sufficient defense against the institution and maintenance of the other.

We perceive no errors in the record upon this appeal. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, C. J.; LENNON, J.; WASTE, J.; LAWLOR, J.

MYERS, Justice pro tem. I dissent. I dissent from the judgment and from that portion of the opinion which holds that the action is not barred by the statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. § 341, subd. 3.

I agree with the opinion that the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action in partition is necessarily predicated on her present right to the possession of the property involved. Her claim of present right to possession is in turn necessarily predicated upon the claim that the "action taken or performed by a majority of the trustees," in August, 1913, whereby they surrendered the possession of the property to the revived corporation, was invalid. Therefore I think that this action is one to "invalidate the action taken by a majority of the trustees," and comes within the terms of the statute. The plaintiff recognized this, and in her complaint she alleges the invalidity of this transfer. She also recognized that this statute is applicable, and sought to avoid it by alleging that this transfer was fraudulently made; but the trial court found against her on that issue. She also sought to avoid the statute by alleging that she had no knowledge of this transfer until April, 1918, but the trial court made no finding on this issue. The trial court expressly found that the said transfer was made by the trustees "in violation of their duties as trustees." This was in effect, a finding that said transfer was invalid.

With respect to the question of the applicability of this statute of limitations, the case of Rossi v. Caire, 186 Cal. 544, 199 Pac. 1042, is precisely analogous to the instant case. That was an action against the director trustees for an accounting and distribution of the assets. In order to maintain that action it was necessary to hold that the plaintiff was entitled to the present possession of those assets (just as it is necessary here to hold that the plaintiff is entitled to the present possession of the real property). That action was therefore an indirect attack upon the validity of the transfer made by the trustees in August, 1913, just as this action is an indirect attack upon the validity of the same action taken and performed by the same trustees.

The decision of this court in that case holds that this statute is applicable to that case, but holds also that the plaintiff therein was relieved from the operation of the statute because of the fact that he commenced his action within a reasonable time (one month) after the taking effect of the statute. Applying the same rule to this case wherein the action was not commenced until 10 months after the statute took effect, we should hold that it is barred.

The effect of this decision, together with the two which preceded it in the Rossi Cases, is that all corporations which forfeited their charters prior to 1913, and thereafter revived them, became thereby divested of all their property and assets. As a matter of substantive law, they could reacquire such title only by means of conveyances from all of their stockholders. In the case of corporations having a large number of stockholders this would be a practical impossibility. I presume that it was to meet this very situation that this statute of limitations was enacted, to operate as a statute of repose and to afford a practical means by which the property of a revived corporation would, in effect, become revested in it, after the lapse of six months, unless some action should be instituted in the meantime. The strict and narrow construction adopted in the main opinion has the effect of nullifying the statute to the extent that it might afford a practical remedy for the unfortunate situation above referred to.

This court has frequently declared that "statutes of limitation are vital to the welfare of society, and are favored in the law." It seems to me proper that this one, at least, should be liberally construed with a view to make effective the evident purpose thereof.

ROSSI v. CAIRE et al. (S. F. 10233.)

Appeal and error ⊂=69(1)—In corporation dissolution proceedings interlocutory judgment, declaring plaintiff to be stockholder and directing accounting, not appealable.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, specifying interlocutory judgments from which an appeal may be taken, in corporation dissolution proceedings, an interlocutory judgment, declaring plaintiff was a stockholder, directing trustees to file an inventory and an accounting of corporation's property, and reserving for future disposition all further proceedings concerning the accounting and the settlement, was not appealable.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Edmund A. Rossi against Arthur J. Caire and others. From an interlocutory judgment establishing the status of plaintiff as a stockholder, defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Motion granted.

Frank P. Deering and J. F. Bluxome, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

D. Freidenrich and Ambrose Gherini, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss appeal from the interlocutory judgment herein. The facts of this case are sufficiently set forth in our former decisions in the cases of Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 161 Pac. 1161, and Rossi v. Caire, 186 Cal. 544, 199 Pac. 1042. In the latter of these cases the judgment in the defendants' favor was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with the views expressed in that decision. Thereafter the trial court made and entered its interlocutory judgment in the plaintiff's favor, declaring the status of the plaintiff as a stockholder of the Santa Cruz Island Company, a defunct corporation, and directing the defendants as trustees thereof to render and file a full inventory and accounting of the properties of said corporation in their hands as the trustees thereof, and take all necessary and proper steps to obtain possession of all such properties. The decree further orders:

"That all further proceedings in the matter of the accounting and settlement of the affairs of the Santa Cruz Island Company are reserved for disposition as may be hereafter determined and adjudged therein."

It is from this decree that the present appeal has been taken, and the ground of the respondent's motion to dismiss said appeal is "that the said interlocutory decree appealed from is a nonappealable order."

We think the motion must be granted. In the first case of Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 161 Pac. 1161, this court, in discussing a similar decree in a previous action between the same parties, for substantially the same relief, held that the judgment in that action "merely declared the status of the plaintiff as a stockholder, the number of his shares, his right to distribution, and directed the trustees to give notice to creditors and file an inventory of the assets of the corporation. In its nature and effect it was preliminary and interlocutory, and not final." The appeal in that case was from certain subsequent orders made upon the filing of such inventory, and which directed the sale of the properties and distribution of the funds of the corporation as reported therein. This court held that these orders were appealable as final judgments, and that upon such appeal "there may be a review of the previous proceedings, including the sufficiency of the findings to support the interlocutory judgment. These rulings cover the precise situation as presented upon the appeal, except that the appeal in this case is from the interlocutory judgment itself. Said interlocutory judgment is not one of the interlocutory judgments, orders, or decrees specified in section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, from which appeals are permitted to be taken, and the court is therefore without jurisdiction of the attempted appeal. Krotzer v. Clark, 178 Cal. 736, 174 Pac. 657. It follows that this appeal must be dismissed; and it is so ordered.

SHAW, C. J., and LENNON, LAWLOR, WILBUR, and WASTE, JJ., and RICHARDS, Justice pro tem., concur.

(58 Cal. App. 719)

KEY et al. v. VIDOVICH et al. (Civ. 4165.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 5, 1922.)

1. Reformation of instruments ⟹44—Oral evidence admissible to show mistake though contract within statute of frauds.

Though a contract for the sale of real estate was within the statute of frauds, where defendants pleaded mistake and asked for a reformation of the contract, oral testimony was admissible to show whether or not a mistake was made.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟹138—Knowledge of incumbrance does not destroy effect of covenant.

Where a vendor contracted to convey land free from incumbrances, the vendees' knowledge of the existence of an incumbrance did not destroy the effect of the covenant contained in the contract.

3. Reformation of instruments ⟹45(3)—Evidence insufficient to show mistake in not providing for sale subject to incumbrance.

In a suit to reform a contract for the sale of land, providing for conveyance free from incumbrances, excepting certain incumbrances, evidence, showing merely that in the negotiations an incumbrance was mentioned, and the vendees knew thereof, was insufficient to show a mistake justifying a reformation.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟹339—Tender unnecessary before suit, where vendor had parted with title.

Where no question of tender and demand was raised when vendors and purchasers came together for final settlement, and no conveyance was made because of a dispute about an incumbrance, and thereafter the vendor sold to other parties, it was not necessary that the vendees should tender, or offer to tender, the remaining purchase money before suing to recover the advance payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by S. L. Key and another against B. Vidovich and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Henry L. Meyers and G. L. Aynesworth, both of Fresno (L. N. Barber, of Fresno, of counsel), for appellants.

U. G. Hayden, of Fresno, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs sued the defendants to compel the repayment to them of $1,000, theretofore deposited as an advance payment on a purchase of real estate. The defendants filed an answer and a cross-complaint, and were awarded a judgment on their cross-complaint. The plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment.

The parties signed a paper in words and figures as follows:

"We, the undersigned, Charles Dubbs, and S. L. Key of the county of Fresno, state of California, hereby agree to purchase of and from B. Vidovich the following described real property, situated in the county of Fresno, state of California, to wit:

"Lots Nos. 9 and 10 in section 29, twp. 13 N. of range 17 E. of M. D. B. & M. base. Known as 40 acres in the Empire Colony, and belonging to said B. Vidovich. Furnish deed and certificate of title showing same free from incumbrance.

"For the purchase price of thirty-five thousand ($35,000) dollars, payable as follows: One thousand ($1,000.00) dollars cash on the execution of this contract, and the balance of thirty-four thousand ($34,000) dollars to be paid fifteen days from March 10, 1920.

"In the event that we fail to make said payment of $34,000 on receipt of said certificate of title said cash payment of $1,000.00 is to be forfeited for nonperformance of this contract.

"We agree to pay the taxes for the year 1920–1921.

"All horses and farming tools and implements that have been heretofore used on said ranch are to be part and parcel of said ranch.

"Possession of said premises is to be given to us five days after the final payment, as above stated, has been made, and we hereby agree that said present owner may occupy the house on said premises for a period of thirty days after said final settlement.

"Insurance policy on said property shall be transferred. [Signed] Charles Dubbs.
"S. L. Key.

"I hereby accept the terms in the sale of the above described property made by my agent, E. B. Wilson and agree thereto.
"B. Vidovich.
"Leni Vidovich.

"Dated: Fresno, California, March 10, 1920."

By their cross-complaint the defendants contended that the instrument above set forth did not express truly the contract as made by the parties, and that the real contract made by the parties was as follows (the portions which were alleged to have been omitted by and through mistake are in italics):

"We, the undersigned, Charles Dubbs and S. L. Key, of the county of Fresno, state of California, hereby agree to purchase of and from B. Vidovich the following described real property, situated in the county of Fresno, state of California, to wit:

"Lots Nos. 9 and 10 in section 29, Twp. 13 N. of range 17 E. of M. D. B. & M. base. Known as 40 acres in the Empire Colony, and belonging to said B. Vidovich. Said B. Vidovich to furnish deed and certificate of title showing same free from incumbrance, except taxes for the year 1920, water right agreement with Fresno Canal & Land Corporation, recorded in Volume Y of Covenants, page 137, Records of Fresno County, California, and agreement to sell and deliver raisins produced on said premises to the California Associated Raisin Company, recorded in volume 95 of Covenants, page 281, records of said Fresno county, all of which incumbrances we agree to assume.

"For the purchase price of thirty-five thousand ($35,000) dollars, payable as follows: One thousand ($1,000) dollars cash on the execution of this contract, and the balance of thirty-four thousand ($34,000) dollars to be paid fifteen days from March 10, 1920.

"In the event that we fail to make said payment of $34,000 on receipt of said certificate of title said cash payment of $1,000 is to be forfeited for nonperformance of this contract.

"We agree to pay the taxes for the year 1920–1921.

"All horses and farming tools and implements that have been heretofore used on said ranch are to be part and parcel of said ranch.

"Possession of said premises is to be given to us five days after the final payment, as above stated, has been made, and we hereby agree that said present owner may occupy the house on said premises for a period of thirty days after said final settlement.

"Insurance policy on said property shall be transferred. [Signed] Charles Dubbs.
"S. L. Key.

"I hereby accept the terms in the sale of the above-described property made by my agent, E. B. Wilson, and agree thereto.
"B. Vidovich.
"Leni Vidovich.

"Dated: Fresno, California, March 10, 1920."

The trial court made findings in which it specifically reformed the contract as the defendants claim the contract should have been worded, and thereupon it rendered a judgment enforcing the same.

[1] The appellants contend that the contract was one that fell within the statute of frauds, and that oral testimony should not have been permitted to alter the same. The general rule is as appellants contend, but as the defendants had interposed a cross-complaint based on the ground of mistake, although the contract in question fell within the statute of frauds, oral testimony was admissible to show whether or not a mistake had been made. F. P. Cutting Co. v. Peterson, 164 Cal. 44, 127 Pac. 163.

Commencing a few days before March 10th and extending over nearly the whole of the rest of the month of March, the parties and their agents were discussing the real estate deal, evidenced at least in part by the instrument herein first set forth. There is much testimony in the record to the effect that the plaintiffs were informed at an early date that the defendants were members of the California Associated Raisin Company; that they were also informed that the defendants had been complying with the terms of their contract, and were members in good standing. There is no evidence that the plaintiffs objected to the raisin contract except as is hereinafter mentioned. As from the beginning, the parties discussed two different purchase plans. One plan was that the transaction should be for cash. The other plan was that the sale should be made on a cash payment at the time of the sale and the balance to stand as a lien, and, in the latter plan the total sales price was to be higher than in the cash plan. There is no testimony in the record that the plaintiffs ever expressly agreed, orally or in writing, to take the property for a stated consideration subject to the raisin contract. Just before the paper was signed, the vendor and the vendees commenced to reach agreements regarding the various covenants. Thereupon Mr. Wilson, the agent of the vendor, commenced to make notes regarding the covenants to be inserted in the contract of sale. Later, when all of the covenants seemed to have been agreed upon, he took his notes to a typist of his own selection, and in a few minutes returned with a formal typewritten contract. With regard to the passages, inserted in the contract by the decree made by the trial court, there is no evidence that Mr. Wilson had taken down any notes on those subjects, nor that the paper as written and produced by him omitted any provisions that the parties had orally expressly agreed to. The notes made by Mr. Wilson were not produced, nor were the same called for. Although seven or eight persons were present at the various conversations that were held prior to the execution of the written instrument, no one of the witnesses testified that the vendees had expressly agreed at any time to take the property subject to the raisin contract. The most that was testified to in that behalf was that by reason of certain statements made it manifestly appeared that the vendees knew of the existence of said contract at the time that the contract of sale was executed.

On the 25th day of March, the date that the final payments were to be made, the attorney for the vendees called attention to the fact that the raisin contract was so worded as to constitute it an incumbrance. When he stated the point the vendor and the vendor's agents controverted the legal proposition that such a contract did constitute an incumbrance. Then it was for the first time that a controversy arose as to whether or not the written instrument signed by the parties fully and fairly stated the agreement which they had made.

[2] In view of the pleadings in this case it is necessary for us to consider the effect of the evidence introduced as applicable to an action at law and as applicable to an equitable action brought to reform the executory contract hereinabove set forth. Taking up first the action at law, it may be argued that the trial court was entitled to receive in evidence the formal written contract, and for the purpose of interpreting the terms of that instrument, that the trial court would be entitled to refer to the circumstances under which it was made. Civ. Code, § 1647. And it may be argued that, in exercising that power, it had the right to consider testimony showing that the purchasers signed the executory contract knowing of the existence of the raisin contract as an incumbrance. But such knowledge on their part would not destroy the effect of the covenant contained in the contract. In the case of Funk v. Voneida, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 109, 14 Am. Dec. 617, the court was considering the effect of an incumbrance that had been duly recorded and of which the purchaser had constructive notice. At page 112 of 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) (14 Am. Dec. 617) the court said:

"It is no answer to his complaint, to say, it was his duty to search the record, and to have protected himself by some special covenant, against this specific incumbrance. It was no part of this case, that he had actual notice; but if he had, it could make no difference. The plaintiff covenanted against all incumbrances. The rule as to the vendee, is, caveat emptor; so, let the vendor take care of the covenants he enters into. There was no special stipulation on the subject, and the plaintiff might safely rely on the general one. Notice of the mortgage would make no difference, as was determined in Levit v. Witherington, 1 Lutw. 317."

In the case of Smith v. Lloyd, 29 Mich. 382, the court was considering a general covenant against incumbrances, which expressly excepted a certain mortgage in the sum of $7,300. It transpired that the mortgage, principal and interest, amounted to $7,537. The purchaser contended that he was not liable for the excess. On page 388 the court said:

"In an action of covenant like this, I see nothing in the suggestion that this clause was sufficient notice to the purchaser, so that he might have ascertained the existing amount by due diligence. It is as usual, and certainly as competent, to covenant against known as unknown incumbrances or defects of title; and, with this covenant, the purchaser was not called upon for the exercise of any diligence."

The above cases express the general rule. Rawle on Covenants (5th Ed.) § 88; 39 Cyc. 2054.

[3] Taking up now the action to reform the deed on the claim of a mistake, the action for equitable relief rests solely on the evidence recited by us. The evidence which was insufficient to obtain relief at law was likewise insufficient to justify a reformation as for a mistake. There was some evidence that the minds of the parties had not met, but there was no evidence of a mistake.

[4] When the parties came together on March 25, 1920, it was apparently for the purpose of a final settlement. It appears from the record that the vendees took with them at least some moneys to make the final payment. The question of formality, or informality of their tender and demand was not raised. The parties at once launched into a discussion of the raisin contract being or not being an incumbrance. In the early part of September, 1920, the defendants sold the property in question for $45,000. After that sale had been made it was no longer necessary that the vendees should again tender, or offer to tender, the remaining unpaid purchase payments before commencing their action.

For the reasons above stated the judgment is reversed.

GARIN v. PELTON et al. (Civ. 4186.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 4, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 2, 1922.)

1. Certiorari ⊂⊃42(8)—General demurrer raises question as to whether proceedings are of a judicial character.

The general demurrer to a petition for a writ of certiorari raises the question whether the proceedings sought to be reviewed are of a judicial character, as only such proceedings can be reviewed in certiorari.

2. Certiorari ⊂⊃21 — Proceedings leading to closing of a street not subject to review in certiorari.

Proceedings by a board of trustees of a municipality leading to the closing of a street, authorized by St. 1889, p. 70, Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, act 3927, are not judicial and not subject to review in certiorari.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Petition for certiorari by H. P. Garin against Allen E. Pelton and others, constituting the Board of Trustees of the City of San Leandro. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 208 Pac. 693.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. Allison Bruner, City Atty., of San Leandro (Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro and Charles A. Ruggles, all of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants upon their demurrer to plaintiff's petition for a writ of review. The defendants constitute the board of trustees of the city of San Leandro. As such they enacted Ordinance No. 276 (N. S.), closing and abandoning a portion of Hepburn street, between Martinez and Alvarado streets.

[1] It is the theory of the plaintiff that the trustees exceeded their jurisdiction in enacting said ordinance, and for that reason he has asked that all the proceedings be annulled. The general demurrer of the defendants necessarily raises the question whether the proceedings sought to be reviewed and annulled were of a judicial character, because proceedings of such character only can be reviewed in certiorari.

[2] The power to conduct the proceedings leading to the closing of the street has been conferred upon the defendant by the act of March 6, 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 70, Deering's General Laws, act 3927). Under the terms of this act the board of trustees is called upon to exercise its judgment in determining whether a street should be closed, and before making its determination is required to give a notice of the time and place when protests may be received and heard and to conduct a hearing thereon. In Brown v. Board of Supervisors, 124 Cal. 274, 279, 57 Pac. 82, 83, the Supreme Court expressly held that—

"The hearing thus authorized was not a judicial hearing, but merely a mode of procedure for ascertaining the public interest, and that the board might determine whether that interest would be subserved by the improvement."

The rule thus announced has not been departed from, and it must be taken as settled, therefore, that the proceedings had under the terms of the act of March 6, 1889, are not judicial, and are therefore not subject to review in certiorari.

The judgment is affirmed.

Prohibition ⟸6(2)—Will not lie to prevent closing of street.

Prohibition will not lie to prevent proceedings by the board of trustees of a municipality to close a street, as such proceedings are not judicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Proceeding in prohibition by H. P. Garin against Allen E. Pelton and others, constituting the Board of Trustees of the City of San Leandro. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. Allison Bruner, City Atty., of San Leandro (Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro and Charles A. Ruggles, all of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment adverse to plaintiff in an action seeking to prohibit respondents from closing a certain street in San Leandro. Respondents insist that the proceedings which appellant sought to prohibit were not judicial. The proceedings are the same as those considered in Garin v. Pelton, No. 4186 (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 377, this day decided. It was there held that certiorari would not lie to review the proceedings because they were not judicial, and for the same reason prohibition cannot lie.

LACHMAN CO. v. CENTRAL CALIFORNIA BERRY GROWERS' ASS'N et al.

1. Appeal and error ⊂=842(1)—Determination of trial court of question of venue held not conclusive.

In action for breach of contract against an individual and a corporation, where the contract was set forth, the question whether a breach of the contract could give rise to a cause of action against a corporation defendant so as to warrant joinder of such defendant was one of law, the determination of which was not conclusive on appeal.

2. Venue ⊂=41—Contract held to give no cause of action against defendant joined.

In action against a berry grower and a berry growers' association, a corporation, for breach of contract for the sale of berries made by the individual defendant subject to the approval of the corporation defendant and approved by the corporation defendant, the contract held to create no obligation on the part of the corporation defendant in favor of plaintiff in case of breach of such contract; so that, as respects the question of venue, the corporation defendant was not a necessary party, and its joinder could not defeat the individual defendant's right to have the action tried in the county of his residence under Code Civ. Proc. § 395.

3. Venue ⊂=41—Statement of cause of action against joint defendant is not conclusive.

The fact that the complaint in an action for breach of contract stated a cause of action against a corporation defendant joined with the individual defendant was not conclusive upon the question of venue, but the individual defendant, in his affidavit filed in connection with motion for change of venue, could deny the liability of the corporation defendant and annex to said affidavit a copy of the contract, showing that the cause of action stated did not in reality exist.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Lachman Company against the Central California Berry Growers' Association and T. Uno. From an order denying motion of the last-named defendant for change of venue, he appeals. Reversed, with directions.

S. W. Molkenbuhr and Thos. W. Firby, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Philip S. Ehrlich, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order denying the motion of the defendant T. Uno to change the place of trial of the action from the city and county of San Francisco to San Benito county, the residence of said defendant.

The action is a personal one, being an action to recover damages for alleged breach of a contract to deliver certain quantities of strawberries. Defendant Uno appeared and filed a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, and at the same time filed an affidavit of merits and made his motion for a change of the place of trial. Said motion was based upon the ground of the residence of said Uno in San Benito county, and upon the further ground that the Central California Berry Growers' Association was not a proper defendant in the action; that plaintiff corporation has no cause of action against said Central California Berry Growers' Association, a corporation, arising out of the subject-matter of said action, or the contracts referred to in the amended complaint, and that no judgment can be entered against said Central California Berry Growers' Association, due to any alleged breach of said contracts; that said Central California Berry Growers' Association was made a party defendant herein for the sole purpose of defeating the right of the real defendant, to wit, T. Uno, to have the action tried in the county of his residence.

The amended complaint alleges that on or about the 11th and 29th days of March, 1919, at San Francisco, "plaintiff above named and defendants above named made and entered into a contract in writing under the terms of which said defendants agreed to sell and deliver to plaintiff, and said plaintiff agreed to buy from defendants" 400 and 250 chests of strawberries, respectively. The written contracts were not set forth in said amended complaint. In his affidavit filed in connection with his motion, defendant Uno denied all the material allegations of the amended complaint, and specifically denied that the plaintiff had entered into any written contracts with the Central California Berry Growers' Association and defendant Uno, and said defendant Uno annexed to said affidavit copies of the contracts which were in fact actually made and entered into between the Lachman Company (the buyer) and T. Uno (the seller). No counter affidavits were filed by respondent, and it therefore appears uncontradicted in the record that the only written contracts entered into were those set forth in appellant's affidavit. Indeed plaintiff and respondent, in its brief, states, in regard to this matter:

"Plaintiff does not deny that the contracts referred to in the foregoing statement by appellant were the only contracts entered into by the parties. However, respondent does not agree that appellant's contention that the contracts set forth show that the corporation defendant was not a necessary party to the action."

The contracts set forth in the affidavit are identical except for differences in dates and in the number of chests of berries covered thereby. One of them reads as follows:

"Central California Berry Growers' Association.

"Members' Sale Contract.

"The Lachman Company, hereinafter called the buyer, agrees to purchase and accept from T. Uno, hereinafter called the seller, and the seller agrees to sell and deliver to the buyer, 250 chests of strawberries, containing an average net weight of eighty pounds and the buyer agrees to purchase from the seller an additional number of chests of none berries, not to exceed none chests as the seller may elect to deliver.

"Both parties agree that:

"(a) Deliveries hereunder shall be made between the date of May 15, 1919 and Sept. 15, 1919.

"(b) Deliveries shall be in quantities of not less than five chests, nor more than twenty chests per day.

"(c) Said berries shall be field run, reasonably ripe, and of a quality suitable for canning, preserving and packing purposes.

"(d) The berries need not be packed in baskets, but may be delivered loose in the slides or crates as may be prescribed by Central California Berry Growers' Association.

"(e) Said berries shall be delivered and accepted at Betabel Station, Calif., and no deductions in weight on account of quality or variety shall be made by the buyer without first notifying the seller or the manager or assistant of the Central California Berry Growers' Association.

"(f) The purchase price of said berries shall be 11 cents per pound net, and the buyer to pay all transportation charges.

"(g) An association fee of 8 cents per chest of berries delivered hereunto shall be retained from the seller's returns, and paid to Central California Berry Growers' Association by the buyer.

"The buyer agrees to:

"(a) To make daily reports to the seller or to the seller's agent as to weights, specifying gross, net and tare.

"(b) Each and every Wednesday to make settlement in full to Central California Berry Growers' Association for all berries delivered hereunder the preceding week.

"(c) That no berries delivered under this agreement shall be sold as fresh fruit but that all of said berries must be used for canning, preserving or packing purposes.

"(d) To empty all containers as soon as possible and to return the same to the owners thereof, through channels by which same have been delivered, freight charges prepaid. For every such container not returned within five days after final delivery thereunder the buyer agrees to pay the seller $2.50.

"This contract shall be void in case of fires, strikes, accidents or other causes beyond the control of either party, and is subject to approval for the seller by the Central California Berry Growers' Association, and for the buyer by his general office.

"Read, considered and signed at Betabel, California, this 29th day of March, 1919.

"The Lachman Co.
"T. Uno, Seller.

"Approved: The Lachman Company, by Charles Lachman. Central California Berry Growers' Ass'n, by H. M. Wit, Manager."

[1] Respondent's position in support of the ruling of the trial court is that as the amended complaint alleged that the contracts were entered into between plaintiff and both defendants, and the trial court, in denying the motion of appellant, has impliedly so found, that matter may not be examined into by this court upon appeal. But the error of respondent is in treating such a determination by the trial court as a determination of fact, when in reality it is a question of law. It being admitted by plaintiff that its cause of action against either or both of the defendants grew out of the contract which we have herein set forth and another contract of similar legal import, the question of whether or not such contracts bound the defendant, Central California Berry Growers' Association, and could give rise to a cause of action against it, was purely one of law, in the determination of which, we think the trial court erred. It is clear that this contract creates no obligation on the part of Central California Berry Growers' Association in favor of the plaintiff, and no judgment could be rendered against said association because of the failure of Uno, the seller, to comply with his contract and deliver the strawberries to the plaintiff.

[2] Under such circumstances, the Central California Berry Growers' Association is not a necessary party to the action, and its joinder as a defendant cannot defeat appellant's right to have the action tried in the county of his residence. Section 395, Code Civ. Proc.; McDonald v. California Timber Co., 151 Cal. 159, 90 Pac. 548; Sayward v. Houghton, 82 Cal. 628, 630, 23 Pac. 120.

[3] The mere fact that a complaint states a cause of action is not conclusive. It may be shown that the cause of action stated does not in reality exist. Karst v. Seller, 45 Cal. App. 623, 188 Pac. 298, 300.

The order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant the motion of defendant Uno to change the place of trial to the county of his residence.

LACHMAN CO. v. CENTRAL CALIFORNIA BERRY GROWERS' ASS'N et al. (Civ. 4240.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 12, 1922.)

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Lachman Company against the Central California Berry Growers' Association and T. Toyama. From an order denying the last-named defendant's motion for change of venue, he appeals. Reversed, with directions.

S. W. Molkenbuhr and Thos. W. Firby, both of San Francisco, for appellant.
Philip S. Ehrlich, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order denying the motion of the defendant T. Toyama to change the place of trial of the action from the city and county of San Francisco to San Benito county, the residence of said defendant.

By stipulation and order heretofore made herein, this appeal is considered upon the transcript and briefs on file in this court in the case of The Lachman Co., a Corporation, v. Central California Berry Growers' Association et al., No. 4245, 209 Pac. 379, of the records of this court. The essential facts are identical in the two cases, and for the reasons given in the opinion filed in said case of The Lachman Co. v. Central California Berry Growers' Association, No. 4245, the order appealed from herein is reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant the motion of defendant Toyama to change the place of trial of the action to the county of his residence.

PEOPLE v. ROE. (Cr. 609.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 4, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 2, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⊂⊃970(7)—Indictment and information ⊂⊃154—Objections to indictments held waived by failure to demur and motion in arrest inappropriate.

Objections to an indictment under Pen. Code, § 1004, on the ground that it does not conform to sections 950–952, in that the facts are not stated in such manner that a person of common understanding would know what was intended, that it is not in the prescribed form, and that it is indefinite and uncertain as to the offense charged, are all waived by failure to demur thereto, in view of section 1185, and such objections cannot be taken advantage of after conviction by a motion in arrest of judgment.

2. Indictment and information ⊂⊃110(3)—Indictment charging criminal syndicalism in language of statute sufficient.

Where the charge of criminal syndicalism is based upon a violation of Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subds. 1, 2, 3, and 5, the specific acts constituting the crime alleged must be set forth in the indictment, but where the charge is based upon a violation of subdivision 4 of such section, the indictment is sufficiently specific if framed in the language of the subdivision itself.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃369(1)—Testimony as to acts of lawlessness held admissible to show character of an organization.

In a prosecution for the crime of criminal syndicalism, evidence of certain acts of lawlessness, sufficiently connected with the Industrial Workers of the World to establish them as the acts of that organization, were held admissible for the sole purpose of showing the character of the organization to which the defendant admittedly belonged.

4. Insurrection and sedition ⟸2—Evidence of the nature of an organization prior to the passage of the Criminal Syndicalism Act held admissible.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, testimony of the character and practices of an organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World before the passage of the Criminal Syndicalism Act held admissible, where after the passage of the act they continued to promulgate the same principles and practices as before, as tending to prove the nature and character of the organization, not because the defendant was liable for what the organization did before the statute was passed, but because, knowing its character, he violated the act by remaining a member.

5. Insurrection and sedition ⟸2—Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction under the Criminal Syndicalism Act.

Evidence held sufficient to establish the nature, purpose, and methods of the Industrial Workers of the World so as to sustain a conviction of one admittedly a member under the Criminal Syndicalism Act, declaring any person who "is or knowingly becomes a member of any organization, society, group or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism" is guilty of a felony.

6. Criminal law ⟸829(3, 18)—Requested instructions on reasonable doubt and defining sabotage held covered by charge given.

Requested instructions as to reasonable doubt, and defining the word "sabotage" as used in the Criminal Syndicalism Act, and declaring that the term so defined "must be used as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control or effecting a political change," and further specifying the nature of acts which it might embrace, held properly covered by instructions given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

James Roe was convicted of criminal syndicalism, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Austin Lewis, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was indicted and tried for and convicted of the crime of violating certain provisions of the act of the Legislature of 1919 penalizing what is generically described by said act as "criminal syndicalism." Stats. 1919, p. 281. He presented a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and the appeals are from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant, for a reversal of the judgment and the order, contends: (1) That the indictment is violative of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, in that the purported statement therein of the act or acts constituting the offense sought to be charged is not set forth "in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended," that it does not conform to the form of an indictment as is exemplified by section 951, and that it is lacking in directness and certainty as to "the particular circumstances of the offense charged," the claim being that, to state the offense which is by the indictment attempted to be lodged against the accused, the circumstances essential to the completion of said offense under the statute must be set forth with particularity; (2) that error was committed in the admission of certain testimony; (3) that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict; (4) that the court erred to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the accused by its refusal to read to the jury two certain instructions proposed by him.

[1] 1. No demurrer was interposed to the indictment, but a motion in arrest of judgment was, after conviction, made by the defendant upon the ground that it does not conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code. See section 1004, Pen. Code. Of course the question of the sufficiency of the facts to state a public offense was not raised by the motion. The objection to the indictment upon the ground upon which the motion in arrest of judgment was based is deemed to have been waived by the failure to demur to that pleading. Pen. Code, § 1185; People v. Tomsky, 20 Cal. App. 672, 677, 130 Pac. 184. We will, however, briefly consider the objection. To do this, it will be necessary first to examine some of the provisions of the statute defining "criminal syndicalism," and upon certain of whose provisions the indictment against the accused is based. The first section of said act reads as follows:

"The term 'criminal syndicalism' as used in this act is hereby defined as any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change."

The second section, in subdivisions 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 thereof, describes or specifically enumerates as many different and distinct acts as coming within the description of "criminal syndicalism" as the same is defined in section 1. Upon subdivision 4 of section 2 the indictment here is founded. Said subdivision reads: Any person, who "organizes or assists in organizing, or is or knowingly becomes a member of, any organization, society, group or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism," is guilty of a felony, etc. The indictment is, substantially, in the language of said subdivision 4 of section 2 of the statute, and is as follows:

"The said James Roe, on the ——— day of June, A. D. 1921, at the county of Sacramento, in the state of California, and before the finding of this indictment, was then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously and knowingly a member of an organization, society, group and assemblage of persons known and designated as the 'Industrial Workers of the World,' and sometimes known and referred to as the 'I. W. W.,' which said organization, society, group and assemblage of persons was then and there organized and assembled to advocate, teach, and aid and abet criminal syndicalism contrary," etc.

[2] The position of the defendant is that, since the people, in proof of the charge, relied, to a large extent, upon certain literature issued by and under the authority of the organization to which the defendant is alleged to belong, in the form of books, booklets, magazines and other like publications, in which the principles of said organization were declared and advocated, it was incumbent upon the prosecution to plead such publications or printed matter, or so much thereof as would constitute the offense of criminal syndicalism as it is denounced or defined by said subdivision. We need not follow the learned argument of counsel for the defendant supporting this proposition. It is sufficient to say that the same point arose, was considered, and decided adversely to the position of the defendant in the cases of People v. Steelik (Cal. Sup.) 203 Pac. 78, and People v. Taylor (Cal. Sup.) 203 Pac. 85. It is held in those cases that, while the charge of criminal syndicalism in an indictment or information is insufficiently stated unless the acts specified in the statute as constituting the same are specifically set forth in such pleading, said crime is sufficiently stated where it is based upon subdivision 4 of section 2 of said statute if the accusatory pleading merely charges the crime in the language of said subdivision. In other words, those cases hold that where the charge of criminal syndicalism is based on subdivisions 1, 2, 3, and 5 of section 2, the acts enumerated in said subdivisions as constituting criminal syndicalism must be pleaded with a degree of particularity that will impart to the accused precise information of the acts with the commission of which he is charged, and which, with the evidence adduced to sustain such charge, upon the conviction of the accused thereof, will operate as a bar to another or further prosecution for the same specific acts of criminal syndicalism, but that, where the charge is the violation of subdivision 4, the statement in the indictment or information is sufficient if it is in the language of said subdivision, since the acts therein denounced as acts of criminal syndicalism are sufficiently described by the language itself of said subdivision to make it perfectly clear what was thereby intended. In the Steelik Case the court said, quoting the syllabus:

"An indictment charging a defendant with belonging to the Industrial Workers of the World sufficiently charges an offense under subdivision 4 of section 2 of the act."

This language is, of course, to be read with the qualification that the indictment must also show or allege that the Industrial Workers of the World constitute an organization banded together for the purpose of advocating, teaching, or aiding and abetting criminal syndicalism as said crime is described by section 1 of the act; and the indictment upon which the defendant was tried and convicted, it will be observed, specifically so alleges or charges. There is nothing said in the Taylor Case, supra, at variance with what is said in the Steelik Case regarding the point under consideration. In the Taylor case it is said:

"On the consideration of the petition for a transfer we were inclined to the opinion that, where a defendant was charged with advocating a certain doctrine or printing a certain book or pamphlet, or circulating the same, it was essential that the name and description of the book, document, etc., should be contained in the indictment for the information of the defendant."

The court said, however, that the question did not arise in that case, for the reason that as to the counts in the indictment based on the subdivisions of section 2 denouncing as an offense the act of printing or publishing or distributing literature in any form which advocated the commission of acts of criminal syndicalism, the jury had disagreed, and said counts were thereupon dismissed. It is thus to be noted that the court did not decide the point; but if it had and so had held that, as to an indictment based upon the subdivisions relating to spoken or printed words or books or pamphlets advocating acts of criminal syndicalism, such spoken or written words or books or pamphlets should be pleaded or named and described, it is clear, as has been explained, that the rule so laid down would have no application to the indictment against the defendant in this case.

[3] 2. The first of the several assignments of error based upon rulings admitting certain testimony arose as follows: One Arada, a laborer, with some 48 or more other laborers, in the month of August, 1917, was employed to dig potatoes on a ranch about 15 miles from the city of Stockton, and, while so engaged, some 14 other men made their appearance at said ranch and applied to the owner of the ranch for like employment, and were put to work, commencing their labors in the afternoon, shortly after the lunch hour. These 14 men worked all of the afternoon, and at night retired in the "bunk" house on the ranch with the other men. On the following morning the fourteen men referred to abandoned the work and left the farm. The other men (those at work when the 14 arrived at the ranch) resumed work that morning, but had not proceeded far when their feet developed a burning sensation, the pain therefrom increasing within a short time to such an intensity that it became unbearable, and so they could not proceed with their labors. On removing their shoes, and inspecting the inside thereof, they discovered that acid in the form of a powder—something of the color of brown sugar—had been deposited therein by some party or parties. The injury thus inflicted upon them required them to cease work and seek immediate medical treatment. Arada testified that he was so crippled as the effect of the burns thus produced that he was compelled to remain in the county hospital under treatment for over a year. In fact, he testified, it was for a while thought by the attending surgeons that it would be necessary, to preserve his life, to amputate one of his lower limbs. Neither Arada nor the other men with whom he was working when the "14" appeared at the ranch were members of the Industrial Workers of the World. After the "14" left the ranch, some I. W. W. papers were found in the "bunk" house where they slept the night they remained on the ranch. The objection to this testimony was that it was hearsay, and further that the acts were not connected up to the I. W. W. organization, and consequently not binding upon the defendant. Other witnesses in the case (former members of the I. W. W.) testified that a certain chemical combination (described by one of them as such a solution of potassium with other chemicals as would immediately produce burns when the solution came in contact with a body containing moisture) was one of the instrumentalities employed by said organization to terrorize laboring men who were not members of the organization, and thus so to intimidate them as to cause them to refuse to take employment in the fields or fruit orchards of the country. This description of this chemical combination tallied, substantially, with the description given by the witness, Arada, of the chemical particles which were placed in the shoes of the laborers with whom the said Arada was working at the time of the incident referred to by him. This testimony, together with the circumstance of the finding of I. W. W. papers at the ranch after the "14" men had departed therefrom, it being also shown that prior to the arrival of said "14" men at said ranch no such papers were seen on or about the premises, constituted a sufficient foundation for the allowance of Arada's testimony, which was admissible, not for the purpose of connecting the defendant with the act or acts supposed to have been committed by the "14" men, but for the sole purpose of showing the character of the organization to which the defendant is alleged to belong, and to which the circumstances as revealed by said testimony and other testimony as to the practices of the organization strongly tend to show the "14" men belong or belonged.

[4] The other like assignments of error involve rulings permitting, over objections by defendant, certain ex-members of the I. W. W. organization to testify in detail as to the principles advocated by said organization and its activities for many years prior and subsequently to the time at which the Legislature passed the Criminal Syndicalism Act in carrying out by a variety of violent means said principles. This testimony was admissible as tending to disclose the character of said organization, and this is even true if the principles so advocated and the acts so practiced were advocated and practiced by the organization before the defendant became a member thereof. This proposition, however, is fully examined and clearly explained, and all the objections urged here against the testimony referred to conclusively answered in the Steelik Case, supra, as follows:

"In this case, the only question the defendant can be heard upon is whether or not the evidence of the conduct of members of the I. W. W. before the passage of the act is admissible as tending to establish the character of the organization after the passage of the act and during the time the defendant belonged thereto. It seems too clear for discussion that where the issue involves the character of an organization it is proper to determine the character of the organization from the conduct of its members and officers, including the propaganda which it publishes. It is no doubt true that the presumption of innocence would overcome the legal presumption that when the nature of a thing is once shown it is presumed that it continues thereafter as long as such thing usually continues. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32. But where such proof is fortified by actual proof that subsequent to the passage of the act the organization continued to publish the same sort of propaganda, it is proper to consider the evidence of the conduct of the organization both before and after the passage of the statute in order to determine whether or not it is such an organization as is denounced by the statute. As the defendant knowingly continued his membership in the organization after such conduct had been denounced by the statute as criminal, he is liable, not for what the organization did before he joined it or for its character before the statute was passed, but because after the statute was passed he violated the terms thereof by knowingly remaining a member thereof. It is contended that the evidence of these members of the I. W. W. was inadmissible for the further reason that it consisted of declarations of coconspirators, and was not admissible until the conspiracy was established by other evidence than such declarations. In making this contention the appellant wholly misconceives the applicability of the rule with reference to the declarations of coconspirators. The evidence adduced in court by the coconspirators as witnesses are not declarations of conspirators, but direct testimony to the facts to which they testify. Aside from the discredit which attaches to them as accomplices, their evidence is entirely competent to establish the facts to which they testify. The rule for which counsel contends is applicable only when it is sought to introduce extrajudicial declarations and statements of coconspirators."

[5] 3. The point that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict is entirely without merit, to confirm which statement it will be necessary to go no further than to refer herein in a very general way to the evidence.

The fact that, at the time of his arrest, the defendant was a member of the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World, and had been such member since the year 1918, was admitted by him, not only at the time of his arrest, but also when he testified at the trial of this case in his own behalf. As to the character of said organization, its principles, policies, and practices, it is clear that there is ample evidence to show that the implied finding of the jury that the propaganda sponsored and spread over the world by said organization involves, not only the teaching of political principles, revolutionary in their character, but also the sanctioning and advocacy of violent and criminal methods for the carrying out of those principles.

The defendant was arrested on the 22d day of June, 1921, at Third and O streets in the city of Sacramento, by two police officers of said city, upon telephonic information to the effect that he was selling and distributing what is known as I. W. W. literature. In his possession was a canvas bag or knapsack which contained many copies of magazines, books, booklets, and pamphlets in which were printed articles or addresses vigorously supporting and advocating the I. W. W. cause and its objects and the methods of putting its principles into effect. The defendant admitted that he was selling and thus distributing these publications. They consisted of 30 or more printed documents, here introduced in evidence, and copious extracts therefrom, read to the jury, and so incorporated into the record of this case. The general purpose of said organization, as it was disclosed by the publications referred to, is to secure control of the government of the United States and of the state governments, and substitute for our present form of government what said organization calls an industrial government—that is to say, said organization believes in and vigorously advocates a government in which all laws shall be made in the workshop instead of by the Legislature. According to the publications referred to said organization teaches that—

> Our government as it now exists "is merely a reflex of the industrial conditions of the country; that the governments we have to-day are the instruments of the capitalist class; and as an organization they [the members thereof] ignore the government. They have their own government, their own rules, their own regulations and they abide by those and no other."

The "preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World" very clearly illustrates their attitude or position toward the governments of this country. It reads in part:

> "The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace as long as hunger and want are found among millions of the working people and the few who make up the employing class have all the good things of life. Between those two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system."

Upon its face the foregoing does not appear to state more than an innocent or a legitimate economic proposition. No one of sense and fairness will deny the right of the laboring classes to maintain an organization for proper self-protection. No sensible and fair person will deny that an equitable division of the profits accruing from the combined operation of capital and labor between these two essential elements of industrial progress and prosperity should be had. Nor is it a crime per se, or, for that matter, a crime at all, for a person or a class of persons to advocate a scheme according to Utopian ideals for the government of the peoples of the earth and an equal distribution among all the people of the fruits of all material or industrial activity in all its manifold forms. Such a condition, if practicable under the existing order of things in this world, would certainly present an ideal situation of the most exalted character. Such may be the real ultimate object of the I. W. W. and kindred organizations, but, if this be so, it will readily be admitted that the scheme is wholly chimerical, as undoubtedly More, who sought to establish the same sort of political philosophy through his Utopia, and Bellamy, following the same general line of thought, essayed the presentation of an analogous conceit in his Looking Backward, really themselves believed. While, as stated, there is no criminal purpose to be imputed to the fact of the mere advocacy of a plan for the government of the peoples of the earth which would or might bring to them what may well be termed a condition of consummate beatitude in wordly affairs, yet, when in attempting to crystalize such a condition any organization resorts to criminal acts of any character, or proposes to do it by the destruction of property and vested rights, then it has clearly transcended the line of demarcation between right and wrong; and the vice of the whole scheme of the organization known as the I. W. W. is, according to the testimony in this case, in the methods which it advocates and to which its members without scruples resort for carrying out its principles, and as to this phase of the case the record before us overflows with proof of the most dastardly crimes known to the criminal law which were resorted to for the avowed purpose of terrorizing the people, in the vain hope of intimidating them into accepting the propaganda of the I. W. W. as the true faith in the matter of government. According to the testimony of the two witnesses, who, as above stated, were former members of the Industrial Workers of the World (Coutts and Dymond by name), the members of that organization not only believe in and teach the overthrow of our present system of government, but sanction as the means of accomplishing that result the crime of arson, sabotage, which means the willful destruction of the machinery of industry and other property, and any other act which, in their judgment, will instill into the people at large a feeling of absolute terror. Numerous instances of fires started by members of the organization, whereby valuable properties were destroyed, were given by Dymond in this case. For instance, he testified that in Stanislaus county in the year 1917, during one night, some eight haystacks, containing large quantities of hay, and situated on as many different ranches in near proximity to each other, were set on fire and destroyed, the several fires burning at the same time or almost simultaneously. In the city of Modesto in the same year, so Dymond proceeded, eight different stables and their contents were destroyed by incendiary fires on a single night. Dymond testified that he personally knew that this wholesale destruction of property was caused by the direct acts of members of the I. W. W. He further testified that while no specific action was ever taken by the organization, as such, authorizing the destruction of property by the members thereof by acts of sabotage or other criminal means, it was, nevertheless, one of the rules of the organization that the members thereof in such matters should act upon their own initiative whenever they thought it necessary to accomplish a particular object or the ends of the general purposes of the organization. In a word, both he and Coutts testified that the organization and its members believed in and advocated "direct action"; that is, instead of resorting to lawful methods or pacific means for the redress of what they conceived to be the industrial wrongs inflicted upon them or for the adjustment of any grievances arising between the laboring element and the capitalistic class, they believed in and advocated the taking of such matters into their own hands and settling them according to their own methods. The organization, said these witnesses, had no more sympathy for members of the American Federation of Labor than it had for the capitalistic class, and that one of its own aims was to block by any means which would accomplish that end, howsoever criminal they might be, every act or step taken by the former organization to maintain a high wage standard for its members. The theory of this line of thought seems to be that no contract or compact of any kind or nature should be made between the laboring men and the capitalistic class. In other words, it is antagonistic to the principles of the I. W. W. organization to recognize the right of any man or set of men to fix or establish the compensation for labor; that the whole industrial and politico-economic system as it exists to-day is without a just foundation, and is at variance with every correct idea of industrial rights and economy. Asked what was the attitude of the members of the I. W. W. towards men and women who had been sent to prison for the commission of crime, Dymond replied that persons so convicted, and who had served terms of imprisonment in the penitentiaries of the country, were regarded by the members of said organization, regardless of the nature of their crimes, as martyrs. But it is not necessary to proceed further in a review of the evidence or in setting forth the principles of the organization to which the defendant admitted that he belonged and the violent methods which that organization was shown to advocate for the accomplishment of its objects. From the record, reams and reams could be written and recited of the utterances, printed and spoken, of the members of that organization, advocating the destruction of our present system of government and of criminal acts and conduct by members directed to the advancement of that ultimate object of said organization. There now has been presented herein a sufficient explanation or exposure of the cardinal principles, the ultimate purpose and the methods of the Industrial Workers of the World, as the same were revealed by the testimony, documentary as well as oral, by the record before us, to show that, as maintained at and before the trial of this case, they constituted an organization which comes clearly within the inhibitions of the Criminal Syndicalism Act of this state.

We may add that the testimony generally in this case is very much of the same character as that which was presented in the cases of People v. Steelik, supra, and People

v. Taylor, supra, of which synoptical statements are given in the opinions therein.

But the point is urged that there is no testimony showing that the defendant became and continued to remain a member of said organization knowing or having knowledge that its object was to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism. The record discloses evidence of circumstances which, if accepted as verity by the jury, as evidently it was, were sufficient to persuade the triers to the conviction that the defendant knew at all times that said organization advocated and taught criminal syndicalism. It is not necessary to make special reference to these circumstances.

[6] 4. The court refused to allow two instructions proposed by the defendant, and it is here claimed that in such refusal prejudicial error was committed. The first of these involved a definition of the word "sabotage" as the same is used in the statute, and further declared that "sabotage" as so defined "must be used as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control or effecting a political change," and that unless unlawful acts or violence are employed as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control or effecting a political change, such acts or violence do not come within the scope of the "Criminal Syndicalism Act."

That instruction was substantially covered by the instruction, given by the court, in the language of section 1 of the act in question, wherein "criminal syndicalism" is defined, and wherein also the word "sabotage" is defined as meaning "willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property," and by the further given instruction to the effect that, to justify a conviction, it was necessary to show beyond a reasonable doubt, not only that the defendant was, at the time mentioned in the indictment, a member of the Industrial Workers of the World, and that said organization was then and there a society or group or assemblage of persons then and there organized or assembled to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism as that term is defined in the statute and in "these instructions," etc., but also that the defendant then and there knew and had knowledge that the purpose and objects of said organization, etc., "were and was the commission of the acts denounced by the criminal syndicalism law," etc.

The other instruction which the defendant proposed and the court disallowed was covered by the given instruction above considered. It would have told the jury what the court did tell them that—

"In order to convict the defendant, you must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that between the date of this act going into effect and the 22d day of June, 1921, the date of his arrest, defendant did discover and know that the organization herein referred to as the I. W. W. was an organization for the purpose of advocating, teaching, aiding, and abetting criminal syndicalism."

The court having given substantially a similar instruction—one covering precisely the same principle—the refusal to repeat it is, of course, no ground for just complaint.

The defendant appears to have been fairly tried and legally convicted, and the judgment and the order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

BIBBY et ux. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. et al. (Civ. 4228.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 2, 1922. Rehearing Denied Sept. 1, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 28, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1064(1)—Instruction as to single or joint liability to plaintiff held not prejudicial where two codefendants were actors in automobile-street car accident.

In an action by occupant of defendant's automobile, which collided with codefendant's street car, an instruction that, if plaintiff's injury was found to have been proximately caused by the accident, there should be a finding against at least one of the defendants, or both if their negligence was concurrent, held not prejudicial.

2. Trial ⊂⊃228(1)—Refused instruction concerning auto driver's rights with reference to motorman's duties held multifarious.

Where one or both auto owner and street railroad could be found responsible for the collision causing plaintiff's injuries, refused instruction concerning auto driver's rights with reference to motorman's duties at crossings held multifarious.

3. Street railroads ⊂⊃90(4)—Motorman may assume automobile driver will use care.

A motorman exercising ordinary care may assume that an automobile bus will not be driven so close to his car as to be struck when the car's approach can be observed by the use of ordinary care, and it is not his duty to slow down until he sees that the automobile will continue upon the track, and he must then use ordinary care.

4. Street railroads ⊂⊃99(10)—Automobile bus driver negligent in failing to see street car.

An automobile bus driver who fails to see and heed a street car visible to him by the use of ordinary care before driving into a place of danger is guilty of negligence.

5. Street railroads ⊂⊃85(4)—Rights of automobile bus driver and motorman not equal.

The rights of the driver of an automobile bus and the motorman on an interurban car of a street car company are not equal, and their duties to avoid collision while traveling on the railroad rails at an intersection are not identically the same.

6. Trial ⊂238—Instructions held not unfavorable to auto owner suddenly confronted with danger of collision with street car.

Where one or both auto owner or street railway could be found responsible for a collision causing plaintiff's injuries, two instructions held not erroneous as to auto owner as setting up different standards of conduct for the two vehicles suddenly confronted with danger.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by J. R. Bibby and wife against the Pacific Electric Railway Company and F. M. Dimmick. From a judgment against defendant Dimmick, he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Gunter, Clyde R. Burr, and Janeway, Beach & Pratt, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants to recover damages for injuries caused by a collision which occurred between the hotel bus owned and operated by the defendant Dimmick and an interurban car owned and operated by the defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company. The plaintiffs had judgment against the defendant Dimmick, and that defendant has appealed.

The plaintiffs are husband and wife. In their complaint they charge negligence against the owner of the bus and against the street car company. The latter filed an answer in which it denied that it was negligent and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. The other defendant filed an amended answer, on which he went to trial, and therein he denied negligence on his part, and alleged that the accident was caused by the negligence of the street car company. Plaintiffs called several witnesses who testified that at the time of the accident the hotel bus was running at a speed variously estimated at 15, 16, 17, or 18 miles per hour, and that the street car was traveling at the rate of 5 or 6 miles per hour. The accident occurred in the month of February at about 9:30 in the evening, and the evidence showed that the headlight on the street car was lighted, and that the headlights on the auto bus were lighted. There was no evidence introduced by any one of the parties proving or tending to prove that the plaintiffs, or either of them, was guilty of contributory negligence. They had arrived on an evening train and had entered the auto bus of the defendant Dimmick to go as guests to stop at his hotel. There was evidence that the street car had stopped at the intersection of Fifth and San Pedro streets and that the conductor had given the signal to go ahead, and that thereupon the motorman had sounded his gong and had started forward, and when he had proceeded but a short distance the auto bus approached from the side, and then turned slightly in the same direction the car was going, but, continuing ahead, brushed the front end of the car and was turned over. The street car proceeded a few feet and came to a stop. At the time of the trial the driver of the auto bus could not be produced as a witness, nor was his deposition produced.

[1] For grounds of reversal the appellant complains of certain alleged errors made by the trial court in giving, or refusing to give, certain instructions. Upon the request of the plaintiffs the court gave an instruction worded as follows:

"You are instructed that under the evidence there is no question of contributory negligence in this case, and if you find that the plaintiff, Elizabeth Bibby, was injured proximately by the happening of the accident, then you will find against at least one of the defendants, or both of them if you find that the negligence that caused the accident was the concurrent, joint, and contemporaneous negligence of each defendant acting one with the other; but, whether you find against both defendants, you will have to find against one of them."

The giving of a very similar instruction was discussed in the case entitled Blackwell, etc., v. American Film Co. (Cal. App.) 192 Pac. 189. In that case it was held that the giving of the instruction was not a prejudicial error. For the reasons assigned in that case we think that the giving of the above instruction was not prejudicial error in this case.

[2] The appellant requested the trial court to give his (appellant's) instruction No. 44. The trial court refused to give it. The appellant assigns such refusal as error. The instruction was multifarious. Among other things it charged as follows:

"* * * When the driver of an automobile approaches the crossing of street car or railroad tracks laid in the streets or public highways, for the purpose of crossing the same, he has a right to assume and act upon the theory that he has an equal right with others, including the street car, and has a right to act upon the belief and expectation that the street car company, as well as himself, will use the reasonable care that the situation requires to avoid running down any person on the street or public highway, and that those approaching him from the side, will look out ahead and use reasonable care and caution to avoid a collision with him. The driver of an automobile has a right to expect that those in charge of street cars will operate them in the manner, and run them at the speed, which is customary at the particular place and is governed by the law regulating their speed, and that they will give the usual warning signals, and take the usual precaution to avoid injury to others."

If the foregoing instruction was intended to state to the jury that, under the facts enumerated, the driver of the auto bus was relieved from exercising his faculties of sight and hearing in order to ascertain whether an interurban car was approaching, then the instruction was not sound. Loftus v. Pacific Electric Ry Co., 166 Cal. 464, 467, 137 Pac. 34. Furthermore, it was not applicable to any evidence introduced at the trial.

[3] The Pacific Electric Railway Company requested, and the court gave, an instruction as follows:

"The motorman on a car if he is exercising ordinary care has the right to assume that an auto bus would not attempt to drive upon the track so close to an approaching car as to be in danger of being struck thereby, when the approach of the car can be seen or heard by the use of ordinary care. It is not the motorman's duty in such a situation, to slow down or to stop his car when the automobile first approaches the track, nor until the motorman sees, or in the exercise of ordinary care should conclude, that the automobile would continue to proceed upon the track in front of the car. When he sees that the auto bus will attempt to continue upon the track in front of the car, if he then uses ordinary care to avoid the accident, that is all that is required of him in that respect."

It appears to be a correct statement of the law. Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 755, 134 Pac. 709; 36 Cyc. 1517.

[4] The same party requested, and the court also gave, an instruction worded as follows:

"I charge you that it is as much negligence to fail to see that which can be observed by the exercise of ordinary care as it is negligence not to look at all. If from the evidence you believe that the car of defendant railway company was visible to the driver of the auto bus before he passed from a place of safety to one of danger, then I charge you that it was the duty of the driver of the auto bus not only to look and listen with ordinary care before going upon said tracks or in a place of danger, but actually to see and heed that which could have been seen or heard approaching upon said track by the exercise of ordinary care; and if you believe from the evidence that the driver of the auto bus was negligent in this respect, and that such negligence on his part was alone the direct or proximate cause of the accident, then plaintiffs cannot recover against defendant railway company and your verdict must be in its favor."

As addressed to the facts of the instant case that instruction seems to be supported by Hamlin v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 776, 782, 89 Pac. 1109.

[5] The appellant does not challenge any particular passage, and does not cite any authorities showing that any passage in the last two instructions is an erroneous statement of the law. The appellant's position with reference to all three of the instructions is:

"It will therefore be seen that the court in the case at bar deliberately refused the instruction of appellant placing the two defendants in exactly the same status as to their duty to observe and avoid collision with each other, and instead set up two different standards—one for the railroad company and one for the appellant. It is well settled that the rights and duties of the two were precisely the same."

If by this expression the appellant means to state that the driver of the auto bus and the motorman on the interurban car had equal rights and were under identically the same duties with reference to traveling on the railroad rails, the position of the appellant is not tenable. Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 610, 93 Pac. 677.

[6] The appellant also complains that the trial court in instructing the jury declared one standard of conduct applicable to the Pacific Electric Railway Company and another as applicable to the defendant Dimmick when the driver should be suddenly confronted with unexpected dangers. Instruction No. 25, given at the request of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, was as follows:

"A motorman who, exercising ordinary care, is suddenly confronted with unexpected danger is required to exercise only that care which an ordinarily prudent man confronted with such unexpected danger would exercise. The very best judgment or foresight is not expected of him. If he does what at that moment appears best to do, and in so doing does what an ordinarily prudent man would have done, it is all that is required of him, even though it appears that, viewed in the light of after-acquired knowledge, it might have been better to have done something else."

Instruction No. 32, given at the request of the appellant, was as follows:

"You are instructed that a person suddenly confronted with danger, caused through the negligence of another, is not required to use that calm, cool, and deliberate judgment or action that he would be expected to use under ordinary circumstances; therefore if you shall believe that, while the driver of the bus belonging to defendant F. M. Dimmick was attempting to cross the street and the tracks of the said defendant's railway at the time and place under controversy, he was using ordinary care, and if you further find that the motorman negligently operated said car, and thereby put him in danger, then the said driver under those circumstances would be required to use the same care that an ordinarily prudent person would have used under the then existing circumstances in trying to escape from any impending danger to him thus caused, and, if the driver was thus placed in danger, and then used the care as herein defined, then I charge you he was not guilty of negligence, whatever he may have done under these circumstances in attempting to escape from any impending danger, and mere error or mistake of judgment under such circumstances shall not be taken by you to be negligence on his part."

The utmost that can be truly said in behalf of the appellant's point is that appellant's instruction was a more complete and concrete statement of the same rule than was his opponent's instruction.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

GAVER v. EARLY et al. (Civ. 4180.)

1. Guardian and ward ⟸146—Complaint for accounting held sufficient against general demurrer, though not designating items of shortage.

Complaint in action for accounting for money which defendants, while one was guardian of plaintiff and the other was attorney for the guardian, collected, but fraudulently retained and omitted from their account, which was approved and allowed, after which plaintiff formally released them, held sufficient as against a general demurrer, though not designating the items making up the amount claimed to have been so omitted.

2. Guardian and ward ⟸146—Complaint for accounting held to sufficiently plead fraud, in view of trust relation.

Complaint in action for accounting for money which defendants, one as plaintiff's guardian, the other as the guardian's attorney, received, but fraudulently retained and omitted from their account, after allowance of which plaintiff released them, held to sufficiently plead the fraud, in view of the trust relation.

3. Limitation of actions ⟸100(7)—Statute begins to run only from discovery of fraud.

Since the gist of the action for an accounting for moneys which defendants, as plaintiff's guardian and as the guardian's attorney, respectively, retained and omitted from their account, was fraud, limitations did not begin to run till plaintiff discovered the facts.

4. Witnesses ⟸276—Plaintiff held entitled to call and to examine to designated extent defendant, who in the matters involved was attorney for other defendant.

Plaintiff in an action for an accounting for money which defendants, one (G.) as guardian of plaintiff, the other (E.) as attorney for the guardian, had collected, but had fraudulently retained and omitted from their account, could call and examine E. as a witness as to his acts and statements, so long as it did not extend to any conversation with or communication from G., his client.

5. Release ⟸31—General release does not extend to claims not known or suspected.

Under Civ. Code, § 1542, declaring that a general release does not extend to claims which the creditor does not know or suspect to exist in his favor at the time of executing the release, such a release executed to a guardian and her attorney by the ward does not affect his claim, then undiscovered by him, for money which they had fraudulently retained and omitted from their account.

6. Attorney and client ⟸20—Plaintiff's attorney not disqualified because having been a clerk in office of one defendant then attorney for other defendant.

Plaintiff's attorney was not disqualified to act as such because shortly before bringing the action he was clerk in the office of one defendant who was then attorney for the other defendant.

7. Guardian and ward ⟸157—Findings of shortage and fraud in guardianship supported by evidence.

Evidence in action against one who was guardian of plaintiff, and another who was the guardian's attorney, based on fraudulent omission from their account of money collected, held to support findings of shortage and fraud.

8. Attorney and client ⟸104—Guardian held charged with notice of matters which her attorney knew and should have communicated to her.

Relative to admission in action against a guardian and her attorney for receipts which they fraudulently retained and omitted from their account of a passbook which had been in the attorney's possession, showing receipt by them of a stock dividend from a bank, it is immaterial that the guardian had never known of it, she being charged with notice of whatever her attorney, who was her agent, had notice of, and ought in good faith and in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence to have communicated to her.

9. Appeal and error ⟸1050(1)—Admission of evidence harmless in view of other proper evidence.

Any error in admitting ledger sheet was harmless, it showing only the same facts shown by a passbook properly admitted.

10. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Finding on conflicting testimony not disturbed.

Finding on conflicting testimony as to price to be paid for shares of stock will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; A. B. Mackenzie, Judge.

Action by Andrew Poe Gaver against William H. Early and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. P. Henshall and Nat Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. H. Crook, of San Francisco, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa (R. C. Young, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants for an accounting. Judgment went for the plaintiff. The defendant W. H. Early appealed from the judgment under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The record includes everything, and it is very long, including upwards of 2,000 pages of typewritten manuscript. It shows that Andrew P. Gaver, Sr., died testate, leaving him surviving one daughter and one son, a minor, who has since attained his majority, and who is the plaintiff in this case. By the terms of his will the father named the defendant, Ellen Gaston, his sister, as executrix of his will, and requested her to name W. H. Early as her attorney for herself as executrix. After her brother's death Mrs. Gaston took out letters, and on November 29, 1909, she also took out letters of guardianship over the person and estate of the plaintiff, then a minor. In each proceeding she employed W. H. Early as her attorney. The proceedings in probate in the matter of the estate of the father were so conducted that a decree settling the final account and distributing the estate was rendered May 8, 1911. No inventory in the guardianship proceeding was filed until November 10, 1911. About two months later, January 10, 1912, the first account in the guardianship proceedings was filed. It was approved by order of court January 22, 1922. The second account was filed July 3, 1913, and was approved July 14, 1913. The third account was filed March 12, 1914, and was approved March 30, 1914. The fourth and final account was filed September 16, 1914, and was approved September 28, 1914. By the decree of distribution real property comprising eleven tracts and personal property consisting of cash, stocks, mortgages, etc., were distributed to the two children. The securities were of such a nature that they were falling due, were collected, and the proceeds were reinvested from time to time continuously from the date of the father's death until the date of the alleged settlement between this plaintiff and the defendants. The inventories, the accounts, and the decrees were so drawn that one cannot trace from one paper to another each of the items set forth. At the time of her appointment as guardian Mrs. Gaston was 77 years of age or thereabouts. She did not actively take up her duties as guardian, but her attorney, the defendant Mr. Early, took up the actual management of the ward's affairs, and attended to the details. Pending the guardianship proceedings matters were carried on as though Mr. Early was attorney for the ward. In that way they transacted the business. When the minor attained his majority, he and Mr. Early went over the final account, and thereafter the same was presented to the court and approved. At no time did Mrs. Gaston or Mr. Early keep formal book accounts, and the matter of settling the last account was not free from difficulties. Nevertheless an account was prepared, and the plaintiff signed a written application asking the court to allow the account. About four months later the plaintiff signed a formal release discharging Mrs. Gaston, and also discharging Mr. Early. A little later the plaintiff left for Ann Arbor, Mich., to attend college. While he was away Mr. Early acted as his financial agent, and, during a part of the time, held the plaintiff's power of attorney. One of the last transactions between Mr. Early and the plaintiff occurred in 1916–17. That matter gave rise to a dispute which caused the plaintiff to have an accountant make a full examination of his accounts. One result of that examination was that the plaintiff obtained such information as led him to believe that he had not received from his guardian and her attorney all of the moneys which they had received for his account. He made a demand for a further accounting, it was refused, and the plaintiff brought this action.

[1, 2] The plaintiff pleaded his cause of action in two counts. In the first count he pleaded a cause of action as based on a mutual mistake. In the second count he pleaded a cause of action as based on fraud. The trial court rested its judgment on the second count. Therefore we shall take up that count only. The plaintiff alleged the facts which we have set forth. In the charging part of his pleading he alleged an attack on each one of the accounts filed in the guardianship proceedings. Each attack was similarly worded except as to dates and amounts. One attack was:

"That thereafter, and during the period of time beginning with the 1st day of January, 1912, and ending with the 31st day of December, 1912, both dates inclusive, there was paid to said defendants, and they did receive, the sum of $10,706.01, for and on account of said estate of said plaintiff, then a minor, which fact said defendants and each of them well knew; that notwithstanding said knowledge on the part of said defendants, and for the purpose of fraudulently concealing the true facts as to said moneys paid and received as aforesaid from said court and said plaintiff, and for the purpose of fraudulently diverting a portion of said last-mentioned sum of money to their own use and benefit, and for the purpose of fraudulently procuring and obtaining an order of said court approving and allowing what purported to be the account of said defendant Ellen Gaston as guardian aforesaid, covering said last-mentioned period, and by them filed in that behalf, as hereinafter more fully appears, said defendants did, on or about the 3d day of July, 1913, prepare and file in said court and in the matter of said estate of said minor an account purporting to be the account of said defendant Ellen Gaston as guardian aforesaid covering said last-mentioned period, wherein they did set forth, allege, and account for the sum of $7,915.97 thereof, and no more, and did intentionally and fraudulently, and for the purposes aforesaid conceal, fail to report, and account for the sum of $2,790.14 thereof; that thereafter, and on or about the 14th day of July, 1913, and by reason of said fraudulent acts and conduct of said defendants, and not otherwise, said court did approve and allow said account so filed, which said order remains in full force and effect, and has not been appealed from, vacated or set aside."

In this manner the plaintiff pleaded that the defendants had received and had not accounted for the total sum of $31,324.53. The defendants claim that the complaint was insufficient because it did not specifically designate the items which had been omitted. Neither defendant interposed a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that for the reason stated the complaint was ambiguous, etc. Each defendant did interpose a general demurrer. We think that the complaint was not vulnerable to a general demurrer. The argument of the appellant is that he should have been advised by the plaintiff's complaint as to each item which the plaintiff claimed had been omitted from the accounts which had been prepared, filed, and settled. If the plaintiff had been in a position which enabled him to so frame his pleading, he would have been able to adopt a count as for money had and received. But, under the facts, it is patent that he was wholly unable to do so. When in such an action as the instant case the plaintiff is claiming that overcharges have been made, the rule contended for by the appellant may have application; but where, as here, no claim is based on an overcharge, but the claim is made that moneys were received which were not accounted for, the rule is not so strict. Again, the defendants claim that the plaintiff did not sufficiently allege the facts showing extrinsic fraud and the defendant cites and relies on such cases as Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159, and Fealey v. Fealey, 104 Cal. 354, 38 Pac. 49, 43 Am. St. Rep. 111. Those cases did not involve a fiduciary relation. When that relation is involved a higher duty rests on the defendant, and his liability for misrepresentations or concealment will more readily be examined by the courts than in other cases. Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 Pac. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98; Aldrich v. Barton, 138 Cal. 220, 71 Pac. 169, 94 Am. St. Rep. 43; Silva v. Santos, 138 Cal. 536, 71 Pac. 703; Tracy v. Muir, 151 Cal. 363, 372, 90 Pac. 832, 121 Am. St. Rep. 117.

[3] The defendants claimed the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The very gist of the action is the alleged fraud of the defendants. The plaintiff was not bound to make outside inquiries, but was entitled to rely on the assumption that the defendants would treat him fairly. He was not bound to commence an action until he discovered facts showing that he had been treated otherwise. He commenced his action within one year after making the discovery of the alleged shortages. His action was commenced in time.

[4] The plaintiff called Mr. Early as a witness, and examined him as to his acts, statements, etc., but did not examine him as to any conversation which he had had with, or as to any communication which he had received from, his client, Mrs. Gaston. The trial court did not commit an error in allowing him to be examined as a witness on the subjects on which he was examined.

[5] The releases, which we referred to in stating the facts, were executed by the plaintiff before he made his alleged discovery. Those releases did not operate to discharge the defendants, or either of them, from claims in favor of the plaintiff which the plaintiff did not know or suspect existed at the time he executed the releases. Civ. Code, § 1542.

[6] At one time shortly before this action was commenced, and at a time when the defendant Early was attorney for the defendant Gaston, this plaintiff's attorney was a paid clerk in the office of the defendant Early. The fact of such employment did not disqualify this plaintiff's attorney from subsequently accepting employment from this plaintiff and from taking charge of this litigation. The maintenance of the action under such facts is not against public policy.

[7] This brings us to the attack which directly involves the merits of the litigation, and which the appellant presents from several angles. As stated above, the gist of the plaintiff's cause of action was fraud, together with a prayer for an accounting. There was no evidence, and the trial court did not find, that Mrs. Gaston personally was guilty of fraud. She was negligent, and so was Mr. Early. He admitted as much, but defended the action on the claim that there was no shortage. During the trial the plaintiff assumed the burden and introduced evidence to prove fraud on the part of the defendant Early. Assuming that different minds might take different views of the record, it is sufficient to state that there are such facts shown in the record as tend to support the findings of the trial court. The trial court found that the defendant Early had been guilty of fraud. It cannot be said that that finding is wholly without support. One would expect, in such a record, to find a formal statement of the account. In that account one would expect to find an itemized list of moneys received, etc., and an itemized list of expenditures, and a balance struck. In this record there is no such statement. But our attention has not been called to the fact that any formal request was made of the trial court asking it to make such a formal statement, nor to the refusal of the trial court so to do. In its findings of fact the trial court made findings as to the amounts which it found had been received, and which had not been accounted for. As an illustration, the fourth finding is:

"That prior to the filing of said first account and on July 23, 1910, there was paid to said defendant Early $2,000, and on September 3, 1910, $3,000 on account of and pursuant to two decrees of partial distribution made in the matter of the estate of said Andrew P. Gaver deceased, in favor of said plaintiff, and on May 8, 1911, $5,036.83, on account of and pursuant to a final decree of distribution in the said estate of Andrew P. Gaver, deceased. That pursuant to said final distribution there was also distributed to plaintiff an undivided one-half interest in certificate of deposit No. 2350 of the Santa Rosa Bank, dated July 2, 1909, in the sum of $38,987.60, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. That thereafter said defendant Ellen Gaston indorsed said certificate of deposit No. 2350 and delivered the same to said defendant Early. That thereafter, and upon the 28th day of June, 1911, said defendant Early did collect and receive as interest on said certificate of deposit $2,339.22, one-half of which last-mentioned sum, to wit, $1,169.61, was collected and received by him for and on account of the estate of said plaintiff, and the other one-half of said amount was collected and received by him for Bessae Gaver Steitz, the sister of said plaintiff. That thereafter said defendant Early collected the principal of said certificate of deposit No. 2350 on the dates and in the amounts as follows: October 16, 1911, $8,987; October 23, 1911, $10,000; October 24, 1911, $10,000, and October 28, 1911, $10,000. That one-half of said sums, to wit, $19,493.50, was collected by him for and on account of the estate of said plaintiff, and a like amount was collected by him for said Bessae Gaver Steitz. That on the 5th day of July, 1911, a stock dividend of $2,500 was declared by the Bank of Tomales upon stock owned by said plaintiff and credited to the bank account of said defendant Ellen Gaston, as guardian of said plaintiff, and was thereafter collected and received by said defendant Early. That each and all of the foregoing items, together with the dates of collection and the amounts thereof, were entirely omitted from said first account, and no part thereof was accounted for therein, nor otherwise, nor at all, except the sum of $16,851.39, which appears in said first account in the following manner and not otherwise: 'Cash received from the estate of Andrew P. Gaver, deceased, $7,357.89,' and 'Cash received Santa Rosa Bank Deposit, $9,493.50.' That both of said last-mentioned entries were inserted in said first account by said defendant Early fraudulently, and for the purpose of concealing the fact that he had omitted therefrom and had converted to his own use the sum of $16,348.55 thus omitted from said first account as aforesaid."

That finding, and similar findings, show the items the court allowed as receipts which had not been otherwise accounted for. As the trial court proceeded with the trial it made certain calculations by virtue of which other items of receipts were set off against certain expenditures which likewise had not been otherwise accounted for; that is, errors in favor of the defendants were set off against errors against the defendants. An illustration of the procedure followed by the trial court is the matter of the rents received between the date the guardian filed her first account and the date she filed her second account. The proof introduced at the trial tended to establish the sum of those rentals at $7,190.94; the amount stated in the second account was $4,966. The apparent shortage was $2,224.94, but in this connection there were some disputed items of some doubt which the court determined in favor of the defendants, and thereupon it deducted from the sum last mentioned $100, thereby charging the defendants with the net item of $2,124.94. Finding 5. Such procedure is not the most approved method; however, during the trial, each party was allowed to oppose each item against him and to fully present each item to which he could lay any claim. While the trial court made offsets as above recited as to items which are not expressly disposed of in the findings, the appellant has not called to our attention any prejudicial error. The appellant makes a claim that he has been overcharged $14,422.23, and enumerates the items. It is true that the findings made without the issues do not show that the component parts of that $14,422.23 were allowed, but the reporter's notes show there was no overcharge. The appellant does not cite to us any part of the record showing prejudicial error in allowance or disallowance for or against him. We have carefully examined the record, and we do not find any such instances. On the other hand, we do find that the component factors of the said $14,422.23 were given due consideration. Although not in the manner suggested or advocated by the appellant, nevertheless the same were not improperly disposed of, nor were the same ignored.

[8, 9] The defendants were charged with $2,500 as a stock dividend received from the Bank of Tomales. Such an item appeared as an entry in the passbook and also on the loose-leaf ledger account of the bank. The plaintiff offered in evidence separately the passbook and the loose-leaf ledger account of the bank, which were marked, respectively, Plaintiff's Exhibits 33 and 32. The passbook was objected to as being incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and hearsay, not identified as a record of the bank by any witness, no proof that Mrs. Gaston ever had it in her possession, or ever saw the book, or knew anything of the entries in it, or had any knowledge of it at any time. As appears from the facts which we have already recited, Mr. Early was the agent of Mrs. Gaston, and Mrs. Gaston is deemed to have had notice of whatever Mr. Early had notice of, and ought in good faith and the exercise of ordinary care and diligence to have communicated to her. The evidence shows in many places that Mr. Early had possession of the passbook at many times, indeed nearly all of the time. The book contains the item in question as being the second item entered therein: "Date, July 6, 1911; deposit, $2,500; balance, $7,527.54." There was no error in admitting the book in evidence. The loose-leaf ledger account, Plaintiff's Exhibit 32, contained as the second item thereon: "Date, July 6, 1911; Div. 86; Deposit, $2,500." Conceding, without deciding, that it was error to admit the ledger sheet, it is patent that the sheet showed only the same facts which were shown by the passbook. If it was error to receive the sheet in evidence, the error was not prejudicial.

[10] After the probate court had settled the fourth account it was clear that the plaintiff was entitled to receive over $20,000 in cash. However, the plaintiff stated to Mr. Early that he wanted investments for his cash, and in that conversation, and other conversations held at about the same time, the plaintiff and Mr. Early discussed the matter of the plaintiff taking in part payment 71 shares of the capital stock of the Bank of Santa Rosa. The plaintiff testified that he agreed in those conversations to pay $60 per share. Mr. Early testified that the plaintiff was to pay $130 per share. The trial court adopted that version of the facts as recited by the plaintiff, and gave the defendants credit for the bank stock at $60 per share. With the record standing as it does, we think this court may not disturb the allowance as made by the trial court.

As the trial proceeded the judge presiding at the trial propounded many questions to witnesses and made many statements to counsel of and concerning his impressions regarding the proof introduced. The appellant cites certain of those passages, and claims that the trial court decided the case, or at least parts of it, before the case had been finally submitted. We think this contention is not borne out by the record, but, on the other hand, that the trial judge worked most patiently to develop all of the facts, and gave each particle of the testimony full consideration without regard to any of the remarks that were made during the progress of the case.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment against the defendant W. H. Early is affirmed.

GAVER v. EARLY et al. (Civ. 4181.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 9, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 5, 1922.)

1. Guardian and ward ⟸49—Guardian may employ attorney for collections.

A guardian of a minor possessed of a large estate may employ an attorney to collect interest, dividends, and rents.

2. Guardian and ward ⟸33—Guardian charged with funds she should reasonably have received.

A guardian may be charged with rents, interest, and the like, which she never received, but might and should have received by the exercise of due and reasonable care, diligence, and prudence in her modes of dealing.

3. Guardian and ward ⟸33—Guardian must use care in selecting attorney, and must supervise his acts.

A guardian employing an attorney to assist her in collections must make selection with reasonable care, and must supervise his acts with the same care, and, failing to supervise his acts, is liable for breach of trust through his misappropriation.

4. Guardian and ward ⟸146—Guardian's liability for breach of trust adjudicable in action for accounting.

The amount of liability of a guardian for breach of trust through failure to supervise the acts of an attorney employed by him to make collections, resulting in misappropriation by him, may be adjudicated in an action for accounting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; A. B. Mackenzie, Judge.

Action by Andrew Poe Gaver against William H. Early and Ellen Gaston. Judgment for plaintiff, and, defendant Ellen Gaston having died, Lulu I. Steits, her executrix, appeals. Affirmed.

Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, and F. A. Meyer, of Petaluma, for appellant.

A. H. Crook, of San Francisco, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa (R. C. Young, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal from the judgment by the defendant Ellen Gaston. It presents no point that we have not discussed in the appeal of her codefendant, Gaver v. Early (No. 4180) 209 Pac. 390, this day filed.

[1-4] In addition to what was said by us in that case, we think it is proper to add that, when Mrs. Gaston accepted the appointment of guardian of a minor possessed of a large estate comprising 11 or 12 tracts of real estate, and a large number of mortgages, stocks, and savings bank accounts, she had a right to employ an attorney or agent to collect interest, dividends and rents. 1 Perry on Trusts (6th Ed.) § 404. But it is settled law that a violation by a trustee of a duty which equity lays upon him, whether willful and fraudulent or done through negligence, or arising through mere oversight or forgetfulness, is a breach of trust (3 Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. § 1079), and he may be charged with rents, profits, interest, income, proceeds of sales, and the like, which he never in fact received, but which he might and should have received by the exercise of due and reasonable care, diligence, and prudence in his modes of dealing (Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. § 1070). When the trustee employs third persons as agents and attorneys, he must select them with reasonable care and he must supervise their acts with the same care. McClure v. Middletown Trust Co., 95 Conn. 148, 110 Atl. 838, 840; Donaldson v. Allen, 182 Mo. 626, 650, 81 S. W. 1151; Duckett v. National Mechanics' Bank, 86 Md. 400, 38 Atl. 983, 39 L. R. A. 84, 63 Am. St. Rep. 513, 516. Conceding, without deciding, that under the facts in the instant case Mrs. Gaston was justified in employing Mr. Early in the capacity in which he was employed, she wholly failed to supervise his acts in any respect whatsoever, and the court so found. Under these circumstances she was liable for a breach of trust, and, in an action as for an accounting, the amount of her liability could be properly adjudicated. 1 C. J. § 68.

PEOPLE v. LEE YICK. (Cr. 2413.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1159(3) — Conflicting evidence not subject to review when sufficient to sustain verdict.

Where the evidence for the people, though flatly contradicted by that for defendant, was amply sufficient to sustain the verdict, it is not subject to review by the Supreme Court.

2. Homicide ⟸169(7) — Evidence of statements by defendant two weeks before killing held admissible.

Where it was the contention that defendant, an officer of a Chinese tong, ordered members of the tong to kill deceased, evidence that defendant, two weeks before the murder, applied to the police department for leave to arm members of his tong with revolvers, and thus prevent a tong war, and guaranteed that his tong would do no shooting, was admissible as tending to show his position of authority and his anticipation of the possibility of a war, and to enable the jury to determine whether his order was one likely to be obeyed.

3. Criminal law ⟸368(3) — Evidence as to statement by third person in connection with stabbing preceding killing admissible as res gestæ.

Where there was evidence that after L., a member of a Chinese tong, was stabbed, defendant, an officer of the tong, ordered its members to kill any members of another tong they could find, and that W. soon thereafter killed deceased, evidence that W., while questioning L. following the stabbing, cried out for vengeance on the members of the other tong, was part of the res gestæ, and admissible, especially as it was apparently favorable to defendant as showing that W. acted on his own initiative, and not on defendant's order.

4. Witnesses ⟸383—Impeachment of defendant's testimony showing absence from headquarters of tong where slayers obtained weapons not impeachment on immaterial matter.

On the trial of an officer of a Chinese tong for aiding and abetting the murder by ordering the killing of members of another tong, where it was the state's theory that the assassins procured their weapons at the headquarters of the tong and defendant denied being there, it was proper to impeach his testimony by proof of a statement shortly after the killing that he stayed at the headquarters of the tong until after he heard the shots fired.

5. Criminal law ⟸823(5)—Instruction on trial of aider and abetter not erroneous as permitting conviction without finding of malice aforethought in view of other instruction.

Where the court had charged that murder in the first degree was the killing of a human being with malice aforethought and that the indictment charged defendant with killing deceased with such malice, a further instruction that if deceased was killed by persons other than defendant, and defendant aided and abetted the killing by giving advice or counsel or command, which was acted upon by the parties doing the killing, he was equally guilty of the offense with those who committed the crime, was not erroneous as permitting a conviction without proof of malice aforethought.

6. Homicide ⟸30(1)—If slayer acted with malice aforethought, one ordering killing was equally guilty.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 31 and 971, abolishing all distinctions between principals in the first or second degree and accessories before the fact, if those committing a homicide were animated by malice aforethought, one who commanded them to do the killing was equally guilty; the giving of the order involving malice aforethought and premeditation.

7. Criminal law ⟸1171(1)—Reference to Chinese tong wars in argument held not harmful.

As it is a matter of common knowledge that the Chinese resort to systematic murder of members of opposing tongs in order to carry out their purposes, a reference to tong wars in the district attorney's argument on a trial for murder claimed by the state to have been committed in a tong war was not harmful.

8. Criminal law ⟸726—Improper for district attorney, when not sworn as a witness, to state whereabouts of absent witness.

It was improper for the district attorney, without being sworn as a witness, to state that an absent witness had gone to China, though the statement was provoked by the direct question of defendant's counsel during his argument.

9. Criminal law ⟸1171(3)—Remark of district attorney concerning whereabouts of absent witness held harmless.

Where six witnesses for the people and nearly as many for defendant testified to what occurred on a certain occasion, the district attorney's improper remark, during the argument of defendant's counsel, that an absent witness, who would have testified concerning the same matter, had gone to China, was not prejudicial.

10. Criminal law ⟸719(3)—Proper to comment on testimony of witness that he told district attorney a certain thing, but not to assert the fact as of the district attorney's own knowledge.

Where, on redirect examination, in explanation of matters brought out on cross-examination, a witness testified that he told the district attorney that he heard defendant order the killing of members of another Chinese tong, it was proper for the district attorney to comment on such testimony in his argument, but not to state, on his own knowledge, that the witness did tell him, or that he knew as a matter of fact, that the order was given.

11. Criminal law ⟸729, 730(7)—No prejudicial error where district attorney disclaimed personal knowledge and court told jury not to take his statement as evidence.

Where the district attorney utilized testimony of a witness that he had told the district attorney a certain fact in a fashion which might be deemed a corroboration by him of the witness, but, upon objection, read the portion of the record upon which he relied and expressly disclaimed any knowledge of the matter, and the court told the jury that it was improper for the district attorney to speak of it of his own knowledge, and charged elaborately that the jury were not to take the statements of counsel as evidence, there was no prejudicial error.

12. Criminal law ⟸961—Determination of conflict in testimony as to whether juror was asleep is for the trial court.

The determination of a conflict in the affidavits, on motion for new trial, as to whether a juror was asleep while the instructions were being read, is for the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Lee Yick was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Harris & Hayhurst, M. K. Harris, R. G. Retallick, and Herbert McDowell, all of Fresno, for appellant.

B. W. Gearhart and O. L. Everts, both of Fresno, U. S. Webb and John H. Riordan, both of San Francisco, and Philip Conley, of Fresno (O. L. Everts, of Fresno, of counsel), for the People.

WILBUR, J. The defendant, Lee Yick, was convicted of murder in the first degree and the death sentence was imposed. It is not claimed by the prosecution that the defendant personally killed the murdered man Fook Kee, but it is claimed that the defendant, as second president of a Chinese tong, the Suey On tong, ordered the killing, and that the murder was committed in pursuance of and because of such orders. The evidence relied upon by the prosecution to sustain the conviction is substantially as follows: Shortly before 9 o'clock on the evening of June 7, 1921, a Chinaman named Lee Nam, a member of the Suey On tong, staggered into China alley with a knife in his hand, having shortly before been stabbed. A police officer who was present sent for the defendant Lee Yick to come and interpret the dying statement to be made by the stabbed man. The defendant came immediately and asked Lee Nam who had stabbed him. Lee Nam replied that Wong Bing, belonging to the Bing Kong tong, had stabbed him. Thereupon Lee Yick, in the presence of a crowd of bystanders, gave orders in the Chinese language to the then present members of his tong, the Suey On tong, to get their guns and kill any members of the Bing Kong tong that they could find. Among the members of the Suey On tong present were Wong Toy and Tuck Jick. These men, with three or four others, immediately left, followed by the defendant, Lee Yick. They all repaired to the headquarters of the Suey On tong, across the street at 1013 China alley, where again Lee Yick gave the following order:

"Quick, go quick! Wong Toy and Tuck Jick is gone and see yourself that you men rush toward Fook Kee's place."

Wong Toy and Tuck Jick and Lee Jim, armed with revolvers apparently obtained at the Suey On tong headquarters, proceeded immediately across the street to the butcher shop of Fook Kee, a member of the Bing Kong tong, and there shot and killed him, and shot and wounded another Chinaman there present. Two weeks before the murder of Fook Kee, the defendant had applied to the police department of Fresno for leave to arm some of the members of the Suey On tong with revolvers in order that they might aid the vigilance of a watchman who had been employed by the Suey On tong, and thus prevent a tong war. The defendant then guaranteed that the Suey On tong would do no shooting.

[1] The evidence of the people was amply sufficient to sustain the verdict of murder in the first degree, and, indeed, inconsistent with any other verdict, and although flatly contradicted by the evidence of the defendant and his witnesses in so far as the orders claimed to have been given by the defendant for the killing of the Bing Kongs is concerned, is not subject to review by us. We will, therefore, devote our attention to the errors alleged to have been committed in the admission and rejection of testimony and in the instructions to the jury and the alleged misconduct of the district attorney and of a juror.

[2] The appellant complains of the admission in evidence of the above-mentioned statements made by the defendant to members of the police department two weeks before the murder, when the defendant requested that a permit be granted to members of the Suey On tong to carry revolvers. This evidence was admissible for several reasons. It tended to show that the defendant occupied a position of authority in the Suey On tong, such that he could guarantee the conduct of his tong members, and it showed that the defendant anticipated the possibility of a war between his tong and some other tong in Chinatown. The evidence was relevant for the purpose of enabling the jury to determine whether or not the demand or order of the defendant that members of the Bing Kong tong should be killed was one which was likely to be obeyed as one given by a leader to his followers.

[3] Evidence was admitted to the effect that before the defendant arrived at the side of the dying Lee Nam and had questioned him as to who had stabbed him, Wong Toy had also questioned Lee Nam and that Lee Nam had told Wong Toy he had been stabbed by a member of the Bing Kong tong; that Wong Toy thereupon evidenced great excitement and cried out for vengeance upon the Bing Kongs. It is claimed that it was an error to permit this testimony of declarations and acts of Wong Toy not in the presence of the defendant. Inasmuch as Fook Kee was killed by Wong Toy, we cannot see how the defendant would be prejudiced by evidence tending to show the animosity of Wong Toy. Such evidence would tend to show that he may have acted upon his own initiative instead of upon the orders of the defendant and consequently was favorable to the defendant. However that may be, the circumstance was clearly part of the res gestæ. The exclamations and conduct of Wong Toy merely showed his excitement and his animosity against the Bing Kongs. There was nothing in the statement to inculpate the defendant nor to show his connection with the killing. It was not a declaration of coconspirators, admissible as such, but was one of the incidents in connection with the double murder admissible as a part of the res gestæ, tending as it did to show the probable effect of an order to kill given to an already excited and overwrought Chinaman.

[4] The defendant complains of a ruling of the court permitting the examination of two police officers in rebuttal of the defendant's testimony on the ground that it was sought thereby to impeach the defendant upon an immaterial matter. The defendant had testified that immediately after leaving the side of the dying Lee Nam he went to the headquarters of the Suey On tong and stood in the doorway a moment and then proceeded across the street to other houses along the street looking for Ah Chin, the president of the Suey On tong; that he did not again return to the headquarters of the Suey On tong, but remained with a friend over night. The officers called in rebuttal testified that defendant had told them shortly after the killing that he had gone immediately from the side of the dying Lee Nam to the headquarters of the Suey On tong and remained there until he heard the shots fired which killed Fook Kee. In view of the fact that the prosecution was based upon the theory that the assassins procured their weapons at the Suey On tong, it was clearly important to determine whether or not the defendant procured and delivered these weapons to the assassins. If he only went to the doorway of the Suey On tong and immediately left after asking for the president, it would tend to show that he did not aid the assassins in getting their weapons. On the other hand, if he remained at the Suey On tong he had the opportunity to give them weapons, to give further orders, and to get in connection with others who might be implicated or interested in the commission of the crime. While the circumstance was perhaps of no great importance in view of the fact that the people's case rests upon the evidence of the giving of the orders for the killing at the side of the dying Lee Nam and evidence of the subsequent order given at the door of the Suey On tong to kill Fook Kee, the whereabouts of the defendant at the time of the killing and immediately prior thereto was material, and it was proper impeaching testimony to prove that defendant had stated that he was at the Suey On tong headquarters when the murder occurred.

The defendant claims that an instruction given at the request of the people was erroneous. This instruction is as follows:

"You are instructed that if you find from the evidence introduced herein, beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, that the decedent Fook Kee was killed and murdered as charged in the indictment by persons other than this defendant, that the defendant herein, Lee Yick, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously aid and abet the killing of Fook Kee, as charged in the indictment herein, by willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, prior to the commission of the acts which caused the death of said decedent, Fook Kee, giving advice or counsel or command to the party or parties whom you find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, did, in fact, cause the death of said Fook Kee, and which advice or counsel or command was so acted upon by such party or parties, then you are instructed that this defendant is equally guilty of the offense charged in the information with the party or parties who did commit the crime, even though the evidence shows that said defendant was not personally present at the time the crime was actually perpetrated."

[5, 6] It is claimed that this instruction is erroneous in that it permits a verdict of guilty without proof of malice aforethought. This instruction contains a correct statement of the law. The jury had been instructed that murder in the first degree was the killing of a human being with malice aforethought; that the indictment charged the defendant with killing Fook Kee with malice aforethought. The jury by the instruction complained of were informed that if they found that Fook Kee was killed and murdered as charged in the indictment, that is to say with malice aforethought, then they were to find the defendant guilty if he willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously aided and abetted the killing of Fook Kee by willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously giving advice or command to the parties who killed Fook Kee, which advice, counsel, or command was acted upon by such murderers, that the defendant was equally as guilty as those who committed the crime, although not personally present at the time the crime was actually perpetrated. That is to say, if the defendant ordered Wong Toy and others to kill the deceased, Fook Kee, and they killed Fook Kee with malice aforethought, acting upon said order or command, the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree the same as those who at his command actually killed the deceased. This instruction is strictly in accord with sections 31 and 971 of our Penal Code, which abolished all distinction between a principal and an accessory before the fact, and principals in the first or second degree, and provides that any one who aids and abets or advises and encourages the commission of a crime is guilty as principal. Under the instructions, in order to bring in a verdict of murder in the first degree it was essential that the jury should find that the murderer who actually did the killing was animated by malice aforethought. That being true, the defendant who commanded him to do the killing would be equally guilty. It is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that the defendant himself was animated by malice aforethought if, as the jury found, he actually ordered some one over whom he had authority to go and kill Fook Kee. The premeditation which the law requires is necessarily involved in the giving of the order.

[7] It is contended that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in his argument to the jury. The theory upon which he presented the case to the jury was that this killing occurred in a tong war between the Suey On tong and the Bing Kong tong; that Wong Toy was a subordinate member of the tong commanded by the defendant, and that the killing was the result of defendant's orders given by virtue of his authority as second president of the Suey On tong. As it is a matter of common knowledge that the Chinese in this state resort to systematic murders of members of opposing tongs in order to carry out their purposes, we cannot see how the reference of the district attorney to tong wars can be declared harmful. People v. Ho Kim You, 24 Cal. App. 451, 141 Pac. 950. There is no other part of the general line of argument of the district attorney which was objected to or excepted to which requires any further consideration.

[8, 9] There are, however, two other points, raised in connection with the district attorney's argument that require consideration. The district attorney having failed to produce a witness, Lee Bing Tom, whose name was indorsed on the indictment, defendant's counsel during his argument turned to the district attorney and asked: "Why isn't he here?" The district attorney replied, "I will tell you why, he has gone to China." The district attorney should not have answered counsel, except as a witness under oath, even when provoked by the defendant's counsel so to do. The statement of the district attorney was in the nature of unsworn testimony. However, there was the evidence of six witnesses on the part of the people and nearly as many on the part of the defendant as to what occurred by the side of the dying Lee Nam. Under these circumstances, the failure of the prosecution to call another witness then present was of no serious consequence, and therefore the whereabouts of the witness was immaterial. We are unable to see any prejudice resulting to the defendant from the declaration of the district attorney.

A more serious question is that arising from a statement of a fact by the district attorney during his argument. He said:

"* * * But I knew that night, the night of the shooting, he gave those orders. George Haw, the Chinese witness that spoke to you in English, told me in Chinatown, as soon as I arrived on the scene of the crime—he says: 'Lee Yick is responsible for this. I heard him give the orders.'"

George Haw had testified on the subject of his statement to the district attorney.

On cross-examination of the witness, conducted by Judge Harris, after a detailed examination as to the statements made by Lee Yick at the side of Lee Nam, the following had occurred:

"Q. 'Go get your guns and shoot the Bing Kongs,' that is what he said, was it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Is that all he said? A. So he was gone, then, followed right behind the boys and left

"Q. And was that all he said? A. That is all I heard.

"Q. Who did you first tell about that, who did you tell what your evidence would be here, anybody?"

The witness did not directly answer this question, and for that reason was questioned by the district attorney on redirect examination as follows:

"Q. The judge [Judge Harris, defendant's attorney] asked you who you told about Lee Yick first that night. Who did you tell first that night? A. That night I think—I was sent around Fook Kee's that night and then I told you.

"Q. That same night. And you told what officer first when you went to Fook Kee's? A. I told Mr. Ben Wickstrom."

The statement of the district attorney as to what George Haw said was a perfectly proper statement of the evidence although it was so stated that an inference might have resulted that the district attorney was adding the weight of his testimony to that of the witness by his statement, "George Haw told me." This is perhaps accentuated by the fact that the district attorney in his argument said "I knew" and put into the mouth of George Haw a statement in somewhat different terms than that justified by his evidence, "Lee Yick is responsible for this, I heard him give the orders," while the evidence was that George Haw told the district attorney that the order was given by Lee Yick to kill Bing Kongs. Thereupon the argument was interrupted by the following colloquy:

"Mr. Harris: He said that to you?

"Mr. Gearhart: Yes, sir. And on your cross-examination in this case, you asked him in reference to it.

"Mr. Harris: You say this was as soon as you, yourself, went over to Chinatown?

"Mr. Gearhart: Yes, sir.

"Mr. Harris: We assign that as error. It is not in the evidence. Now, the district attorney goes further; the district attorney says he knows, as I understand his argument, that as soon as he went over there, he knew this had been done.

"Mr. Gearhart: Give me the transcript. I am going to read to the jury, if you are quoting me on something. I will read the whole—no, there is too much of it. (reads):

"'Q. The judge asked you' (page 45, line 24). 'The judge' (referring to Judge Harris) 'asked you who you told about Lee Yick first that night. Who did you tell first that night? A. That night, I think—I was sent around Fook Kee's that night, and then I told you'—indicating me (District Attorney Gearhart).

"Mr. Harris: Now that is not what I object to. I object to the district attorney stating to the jury that he knew what was done as soon as he went over there.

"Mr. Everts (assisting the district attorney): The testimony shows that the counsel has just read that that is exactly what the witness said—the judge (Harris) asked him: 'Who did you tell about this matter?' And he answered: 'I told you, Mr. District Attorney,' is this witness' answer, and I submit the district attorney had a right to comment upon that, under those circumstances.

"Mr. Harris: That is not what I object to. I object to the district attorney's statement: 'I knew as soon as I went over there, this man had done that.' I say that is not in the record, and it is improper, and we assign it as error. I don't want to interrupt the district attorney at all, even if he gets out of the record, but a thing like that, I think it is improper.

"Mr. Gearhart: Would it satisfy you if I say I knew it because George Haw told me?

"Mr. Everts: That is exactly what he said, in following it up.

"Mr. Harris: The district attorney said: 'I know what I said he did.'

"The Court: I don't think it is proper for the district attorney to state it of his own knowledge.

"Mr. Gearhart: There has not been any inference that I was there and saw the crime committed. I don't understand the Chinese language. I would have to speak Chinese to know all this, and I was not over there at the time." (Italics ours.)

[10, 11] It was proper for the district attorney to comment on the testimony of George Haw, but it was not proper for him to either state that George Haw had told him on the night in question of the orders given by Lee Yick, nor was it proper for the district attorney to state that he knew as a matter of fact that the orders had been given. The district attorney disavowed any personal knowledge concerning the killing or what was said by Lee Yick. At the time the court stated to the jury that it was improper for the district attorney to speak of it of his own knowledge, and subsequently instructed the jury elaborately that they were not to take the statements of counsel made during the argument as evidence. The matter then stands thus: The question of whether or not the witness George Haw had told the district attorney of the statement made by Lee Yick was an immaterial matter and one which could only be brought out, as it was, by the defendant's cross-examination of the witness, followed by an explanation on redirect. The district attorney utilized the testimony to fortify his argument and did so in a fashion which might be deemed a corroboration of this witness on this immaterial matter, but upon the objection of counsel the district attorney read the portion of the record to the jury upon which he relied as the basis for his statement and expressly disclaimed any knowledge of the killing. Under these circumstances, followed as the argument was by the instruction to the jury, we think that no prejudicial error was committed.

It seems, moreover, that defendant's real objection to the argument was not to the method of stating the fact of George Haw's statement to the district attorney, but to the declaration, "This man has done that," a statement never made by the district attorney."

[12] But one other point is raised in the case, and that is the alleged misconduct of one of the jurors. Upon the motion for a new trial affidavits were filed by the defendant's attorneys to the effect that during the reading of the instructions they had observed that juror Perkins was asleep. They do not claim that the attention of the judge or of opposing counsel or of the juror was called to this situation until after the jury had retired and the judge was leaving the bench, when his attention was called to it. It is a sufficient answer to this point to say that other affidavits were filed tending to show that this juror was not asleep and that the determination of that conflict in testimony was for the trial court. In the light of that determination we must assume that the juror was not asleep,

PEOPLE v. WONG TOY. (Cr. 2406.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1035(3), 1053, 1129(1)—Defendant cannot complain of remarks in presence of jury panel before examination without objection, exception, assignment of error, or challenge to jurors.

Where no objection was made, exception entered, or error assigned, because of alleged prejudicial remarks of the judge in the presence of members of the jury panel in denying a continuance, and attention of the court or counsel was not called thereto in any manner, and the jurors present were not examined upon their voir dire with reference thereto, and defendant did not request the court to excuse them, or call other jurymen, or challenge them peremptorily or for cause, though his peremptory challenges were not then exhausted, he cannot complain of the remarks.

2. Criminal law ⟸1170½(5)—Witnesses ⟸372(2)—Question on cross-examination as to employment of attorney held proper, but its exclusion not prejudicial.

A question asked deceased's grandson on his cross-examination, as to whether he or his family were hiring one of the attorneys, might well have been allowed; but, as the relationship already disclosed showed his interest, its exclusion was not prejudicial error.

3. Witnesses ⊂⊃372(1)—Cross-examination as to interest largely in discretion of trial court.

The extent of the cross-examination of witnesses as to their interest in the controversy is very largely in the discretion of the trial court.

4. Witnesses ⊂⊃277(3)—Cross-examination of defendant concerning revolver and cartridges found in the same room with him held proper.

Where defendant, on his direct examination, denied his guilt and denied that he had any cartridges at any time, it was proper to cross-examine him as to the ownership and possession of a revolver and the cartridges contained therein found in the same room with him immediately after the murder.

5. Witnesses ⊂⊃277(5), 319—Cross-examination and impeachment of defendant concerning revolver held proper, though not of same caliber as bullets found in deceased's body.

Where three or more men participated in a killing, each of whom fired shots from a revolver, and two revolvers of the same caliber as bullets found in deceased's body were found on the premises, the people had a right to cross-examine defendant on the theory that a revolver of a different caliber found in the room with him at the time he was apprehended was one of those used and to impeach his testimony in this respect; it not being a collateral matter.

6. Witnesses ⊂⊃379(7)—Proper to cross-examine defendant concerning contradictory statement in application for continuance.

Where defendant testified that several persons were at a Chinese tong club when he returned there shortly before a homicide, it was proper cross-examination to call his attention to an affidavit for a continuance in which he swore that the absent witnesses were the only witnesses by which he could prove that he was at the clubroom.

7. Criminal law ⊂⊃1170½(6) — No error or misconduct when question not objected to, but question and answer stricken out.

Where there was no objection to a question on cross-examination, but the question and answer were stricken out, no error or misconduct resulted.

8. Criminal law ⊂⊃706—Not misconduct to ask witness if he was not known by a nickname.

It was not misconduct for the district attorney, on cross-examination of a witness, to ask him if he was not known by his friends by a certain nickname.

9. Criminal law ⊂⊃693—Assignment of error to question after it was answered too late.

Where there was no objection to a question on cross-examination but, after it was answered, there was an objection and assignment of error, the assignment of error was too late.

10. Criminal law ⊂⊃706—Questions asked defendant on cross-examination held not misconduct.

Where it was the people's claim that defendant and L., an officer of a Chinese tong, were coconspirators, and that the killing was committed by defendant as an agent of the tong in obedience to L.'s orders, it was not misconduct to ask defendant on cross-examination if he had not acted as guardsman for the tong for some weeks previous to the shooting and if he had not told L. not to talk too much or he would "let the cat out of the bag."

11. Criminal law ⊂⊃1129(1)—When asking of questions not assigned as error, question of misconduct not open.

Where defendant did not assign the conduct of the district attorney in asking questions on cross-examination as error, he could not raise the question of misconduct in the Supreme Court.

On Petition for Rehearing.

12. Criminal law ⊂⊃695(2)—Objection held insufficient to raise question that proper foundation not laid for testimony as to declarations in language which witness did not understand.

Where reporter's testimony as to declarations made in the Chinese language which he did not understand was excluded on objection, but again offered after interpreter had testified that he correctly translated the questions and answers, general objection then made, which defendant's counsel expressly declined to make more specific, held not sufficient to call the court's attention to the fact that the interpreter's testimony was not a sufficient foundation for the reporter's testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Wong Toy was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. Crichton, Herbert McDowell, Geo. W. Jones, Harris & Hayhurst, M. K. Harris, and Rue C. Gibson, all of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb and John H. Riordan, both of San Francisco, B. W. Gearhart, Philip Conley, and C. A. Tuttle, all of Fresno (O. L. Everts, of Fresno, of counsel), for the People.

WILBUR, J. The defendant was convicted of the murder of Fook Kee and sentenced to be hanged. Some of the facts in connection with the murder are stated in the opinion this day rendered in People v. Lee Yick (Cal. Sup.) 209 Pac. 538. Several eye-witnesses testified to defendant's participation in the murder, and the defendant does not claim that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, but depends for a reversal upon the alleged misconduct of the judge and of the district attorney and upon certain errors in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence.

[1] It is claimed that on July 5, when the defendant moved for a continuance of the trial of the case, the comments upon the affidavits presented in support of the motion for a continuance, made by the judge, in the presence of the veniremen, were most prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. We will first consider this question. The affidavits offered by the defendant in support of the motion averred that there was a tong war in Fresno, the place of trial, between two Chinese tongs; that the Bing Kong tong had threatened to kill three members of the tong to which defendant's absent witnesses belonged and that these witnesses Mue Que, Ny Hong Jock, and Chan Hoy, had fled in terror from Fresno, their place of residence, and that their whereabouts was unknown to the defendant, and that they were the only witnesses by which the defendant could establish his alibi, and that a general order issued by the chief of police prevented their return until peace and quiet was restored. The district attorney filed counter affidavits in which he also made certain allegations with reference to the tong war, stating in effect that this war between the two Chinese tongs began some five or six weeks before the murder of Fook Kee, and the whereabouts of such witnesses was known to the members of the Suey On tong, to which the defendant belonged. The judge, in commenting upon the affidavits, expressed a just indignation that the community should be upset by a war between Chinese tongs and expressed the belief that the members of defendant's tong could locate such witnesses, as was averred in defendant's affidavits. The defendant's principal complaint concerning the remarks by the judge is that he expressed a doubt as to the existence of the persons defendant claimed could establish his alibi. It is claimed that by this remark the judge discredited the veracity of the defendant and thus affected the subsequent trial wherein defendant testified in his own behalf. The judge also said that he believed that if the matter were put in the hands of responsible citizens they would put an end to the tong war. This remark was no doubt the result of allegations in the affidavits concerning an effort to effect a treaty of peace between the warring tongs. The defendant now intimates that the court was advocating mob law, but there is no justification for this contention. It is evident that the attorneys for the defendant did not at any time regard the remarks of the judge as prejudicial to their client. No objection was made to the remarks of the judge; no exception was entered thereto or error assigned, nor was the attention of the court or counsel called in any manner to the fact that the defendant regarded the conduct of the judge as prejudicial. The judge stated that he regarded the matter of the tong war as absolutely irrelevant. The remarks of the judge were made in passing upon the matters averred in the affidavits presented on the motion and were in the main pertinent to the proper determination of that motion. Six of the jury panel present at the time the motion for a continuance was first presented were subsequently drawn and served upon the jury, and it is claimed that they must have carried into the jury box prejudice resulting from the remarks of the judge in disposing of the motion which was granted. The record does not clearly show that these veniremen were present at the time the judge made the remarks complained of, but assuming that they were then present, they were not examined upon their voir dire with reference to the matter. The court was not requested to call in other jurymen or to excuse these jurymen upon a peremptory challenge or for cause, and no opportunity was given to the court or to the district attorney to correct the impression made upon the minds of the veniremen of which defendant now complains. The record also shows that at the time these six members of the original panel were accepted as jurors, the defendant had sufficient peremptory challenges to have disposed of them. Under these circumstances, the defendant cannot complain of the remarks of the judge, and for that reason we refrain from further discussion thereof.

[2, 3] Defendant complains that the court erred in sustaining an objection to his question upon the cross-examination of Wong Kim Gong. This witness was a grandson of the deceased, Fook Kee. He was living in the home of Fook Kee and was supported by him at the time of the murder. He was about 18 years of age and a witness to the murder of his grandfather. On cross-examination he was asked by the defendant's counsel, "Is your family or yourself contributing or hiring Mr. Everts as attorney here?" The district attorney objected to the question on the ground that it was immaterial and the objection was sustained. The interest of a witness in the controversy is always a proper subject of cross-examination. It would have been well if the court had allowed the question to be answered, but the relationship of the witness to the deceased, already disclosed by the evidence, was sufficient to show his interest in the prosecution of the defendant. The extent of the cross-examination of witnesses as to their interest in the controversy is very largely in the discretion of the trial court, and such interest is often made the excuse for lengthy cross-examination upon wholly immaterial matter. There was no prejudicial error in the refusal to permit the witness to answer the question.

The defendant objects to the scope of the cross-examination allowed by the court in the examination of the defendant concerning the use, ownership, and knowledge of a 38-caliber revolver found in the room where the defendant was arrested in the Suey On tong headquarters. The defendant had testified that he was in the Suey On tong headquarters at 1013 China alley, diagonally across the street from the scene of the murder at 1007 China alley, at the time of the firing of the shots which killed Fook Kee; that he remained there until he was arrested, and that he did not fire such shots or in any manner have anything to do with the killing of Fook Kee. The evidence of the prosecution was to the effect that the defendant had actually fired the shots that killed Fook Kee and for that purpose had entered the premises where the murder was committed, making his escape after the killing of Fook Kee and the wounding of a bystander. The defendant testified that shortly before his arrest a police officer entered the room where he was at the Suey On tong headquarters and took from the drawer of a desk in that room a 38-caliber revolver; that this revolver was loaded and that six cartridges were removed therefrom by the police officer, but when the officer returned with other officers to arrest the defendant, the cartridges were replaced in the revolver. The defendant was questioned on his direct examination as follows:

"Q. It has been testified here by one of the officers that he found nine cartridges in one of the rooms there, one of the sleeping rooms back of the office. Did you have any cartridges or do you know anything about those cartridges whatever?" A. I do not know." (Italics ours.)

Having denied any connection with the murder or with the weapon or ammunition with which it was committed, and having testified that he was not at the scene of the killing, the district attorney on cross-examination sought to show that the defendant had been in the habit of carrying the 38-caliber revolver in question and that it belonged to him. To this line of questions defendant objected. The defendant was asked on cross-examination as follows:

"Q. You told us about a gun that was found by the man that you term the fat sergeant. Was that gun found in your room, in the drawer in your room? A. That is not my room. I live upstairs."

Thereupon the district attorney read a statement purporting to have been made by the defendant in the presence of certain named witnesses. The general purport of the alleged answers indicated that the defendant took the revolver in question out of the drawer and gave it to the officer; that it was a 38-caliber long, and that there were six cartridges therein and that the drawer from which the revolver was taken was in a desk in the defendant's room. The questions and answers so read and defendant's testimony in relation thereto were stricken out by the court and the jury instructed to disregard them. The defendant was then asked the following question:

"Q. Now, you testified to them finding—Sergeant Ben finding a pistol over there, was that your pistol?"

This was objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial and not proper cross-examination. The objection being overruled, the witness answered: "The gun isn't mine. I don't know who it belongs to."

Further statements purporting to have been made at the time and place above referred to were read to the witness, wherein the defendant stated that he carried the 38-caliber revolver when he was on duty in order to defend the members of his tong. Objection to this line of questions was sustained, the matter read stricken out, and the jury instructed to disregard it. Thereupon the witness was questioned as follows:

"Did you ever carry or handle or have in your possession this particular pistol that the fat sergeant found over there?"

Objection to this question was overruled, and the witness answered, "No, sir." Thereupon the district attorney again reverted to the transcript of the statement made by the defendant, above referred to, as follows:

"'Q. Where did you get that pistol? A. I carried it when I go on duty.

"'Q. What do you mean by duty? A. They were afraid that others might come and shoot them.'

"Q. Were those questions asked you and did you give those answers at the time and place?"

This was objected to as "irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial and not cross-examination, it not tending to impeach the witness and upon all of the other grounds to the questions that were asked from that record." The court overruled this objection and the witness answered, "The questions were asked me, but that wasn't the way I answered them."

[4] In view of the fact that the witness had testified that he did not have any cartridges at any time, it was proper to cross-examine with reference to the ownership and possession of cartridges contained in the revolver which he testified was found in the same room with him immediately after the murder. It was also proper to cross-examine him concerning the revolver found in his immediate presence so soon after the murder, in view of his denial of guilt.

[5] It is claimed, however, that to allow the witness to be impeached, as he was, by his statements upon the question of his ownership of this gun, was to permit his impeachment upon a collateral matter, and that this was prejudicially erroneous. In the consideration of this claim, a further statement of the facts connected with the murder should be made. Three or more men participated in the actual killing. Each fired shots from a revolver. The bullets found in the body of the deceased were all 32-20 caliber; one of them being a lead bullet, the others steel jacketed. Two Smith and Wesson revolvers of this caliber were found upon the premises where the murder was commited, evidently discarded by the murderers. The people had a right to cross-examine the defendant upon the theory that the revolver found in the room with him at the time he was apprehended was one of those used in the murder, and the fact that such inquiry might have been fruitless or unfavorable to the people because the caliber of the bullets found in the body was 32, instead of 38, did not make the cross-examination improper or the matter inquired about collateral. If we assume, as the prosecution had a right to do, that this revolver was used in the murder, the relevancy of the cross-examination is clear and the impeaching evidence proper. See People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 114, 193 Pac. 92.

[6] On his cross-examination the defendant was asked to state who was present at the Suey On tong club when he returned from the side of Lee Nam, a Suey On tong man who had been stabbed immediately before the murder of Fook Kee, a Bing Kong man. He replied Leong Chang Hoy, Joy Yee Jick, Ng Hung Jick, Lung Ho, and Mew Kew. In view of this evidence the defendant's attention was called to his above-mentioned affidavit for a continuance, in which he made oath that Mue Que, Ny Hong Jock, and Chan Hoy were the only witnesses by which he could prove that he was at the club room at 1013 China alley at the time of the murder, and he was asked why he stated in the affidavit that only by the witnesses named therein could he prove an alibi at the time of the murder. This was proper cross-examination upon the question of the whereabouts of the defendant at the time of the murder. We find no prejudicial error committed in the reception of evidence.

[7-9] The defendant also complains of misconduct of the district attorney in the examination of the witnesses. The first matter thus presented occurred in the cross-examination of the witness Reinhart. The question was not objected to and a motion made to strike out the question and answer was granted. There being no objection to the question, the question and answer having been stricken out, no error or misconduct resulted. A witness named Coggshall was asked on cross-examination if he was not known by his friends by the nickname of Cocky. No objection being interposed, he answered, "Yes." The answer was followed by an objection and an assignment of error. It is claimed this question constituted misconduct on the part of the district attorney. There is nothing in this point and the assignment of error was too late.

[10, 11] It is claimed that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in asking the defendant on his cross-examination if he had acted as guardsman for the Suey On tong society for some weeks previous to the shooting, and if he had said to Lee Yick, his co-defendant, "Don't talk too much, you will let the cat out of the bag." It is a sufficient answer to this claim of misconduct to say that in view of the people's claim that Lee Yick and the defendant were coconspirators and that the killing was committed by Wong Toy in his official capacity as an agent of the Suey On tong society, in obedience to the orders of Lee Yick, the defendant's objection to these questions might well have been overruled. In any event, there was no misconduct by the district attorney in asking these questions. Moreover, the defendant did not assign the conduct of the district attorney in asking these questions as error and consequently is not now in a position to raise the question of misconduct. People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 537, 545, 117 Pac. 549. People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 193 Pac. 92. This disposes of all the errors complained of by the defendant.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [12] The petition for rehearing is denied. When James Gearhart, the reporter, was offered as a witness to prove the declarations made in the Chinese language, such objection was sustained. It is apparent from the record that the district attorney and the court were of the opinion that this objection to the admissibility of the testimony of the reporter would be cured by the evidence of the interpreter, who translated the declarations of the defendant, to the effect that he correctly translated the questions and answers. The interpreter so testified, and thereupon the evidence of the reporter was again offered. The defendant made a very general objection thereto, and did not repeat the objection theretofore made that the reporter did not understand the language in which the declarations were made. The court requested the defendant to more specifically point out his objection to the evidence, but this he declined to do. It is apparent from the record that the court and the prosecuting attorney were of the opinion that the objection theretofore made had been cured, and, not having been specifically renewed, the general objection was insufficient, under the circumstances, to call their attention to the fact that the evidence of the interpreter was insufficient as a foundation for the testimony of the reporter to the declarations of the defendant.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 20, 1922.)

Counties ⟸3½, New, vol. 14A Key-No. Series —Where constitutional provision for proposal of county charters not complied with, proposed charter need not be printed.

Where a board, elected to propose a county charter, did not sign and file the proposed charter until 121 days after it was elected, in violation of the Constitution, requiring such boards to propose a charter within 120 days after their election, no election can be held, and the proposed charter need not be printed, as the mode provided in the Constitution is the measure of the power granted.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by W. A. Doran and others, to be directed to Joseph Foster and others, as the Board of Supervisors of San Diego County, requiring them to print a proposed charter. Writ denied.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for petitioners.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. A board of freeholders was elected for the county of San Diego to propose a county charter. They were declared elected on the 8th day of May, 1922. They did not propose a charter until the 6th day of September, 1922, which was 121 days after they were declared elected. The Constitution provides:

"It shall be the duty of said board of freeholders, within one hundred and twenty days after the result of such election shall have been declared by said board of supervisors, to prepare and propose a charter for said county, which shall be signed in duplicate by the members of said board of freeholders, or a majority of them, and be filed, one copy in the office of the county clerk of said county and the other in the office of the county recorder thereof."

The court is of the opinion that the board of freeholders did not "propose" a charter until they had signed and filed the same. The signing and filing is a method of proposal which is contemplated by the Constitution. Therefore it was not proposed within the time specified in the Constitution, and it must be held that no election can be held in pursuance thereof, and the board of supervisors is not required to print such charter. The mode provided in the Constitution for the proposal of charters is deemed to be the measure of power. Authority for this proposition will be found in People v. Gunn, 85 Cal. 246, 24 Pac. 718; People v. Riverside, 66 Cal. 290, 5 Pac. 350, and Blanchard v. Hartwell, 131 Cal. 263, 63 Pac. 349.

CASTAGNETTO v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MARIPOSA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 10408.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1922. Rehearing Denied Oct. 6, 1922.)

1. Prohibition ⟸3(1) — To prevent trial of election contest denied where objections can be cured by amending pleadings.

Prohibition will not issue to prevent trial of an election contest under St. 1917, p. 1363, § 28, because the affidavit of contest did not sufficiently state the precinct in which recount had been demanded and the nature of the mistake or misconduct, as such matters can be readily cured by amendment, and should not be considered on application for prohibition, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting new trials for trivial defects.

2. Prohibition ⟸11—Court's error in exercise of its jurisdiction cannot be controlled by writ of.

Any error of the trial court in counting votes in an election contest is an error in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and cannot be controlled by a writ of prohibition.

Application for writ of prohibition by John J. Castagnetto to be directed to the Superior Court of California in and for Mariposa County, Cal., and Judge J. J. Trabucco. Application denied.

J. J. Trabucco, for Mariposa County.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. [1] This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the superior court of Mariposa county from proceeding with the trial of a contest of nomination as provided for in section 28 of the Primary Election Law (Stats. 1917, p. 1363). It is claimed that the affidavit is insufficient because it does not specify separately the precincts in which a recount is demanded, nor sufficiently specify the "nature of the mistake, error, misconduct, or other cause why it is claimed that the returns from such precinct do not correctly state the vote as cast in such precinct, for the contestant and the contestee." Section 28, supra. While it may be conceded that an affidavit which utterly fails to state any ground of contest provided for in section 28 would not give the court jurisdiction, and therefore the trial of the contest should be prevented by a writ of prohibition as might be done in cases of contempt (Hutton v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 156, 81 Pac. 409; Otis v. Superior Court, 148 Cal. 129, 82 Pac. 853; In re McCarty, 154 Cal. 534, 98 Pac. 540; see, also, Kilburn v. Law, 111 Cal. 237, 43 Pac. 615; Cline v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 331, 193 Pac. 929), nevertheless similar allegations as a basis for an election contest have been sustained as sufficient (Abbott v. Hartley, 143 Cal. 484, 77 Pac. 410; Treanor v. Williams, 145 Cal. 316, 78 Pac. 884). In view of the amendment to the Constitution (article 6, § 4½) we are not disposed to consider matters on application for writs of prohibition which could readily be cured by amendment to the pleadings. Cline v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 331, 342, 193 Pac. 929.

[2] It is alleged in the petition that the superior court intends to count ballots where the cross after the name is made with a lead pencil instead of with a rubber stamp. The case of Miller v. Superior Court, 25 Cal. App. 607, 144 Pac. 978, is cited as authority for the proposition that upon application for a writ of prohibition the court will consider whether or not the evidence sought to be adduced upon an election contest under section 28 of the direct primary law is admissible. That case, however, is altogether different from this. It was sought therein to offer proof that the election officers had refused to receive the votes of electors who were entitled to vote, but it was held that this was not a ground of contest under the law, and therefore evidence of such refusal should be permitted and would be prevented by a writ of prohibition. The case involved here is entirely different. The purpose of the contest is fully accomplished by the recount of the votes, and any error in counting votes is an error in the exercise of the jurisdiction vested in the trial court, and cannot be controlled by a writ of prohibition.

The application for the writ is denied.

CASTAGNETTO v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MARIPOSA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 10413.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 6, 1922. Rehearing Denied Oct. 19, 1922.)

Elections ⟸126(5)—Vote, marked with pencil instead of being stamped, counted in primary election.

The using of a pencil by a voter to designate his choice in a primary election is a mere technical error which does not invalidate the vote, notwithstanding the use of the word "stamping" in St. 1913, p. 1379, § 18, providing that a voter shall designate his choice on the ballot by stamping a cross in the square opposite the name of each candidate for whom he wishes to vote, in view of the further provision that no ballot shall be rejected for a technical error not rendering it impossible to determine voter's choice.

In Bank.

Application by John J. Castagnetto for certiorari to review an order of the Superior Court of Mariposa County, J. J. Trabucco, Judge, directing the counting of certain ballots marked with a pencil. Writ denied.

See, also, 209 Pac. 548.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Conceding without deciding the question of the jurisdiction of this court to entertain the application herein for a writ of review, we are satisfied that the petition should be denied.

The sole contention of the petitioner is that in counting the ballots in a contest pending before it, following the recent primary election, the superior court has illegally counted certain ballots not stamped, but marked with a pencil cross, by reason of which the result of the primary election as declared by the board of supervisors of the county has been changed, and the petitioner has been deprived of the nomination for the office of sheriff. There is no merit in this contention. The petitioner relies upon the decision of this court in Sweetser v. Pacheco, 172 Cal. 137, 141, 155 Pac. 639, a case which arose by reason of a contest following the general election of November 3, 1914. It was there held, construing section 1205 of the Political Code, which relates to the manner in which a voter shall prepare his ballot at general elections, that the only way in which a voter can indicate his intention to vote for a particular candidate is by stamping a cross in the voting square opposite the name of such candidate. Said section 1205 contains the provision that "all crosses shall be made only with a stamp," and is mandatory in that regard.

There is no such provision in the law governing primary elections. Section 18 of the Direct Primary Law provides as follows:

"Sec. 18. The voter shall designate his choice on the ballot by stamping a cross (x) in the small square opposite the name of each candidate for whom he wishes to vote. If he shall stamp more names than there are candidates to be nominated for any office, or if for any reason it be impossible to determine his choice for any office, his ballot shall not be counted for such office, but the rest of his ballot, if properly stamped, shall be counted. No ballot shall be rejected for any technical error which does not render it impossible to determine the voter's choice, nor even though such ballot be somewhat soiled or defaced." Stats. 1913, p. 1379.

Notwithstanding the use of the words "stamping," "stamp," and "stamped" in the section, the provision therein that "no ballot shall be rejected for any technical error which does not render it impossible to determine the voter's choice," to our mind, is sufficiently liberal in its terms to permit the acceptance and counting of a ballot which the voter has marked with a penciled cross. While the use of such penciled cross by the voter in primary elections is a departure from the requirements of the foregoing section, it is, in our opinion, a merely technical error on the part of the voter, which does not render it impossible to determine the voter's choice.

The application is denied.

SCHOMIG v. KEISER, Real Estate Com'r, et al. (S. F. 10229.)

1. Brokers ⟸3 — Real estate commissioner cannot revoke license of broker or salesman acting without compensation.

St. 1919, pp. 1252, 1256, §§ 2, 12, creating a real estate commissioner and authorizing him to revoke the license of real estate brokers or salesmen in certain cases, does not authorize him to revoke license of a broker or salesman who is acting without compensation or where the acts complained of do not occur when negotiating for the sale or purchase of real estate or negotiating a loan thereon or offers to lease, or is collecting rents, as a whole or partial vocation.

2. Brokers ⟸3—Person employed to collect payment on agreement already negotiated is not a real estate broker or salesman.

A person employed to collect payment on an agreement which has already been negotiated is not a real estate broker or real estate salesman within St. 1921, p. 1294, and any misconduct in performing such acts does not warrant the real estate commissioner in revoking the license of such person.

3. Brokers ⟸3—Act authorizing real estate commissioner to revoke license of broker or salesman is penal in nature.

St. 1921, p. 1294, authorizing the real estate commissioner to revoke the license of a broker or salesman, is highly penal in its nature, and should not be construed to include anything which is not embraced within its terms.

In Bank.

Certiorari by A. Schomig against Edwin T. Keiser, Real Estate Commissioner, and another, to review an order of the Real Estate Commissioner revoking petitioner's license. Order of the Real Estate Commissioner annulled.

Carl F. Wood, of Oakland, for petitioner.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondents.

SHAW, C. J. The plaintiff filed a petition for a writ of certiorari directed to the real estate commissioner, and to the judge of the superior court of Alameda county, in the District Court of Appeal of the First District, Second Division. The court, without filing any opinion, denied the writ. On petition for rehearing this court granted a rehearing, and the writ was issued accordingly.

The petition shows that Edward Rautenberg filed a verified complaint with the real estate commissioner against A. Schomig, showing that he was Rautenberg's agent in the collection of payments on a contract for the sale of real estate in Oakland; that the contract was made by Rautenberg with certain colored people for the purchase of the land, and subsequently they sold the lots to Miss Wall, who was making the payments to Rautenberg by means of the agency of Schomig through the Oakland Bank of Savings, at the rate of $15 per month; that the bank was to transmit said money through Schomig to said Rautenberg; that he had received from Schomig all that had been received by him from Miss Wall excepting the sum of $114, which had been paid by Miss Wall in excess of the amount due; that Rautenberg then complained to the said bank and the bank then forced Schomig to account to him and confess that he had received the sum of $114.

The complaint was filed against Schomig to obtain an order of the real estate commissioner revoking his license as a real estate broker or a real estate salesman under section 12 of the act establishing a real estate commissioner and authorizing him to revoke licenses for certain causes. St. 1919, p. 1256. Section 12 of the act authorizes him to revoke the license of a real estates salesman or broker "at any time where the holder thereof is performing, or attempting to perform, any of the acts mentioned in section two hereof is guilty of— * * * (5) Any other conduct, whether of the same or a different character than hereinabove specified, which constitutes dishonest dealing." Section 2 of the act defines a real estate broker as any person "who, for a compensation, sells, or offers for sale, buys, or offers to buy, or negotiates the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, or who, for compensation, negotiates loans on real estate, leases, or offers to lease, rents, or places for rent, or collects rent from real estate, or improvements thereon, for others as a whole or partial vocation." A real estate salesman is defined by the act as any "one who for compensation is employed by a licensed broker" to do any of the acts above stated which are to be done by the real estate broker.

[1] It will be seen that this does not authorize the commissioner to revoke any license of either a broker or salesman under the act, unless he is acting for a compensation, and also unless he does the acts complained of at a time when he is negotiating for the sale or purchase of real estate, or is selling or buying the same or negotiating a loan thereon or offers to lease, or rent, or places for rent, or is collecting rents, from real estate, as a whole or partial vocation.

[2] Any employment by any person or another to collect payment on an agreement which has already been negotiated, and is in all respects perfected and the terms agreed upon, does not make the party a real estate broker or real estate salesman, and any misconduct in performing such acts would not warrant the real estate commissioner in revoking the license of such person.

[3] The portion of the act which authorizes the real estate commissioner to forfeit the license of a broker or salesman and take it away from him is highly penal in its nature, and should not be construed to include anything which is not embraced within its terms. There is no charge in the complaint, and no evidence to prove the charge if it were in the complaint, that Schomig was employed for a compensation to do the acts complained of, or that the acts themselves constituted a part of a contract for the sale of real estate. The evidence shows that they were to be performed by Schomig without compensation, and that in doing so he was not fulfilling a contract for the sale of real estate, but was merely collecting the proceeds of a contract already made. The commissioner was without authority to act in the matter at all, and had no authority to revoke the license of Schomig.

The order of the real estate commissioner is annulled.

LEONI v. QUINN et al. (Sac. 3237.)

Mechanics' liens ⇐78—Owner held liable for repairs by lessee.

Where the owner of a building permitted the lessee to make certain repairs, and failed to post, or verify, or record any notice of nonliability, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, the owner is liable for such repairs, though the contractor that did the work had actual knowledge of the provisions of the lease that the owner would not be called upon to make any improvements or repairs.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Peter Leoni against Mary Quinn and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. W. Zagoren, of Sacramento, for appellant.

C. E. McLaughlin and C. P. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for respondents.

MYERS, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendant in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. There is no conflict as to the facts, and but a single question of law is presented. The respondent, the owner of certain real property in the city of Sacramento, leased the same to Nicoletti and Caietti for a term of years. Under the terms of the lease, which was in writing, the lessees were allowed to repair and remodel the premises at their own expense, except that the lessor agreed to pay $200 toward the plumbing repairs, to be paid by deductions from the monthly rental. The lease further provided that "the said lessor shall not be called upon to make any improvements or repairs whatsoever upon the said demised premises, or any part thereof, but the said lessees agree to keep the same in good order and condition at their own expense." It further provided that the lessees should deposit $300 with the lessor, "as security for the prompt and full performance of the terms of this lease," which was done.

The plaintiff, who was a building contractor, acted as spokesman and interpreter for the lessees in the negotiations for the lease, and was consequently familiar with the terms and provisions thereof. Subsequent to the execution of the lease the lessees let a contract to plaintiff for the repair and remodeling of the premises, and he entered upon its performance. When the work was nearly completed the lessees, having lost their license, abandoned the premises without paying plaintiff for his work and materials. He thereupon duly filed his notice of lien and commenced this action for the foreclosure thereof against the respondent as owner of the premises, under section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is admitted that respondent at all times had knowledge of the doing of the work, and that she did not post or verify or record any notice of nonliability, as provided in said section.

The judgment for this defendant was based solely upon the admitted fact that the plaintiff at the time he did the work had actual knowledge of the provision of the lease to the effect that the lessor should not be called upon to make any improvements or repairs. It was pointed out in Pacific Sash & Door Co. v. Bumiller, 162 Cal. 664, 124 Pac. 230, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 296, that—

"Such contracts are good as between the owner and the lessee and serve to fix the liability as between them, but they do not affect the rights of lien claimants."

It is earnestly contended that actual knowledge must be held to be the equivalent of the notice prescribed by the Code. To so hold would be to hold in effect that the giving of an informal verbal notice would be a substantial compliance with the requirements of the section. This would amount to a repeal of the express provisions thereof which require the posting of a formal notice in writing and specifying what it must contain, and further require that a verified copy thereof must be filed for record. As was said in the case above cited:

"This provision is for the benefit of the owner, and he must avail himself of it, or otherwise, according to its terms, his interest will be liable for the lien."

But it is urged that the appellant, having performed the labor with full knowledge of the provision of the lease above quoted, must be deemed to have given credit solely to the lessees and to have waived his right of recourse against the property of the owner. Aside from the fact that to so hold would be to disregard the plain provisions of the statute, it cannot be said that the appellant elected to give credit only to the lessees. He must be deemed to have known of the provisions of the mechanic's lien statutes and the security thus afforded him. The provisions of the lease affected only the reciprocal rights and obligations of the parties thereto. The respondent gave no notice, either in writing or otherwise, that she intended to avail herself of the exemption offered by the Code section. Indeed, we might conclude with greater reason that, for the sake of getting this work done, she was willing to waive the exemption of the statute and to rely for her own protection upon the financial responsibility of the lessees and the security which she held.

What was said in Jurgenson v. Diller, 114 Cal. 491, 46 Pac. 610, 55 Am. St. Rep. 83, and Reese v. Bald Mountain, etc., Co., 133 Cal. 285, 65 Pac. 578, is not in point here. As was expressly pointed out in the latter case, section 1192, Code of Civil Procedure, was not applicable to either of those cases because they involved subtractive mining which was not "the construction, alteration * * * or repair of any building or other improvement." In Ayers v. Green Gold M. Co., 116 Cal. 333, 48 Pac. 221, it was expressly held that this section was not there applicable because the owner had no knowledge or notice of the doing of the work. Street v. Hazzard, 27 Cal. App. 263, 149 Pac. 770, is not in point for the reason that it was there stipulated that the owner had posted the notice of nonliability in full compliance with all of the requirements of the section as it then read (before the amendment of 1911).

The case of Pasqualetti v. Hilson, 43 Cal. App. 718, 185 Pac. 693, in which an application for rehearing was denied by this court, is squarely in point here, and goes even further than is necessary to sustain appellant's contentions in the instant case. It was there conceded that the owner had in due time posted written notice of nonliability which fully complied in all respects with the requirements of the section; that within the required time a true copy thereof had been filed for record; and that the plaintiff had actual knowledge thereof. It was held, notwithstanding these facts, that the owner's interest in the property was subject to the lien, for the sole reason that the copy of the notice which was filed for record was acknowledged before a notary public instead of being verified as the law requires.

It must be held that mere knowledge on the part of the lien claimant that the owner intends or desires to avail himself of the exemption offered by the statute is not sufficient to debar him from the enforcement of his lien, at least in the absence of circumstances sufficient to create an estoppel against him, which do not here exist.

GREAT WESTERN POWER CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. CITY OF OAKLAND.

1. Taxation ⟸373—Statutory requirement that assessor notify state board of nonoperative property reported to state as operative held mandatory.

In St. 1911, p. 530, enacted to enforce Const. art. 13, § 14, regulating state and local taxation of corporate properties, requiring "operative" properties to be reported to and assessed by and for the state, leaving nonoperative property only subject to local taxation, the provision of section 10 that, if an assessor finds nonoperative property in a report of operative property made to the state, he shall notify the state board of equalization and the company whose property is involved, and that the board shall investigate and decide finally subject only to be set aside by the courts, was mandatory and jurisdictional, so that an assessment as nonoperative property by a city assessor of property included in the state report as operative, without such notice, was void.

2. Constitutional law ⟸46(3)—Contention that tax act was invalid as permitting assessment of nonoperative property by state held premature prior to determining character of property taxed.

The contention that St. 1911, p. 530, enacted to enforce Const. art. 13, § 14, was unconstitutional if construed to invalidate an assessment by a city of property as nonoperative property after its assessment by the state as operative property and without the notice therein required as in disregard of the constitutional classification and as permitting the state to assess nonoperative property, was premature where notice and proceedings for final determination as to character of the property had not been taken.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by the Great Western Power Company of California against the City of Oakland to recover taxes paid under protest. On judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

Guy C. Earl, W. H. Spaulding, and Chaffee E. Hall, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Leon E. Gray, Acting City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendant; a general demurrer to the complaint as amended having been sustained. The action was one brought by the plaintiff to recover certain taxes paid by it, under protest, to the defendant.

The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was and is a corporation engaged in the transmission, and sale of electricity, and in the sale of steam for heat as a by-product of its said business of transmitting and selling electricity; that during the year 1919 the plaintiff owned and operated in the city of Oakland a certain steam-heating plant, which, during the whole of said year was used and operated primarily for the generation, transmission, and sale of electricity, but secondly and as a by-product of said property said plaintiff during said year sold and distributed the steam generated by said property after the same had been used for generating electricity for said purposes, but that no steam was generated or used by said plaintiff during said year for distribution or sale for heat or otherwise or at all, except only as such by-product; that on or about the 9th day of March, 1920, pursuant to the order of the state board of equalization and within the time provided thereby, the plaintiff made and filed with the said state board of equalization its report to said board, which said report set forth in detail all the property owned by said plaintiff in the said city of Oakland, particularly specifying and classifying its said property as operative property and nonoperative property, respectively; that in such report the steam-generating plant of the plaintiff in said city of Oakland was specified and classified as operative property, and as such subject to assessment and taxes for state purposes by and through the state board of equalization; that a copy of said report was immediately thereafter furnished to the assessor of the city of Oakland under the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 9 of the act of the Legislature providing for the separation of state from local taxation, approved April 1, 1911, and pursuant to which act said report had been made; that the said assessor of the city of Oakland never gave to the state board of equalization the notice required by the provisions of said act, to the effect that the plaintiff had included in its said report as operative property any property which said assessor regarded as nonoperative property, as defined by the terms of said act, and, as such, subject to local taxation, but, on the contrary, after the receipt of said report and during the month of July, 1920, notified the plaintiff that he had assessed its said steam-heating plant within the said city of Oakland as nonoperative property at the valuation of $50,000, and that a tax upon said property had been levied by the said city of Oakland for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1920, in the sum of $1,220. The said plaintiff, claiming said assessment to be void, upon the several grounds specified in its protest against the payment of said taxes, paid the same under such protest and thereafter commenced this action to recover the sum so paid. The trial court having sustained a demurrer to its complaint setting forth with much of detail the foregoing facts, and having entered its judgment in the defendant's favor upon the plaintiff's failure to further amend its complaint, it has taken and now prosecutes its appeal from said judgment.

The provisions of the state Constitution and of the statutes adopted in pursuance thereof providing for and regulating state and local taxation respectively of corporate properties which are necessary to be considered for the purpose of determining the present appeal are substantially as follows: In the year 1910 a new section numbered section 14 was added by amendment to article 13 of the state Constitution, which ingrafted thereon a new system for state and local taxation of properties of corporations. It provided for the annual payment to the state by certain enumerated corporations or companies, including all companies engaged in the transmission and sale of gas or electricity, of taxes upon their properties "used exclusively in the operation of their business" to be computed upon certain percentages of the gross receipts from the operation of such companies, which taxes were to be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county or municipal, upon such property. The Legislature was, by the terms of said amendment to the Constitution, instructed to pass all laws necessary to carry its provisions into effect. Pursuant to said instruction the state Legislature at its succeeding session adopted an act entitled:

"An act to carry into effect the provisions of section fourteen of article thirteen of the Constitution of the state of California as said Constitution was amended November 8, 1910, providing for the separation of state from local taxation, and providing for the taxation of public service and other corporations," etc. Stats. 1911, p. 530.

By the terms of section 8 of said act it was provided as follows:

"1. The term 'operative property' as used in this act shall include * * * (e) In the case of companies engaged in the transmission or sale of gas or electricity: The franchises, towers, poles, wires, pipes, canals, tunnels, ditches, flumes, aqueducts, conduits, rights of way, dams, reservoirs, water and water rights used exclusively in the business of the transmission or sale of gas or electricity; transformers, substations, gas holders, gas and electric generators, switches, switchboards, meters, electrical and gas appliances, oil tanks, power plants, power houses and other buildings and structures used in the operation of the business of the transmission or sale of gas or electricity and so much of the land on which said buildings and structures are situate as may be required for the convenient use and operation of said buildings. Provided, that the operative property of the companies enumerated in this section, shall also include any other property not above enumerated that may be reasonably necessary for use by said companies exclusively in the operation and conduct of the particular kinds of business enumerated in section two of this act. The operative property mentioned in subdivision (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e), of this section shall not be subject to taxation for county, municipal, or district purposes except as otherwise provided for in the constitution and laws of this state."

By the terms of subdivision 4 of said section 8 of said act it was provided that:

"The state board of equalization shall have power to make rules and issue instructions not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of this state for the guidance of assessors in determining what is operative property and what is nonoperative property of companies named in this section."

By the terms of subdivision 2 of section 9 of said act it was provided:

"Each of the companies mentioned in section two of this act shall report, in such detail as the state board of equalization shall prescribe, all of its property in this state which comes under the definition of operative property in section eight of this act. When any such company operates both within and without this state it shall report the mileage over which it operates both within and without this state. It shall also report the location of said property within this state by counties, cities and counties, municipalities, and districts, in such manner and in such detail as said board of equalization shall prescribe. It shall also, at the same time, furnish a duplicate of the report covering so much of said property as is located in any county, city and county, and municipality, or district, to the assessor of the county, city and county, city, or district in which such property is located."

By the terms of section 10 of the said act it was provided:

"If any assessor finds in the report of the operative property in his county, city and county, municipality, or district, furnished to him by any of the companies as required in section nine of this act, any piece or parcel of property which he regards as nonoperative property, or partially operative and partially nonoperative he shall, within thirty days after receiving such report, notify the state board of equalization thereof by mail, which notice shall contain a general description of the property and the assessor's reasons for regarding the same as nonoperative property. He shall also mail a copy of the notice to the company whose property is involved. The said board shall investigate the nature of the property and its use, and, if an agreement between the said board, the assessor, and the company as to the proper classification of such property cannot be reached, then the said board shall, under such rules of notice as it may deem reasonable, set a date for a hearing, at which the assessor and the company may be present or represented. At such hearing the board shall, from the evidence presented and from the best information it can obtain, decide the matter in dispute, and determine whether such property is operative or nonoperative or in what proportion operative and in what proportion nonoperative. The said board shall enter its decision in its minutes, and shall send a copy thereof to the assessor and the company, and also to the proper officer of any city affected thereby. Said decision shall be binding upon all parties, the state, the county, city and county, municipality, or district, and the company, unless set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction, and each such assessor must note the decision on his assessment roll, and must assess such property accordingly."

The foregoing provisions of the act of 1911 were incorporated in substantial form in the Political Code in the year 1917, and appear therein in section 3664 et seq. thereof. Stats. 1917, p. 336.

The respondent herein, in support of the action of the trial court sustaining its demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint and of the judgment based thereon, makes three main contentions: First, that the said steam-heating plant of the plaintiff is not "operative property" within the intent and meaning of the foregoing provisions of the Constitution providing for state taxation of property of gas and electric companies, "used exclusively in the operation of their business," and hence is the proper subject of local taxation; second, that the terms of the statute above set forth providing that, when the assessor finds in the report which the corporation has made to the state board of equalization, and of which he has been furnished a copy, any piece of property which he regards as nonoperative property or as partially operative and partially nonoperative property, he shall, within a specified period, notify the said board and said corporation of his reasons for regarding the same as nonoperative property, which notification shall cause said board to institute an investigation into the nature and use of said property, upon the hearing of which it shall be determined by said board whether such property is operative or nonoperative property, which determination shall be binding upon all parties, is a merely permissive proceeding on the part of said assessor, and that his failure to pursue the same is a mere irregularity which did not render the tax in question void; third, that if such procedure is not merely permissive in so far as the assessor is concerned, the provision of the statute requiring it is unconstitutional and void.

[1, 2] As to the first of these contentions it may be said that the question as to whether or not the said steam-heating plant of the plaintiff, used as it is alleged to be, primarily for the generation, transmission, and sale of electricity, and after which use the steam heat thereby developed being thereafter sold and distributed as a by-product, is to be classed as operative or nonoperative property within the intent and meaning of the state Constitution, is an interesting inquiry and is one not altogether covered or concluded by the previous decisions of this court in the cases of Lake Tahoe Ry. Co. v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 551, 143 Pac. 786, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1196, and Southern Pacific Co. v. Richardson, 181 Cal. 280, 184 Pac. 3. It is nevertheless a question which is not presented to this court for final determination in this case; and this by reason of the conclusion we have arrived at with respect to the second contention of the respondent herein as above set forth. It is our opinion that the determination of the question as to whether any certain property of a public service company is or is not subject to state taxation as "operative property used exclusively in its business" is one which is committed in the first instance to the state board of equalization under and by virtue of the procedure outlined in section 10 of the act of 1911 above quoted. In support of this conclusion it may be said that the people of the state of California, in adopting the amendment to the Constitution in the year 1910 above referred to, intended to work a radical change in the method of deriving revenues for public purposes through state and local taxation through a separation of those properties which should be subject to state taxation from those which should be subject to local taxation. This change was to be effectuated chiefly with relation to the properties of corporations of the class commonly known as public service corporations. It was expressly provided in said amendment to the Constitution that the properties of such corporations used exclusively in the operation of their business should be subjected solely to state taxation through the method provided for in said amendment; and in order to accomplish this result the Legislature was expressly directed to pass such laws as should be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of said amendment to the Constitution and to provide for a valuation and assessment of the property thus to be subjected to state taxation and to prescribe the duties of the state board of equalization with respect thereto. In obedience to this direction the Legislature of 1911 undertook to frame and adopt the act of that year and which as we have seen expressed in its title its purpose to be that of "providing for the separation of state from local taxation." In drawing the line of demarcation between those properties of public service corporations which, if used exclusively in their business, should, under the terms of said provision of the Constitution, be subjected to state taxation, and those of their properties which if not thus used should remain subject to local taxation, it requires no very close or intimate acquaintance with the business and properties of such corporations to perceive that there would be properties thereof which from their nature and uses would lie close to or even across the line of such demarcation; and it was the evident design of the Legislature in the adoption of subdivision 2 of section 9 of said act, and also of section 10 thereof, to provide a method of procedure for the determination of any question which might arise as to whether certain of the properties of such corporations did or did not come within the designation of "operative properties" as defined in the Constitution and statute, for the purpose of subjecting such property to state or local taxation. The method thus provided was that of requiring each of such corporations to render a report to the state board of equalization in such detail as said board should prescribe, of all of its property coming within the definition of "operative property" as defined in section 8 of said act. A duplicate of such report was also required to be furnished to the assessor of the county, city and county, city, or district in which such property was located, upon receipt of which such assessor, if he found therein any property within his jurisdiction which he regarded as nonoperative property or partially operative or partially nonoperative property, "shall within thirty days after receiving such report notify the state board of equalization thereof by mail, which notice shall contain a general description of the property and the assessor's reasons for regarding the same as non-operative property. He shall also mail a copy of the notice to the company whose property is involved." It would seem to be obvious that the purpose of these provisions in said act was that of preventing clashes between the state board of equalization and local assessors with respect to what property of such corporations was subject to their respective jurisdictions for the purposes of state or local taxation, and thus avoiding double taxation; and this is made even more apparent by the succeeding provisions of section 10 of said act, which provided for an investigation by the board of equalization to be held for the purposes of determining whether the property in question is or is not operative property, and which further provide that such determination, when made, "shall be binding upon all parties, the state, the county, city and county, municipality or district, and the company, unless set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction; and each assessor must note the decision on his assessment roll and must assess such property accordingly." In view of the foregoing express provisions of section 10 of the act of 1911, we are constrained to hold that the contention of the respondent is not well founded, wherein it insists that the requirement therein that the assessor shall give notice of his objection to the particular piece of property in the report of the public service corporation to the state board of equalization as "operative property" is not mandatory, but merely permissive, and that such assessor is not required to give such notice, but may proceed to assess such property as nonoperative property if he so regards it, without giving any such notice and without any hearing or determination of the question before the state board of equalization. This court has, in substance, held otherwise in the case of Pacific Electric Railway Co. v. Rolkin, etc., 164 Cal. 154, 128 Pac. 20, in construing these very provisions of the act in question. In that case the failure of the city assessor of Los Angeles to file with the state board of equalization within the time prescribed in said act his protest against the taxation of the property in question in that case as operative property of the Pacific Electric Railway Company was held jurisdictional, and a later filing of such protest by him ineffectual to prevent the said board from placing such property upon its roll as operative property, and that its action in so doing was as valid as if no such belated protest had been filed. In harmony with these views we now hold that the failure of the assessor of the city of Oakland to file with the state board of equalization the required notice of his claim that the property in question was nonoperative property of the plaintiff was jurisdictional in so far as his right to thereafter claim that said property was nonoperative property or to assess the same locally as such was concerned. His subsequent action in attempting to assess said property as nonoperative property of such corporation was not, as the respondent contends, a mere irregularity, but, on the contrary, was an attempt to levy a local assessment upon property of the corporation, the status of which had, under the procedure provided in said act, been fixed for that fiscal year as operative property thereof, subject only to state taxation. The attempt of the assessor to thereafter subject the same to local taxation was therefore utterly void. The respondent, however, contends that to so hold is to render the act of 1911 unconstitutional as permitting the assessment of nonoperative property by the state board of equalization and as relieving such property from local taxation. This contention, however, begs the question at issue by assuming that the property in question is nonoperative property, an assumption which may not be made by the assessor or his principal, the respondent herein, after the valid assessment of such property as operative property by the state following the failure of said assessor to present that issue to the state board of equalization by filing the notice and protest required by law. The cases of Lake Tahoe Ry. Co. v. Roberts, supra, and Hines v. Richardson (Cal. Sup.) 197 Pac. 346, cited by respondent in aid of this contention, do not support the same, since those cases arose out of controversies between the public service corporations, parties thereto, and the state, involving the assessment by the latter of said properties of said corporations alleged by them to be nonoperative property, and hence not subject to state taxation. The discussion of this question is foreclosed in the instant case by the failure of the city assessor to present it in the proper forum and at the proper time.

The respondent makes certain other contentions touching the sufficiency of the plaintiff's complaint which we do not deem of sufficient merit to require separate consideration.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint.

PHILLIPS v. BYERS, Sheriff. (L. A. 6653.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃607(2)—Notice to clerk to prepare transcript need not state intention to appeal.

The notice to the clerk to prepare the transcript on appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, need not state that the party desired to appeal; the only notice of appeal appellant was required to give being that prescribed by section 941b.

2. Chattel mortgages ⊂⊃15—Mortgage on canned goods of buyer and canner of fruits held valid, he being a "manufacturer" and not a "merchant."

Under Civ. Code, § 2955, excepting from goods which may be subjected to mortgage the stock in trade of a merchant, a mortgage on canned goods of a company engaged in the business of buying and canning of raw fruits and vegetables contained in a storeroom where its finished products were kept awaiting purchasers was valid, the company being a manufacturer as distinguished from a merchant, giving those words their ordinary meaning in absence of statutory definition; as one who simply manufactures an article and sells it is not a merchant, and, though a manufacturer may also be a merchant if he buys and sells goods, he does not become one by disposing of the goods he has produced at a manufacturer's profit.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Manufacturer; Merchant.]

3. Sheriffs and constables ⊂⊃114—Sheriff held liable for seizing mortgaged goods without tendering the amount of mortgage to mortgagee.

The sheriff renders himself personally liable as for a conversion if he seizes mortgaged goods without paying or tendering to the mortgagee the amount of the mortgage or depositing such amount as required by Civ. Code, § 2969.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by William S. Phillips against James C. Byers, sheriff, for conversion. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. On hearing after affirmance of the judgment by the District Court of Appeals, Second District, Division 2. Judgment of the Superior Court reversed.

William H. Wylie, of San Diego, for appellant.

William G. Mirow and Arthur F. H. Wright, both of San Diego, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiff, Wm. S. Phillips, brought this action against the defendant, James C. Byers, sheriff of San Diego county, to recover damages for the alleged conversion by defendant of certain goods upon which the plaintiff claimed to hold a chattel mortgage. The goods consisted of 585 dozen cans of string beans and 32 dozen cans of catsup, the property of the Standard Canning Company, a corporation, whose business was the buying and canning of raw fruits and vegetables, and which company had canned the goods in question.

On August 1, 1919, the company gave to one A. S. Bridges a promissory note for $23,516.41 and to secure its payment executed a chattel mortgage on—

"all the personal property of every kind owned by said mortgagor and on the premises in block nineteen, * * * among which are items as follows, to wit: All canned string beans; all canned tomatoes; all canned or bottled catsup; all vegetables and fruit in stock, or in process of being manufactured, canned or preserved; all wooden packing boxes; all lug boxed products; all time cards; all salt; all fuel oil; all silicate. * * * Also all canned products of every kind as they are produced upon said leased premises from time to time hereafter, the lien of this mortgage to attach to them as fast as the same are produced or manufactured, together with the cans and containers thereof."

The mortgage was recorded on August 11, 1919, and on September 10, 1919, the note and mortgage were assigned to the plaintiff. Subsequently the mortgage was foreclosed, and a deficiency judgment entered for $8,462.65.

In March, 1919, J. A. Williams, secretary of the company, had requested one I. Isaac Irwin to make a lease of certain farm lands to one Phillip Colburn, in order that Colburn might raise tomatoes thereon to be canned by the company. In payment of the rent for the land five notes, aggregating $1,500, signed by Colburn and indorsed by the company, were given. These notes were not paid, and on November 24, 1919, Irwin brought suit on them against Colburn and the company, and judgment in his favor was rendered and affirmed on appeal. (Cal. App.) 204 Pac. 551. A writ of attachment was issued in the action on the same day, and by virtue thereof the defendant, as sheriff of San Diego county, acting through a deputy, entered the premises of the company, took possession of the 585 dozen cans of string beans and the 32 dozen cans of catsup, and removed them. Thereafter plaintiff began this action, alleging the execution and assignment of the note and mortgage, that the mortgage covered the property in question, and that it had been unlawfully removed by the defendant and converted to his own use.

Defendant in his answer alleged the company was not a manufacturing corporation, but was a corporation merchant, and that the goods attached were part of its stock in trade, which, by section 2955 of the Civil Code, it was forbidden to mortgage. That section provides:

"Mortgages may be made upon all growing crops, including grapes and fruit, and upon any and all kinds of personal property, except the following: * * * 3. The stock in trade of a merchant."

The court found in favor of the defendant, and that as against Irwin the mortgage was void. From judgment entered pursuant thereto plaintiff takes this appeal.

[1] It is first necessary to consider respondent's contention that the transcript on appeal should be disregarded, and the appeal dismissed for the reason that appellant, in his notice to the clerk to prepare the transcript on appeal under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, did not state that he desired or intended to appeal, or that he had appealed from the judgment, which statement is required by the section, and that at the time the notice was given there was no notice indicating that appellant contemplated appealing. This position is untenable. It was held in Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 287, 128 Pac. 1023, 1026, in which case a petition for a hearing by this court was denied, that section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure does not provide for a notice of appeal; that none of the proceedings there prescribed is jurisdictional to the appeal, and that the provision requiring the reporter to file the transcript within 20 days after notice to prepare it is merely directory. As the section does not purport to provide for a notice of appeal, the requirement of a statement that the party has appealed or intends to appeal must be regarded as merely directory, and the absence of such a statement in the notice cannot affect the regularity of the transcript, although the requirement that such a notice shall be filed is undoubtedly mandatory. Des Granges v. Des Granges, 175 Cal. 67, 165 Pac. 13. That there was no notice of appeal on file at the time the notice to prepare the transcript was filed is immaterial, for section 953a expressly provides that the party may state in such a notice that he "intends to appeal," and in such a case there would be no notice of appeal on file. Respondent insists he was entitled to know whether or not appellant intended to appeal, but section 953a does not provide for any notice to the opposite party; it deals entirely with notice to the clerk relative to the preparation of the transcript. The only notice of appeal appellant was required to give was that provided by section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure (since repealed by Stats. 1921, p. 194).

Appellant's first assignment of error is to the action of the court in finding that—

"Said corporation was at all times * * * mentioned in the pleadings a merchant and was doing a merchandising business in the sale of its canned and preserved products"; that "said corporation maintained as a storeroom and place of business a certain room in the city of San Diego, where its finished products were kept awaiting purchase by its customers"; that "on the 1st day of August, 1919, and for some time prior thereto, the said Standard Canning Company of San Diego had and kept in its said storeroom as a part of its stock in trade, 585 dozen No. 10 cans of string beans, which beans had been preserved and canned by said Standard Canning Company of San Diego, and also had in its said storeroom 32 dozen cans of catsup, which catsup had been preserved by said Standard Canning Company of San Diego and that said string beans and catsup were held by said corporation as a part of its stock in trade awaiting sale to its customers at such times as a price acceptable to said corporation might be offered therefor."

It is insisted the company was a manufacturer, and as such entitled to mortgage the manufactured goods in question. The distinction between a manufacturer and a merchant is well recognized, and the cases wherein they have been distinguished are numerous, but the tests applied to determine in which class particular persons or groups belong have varied widely, depending in part on the purpose for which the classification was made in each instance.

In Wakeman v. Hoyt, 28 Fed. Cas. p. 1350 No. 17051, and In re Eeles, 8 Fed. Cas. p. 365, No. 4302, it was held that, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, any one who bought goods and sold them, in the same or an improved state, "used the trade of merchandise," for the carrying on of his business required the extension of credit on an uncertain capital stock.

Respondent has cited a number of authorities from the courts of Missouri, wherein it was held that one who kept on hand a stock of goods manufactured by him for sale in the course of trade was a merchant. But an examination of those cases shows they were decided under a statute requiring merchants to obtain a license, and defining a merchant to be:

"Every person, corporation or copartnership of persons, who shall deal in the selling of goods * * * at any store, stand or place occupied for that purpose." Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 8540.

In State of Mo. v. Whittaker, 33 Mo. 457, it was said:

"We cannot go beyond the statute to find any other definition of a merchant."

The effect of such a rule is to render one who manufactures upon order only a manufacturer, and one who manufactures goods for sale in the course of trade a merchant.

Norris Bros. v. Commonwealth, 27 Pa. 494, and Commonwealth v. Campbell, 33 Pa. 380, were decided under statutes taxing dealers in goods and expressly exempting manufacturers selling their own wares upon their own premises. These two cases held that certain manufacturers who so sold their products were not merchants.

Union County Nat. Bank v. Ozan Lumber Co., 179 Fed. 710, 103 C. C. A. 584, held that a company which manufactured and delivered log rollers on order only was a manufacturer. The court considered the proposition that a manufacturer who deposits his goods "in his store or factory from which he sells them in the usual course of business would probably be a merchant and dealer * * * notwithstanding the fact that he manufactured the articles dealt in," but held such a rule inapplicable to the case there under consideration, and did not approve of it as a general statement of the law.

In Chattanooga Plow Co. v. Hays, 125 Tenn. 148, 140 S. W. 1068, in which case "dealer" and "merchant" were used synonymously, it was said:

"The most restricted definition that can be given to the term 'dealer' is one who takes profit in the distribution of goods and wares to the trade, in addition to the manufacturer's profit. A manufacturer is one engaged in making materials, raw or partly finished, into wares suitable for use. Anderson's Dictionary of Law; Webster. The marked distinction between a manufacturer and a merchant is that the merchant, or dealer, sells to earn a profit, and the manufacturer sells to take profit already earned. He must buy the materials out of which to make his finished product, and he must sell the product of his factory after it is finished. But such dealings are not his occupation. The one supplies him with the materials with which to pursue it, while the other merely enables him to take the profit earned. * * *

"The complainant sells nothing except the product of its own factory, and does not sell that for a dealer's profit. Its only sales are to jobbers and commission men, and the only profit it takes is for manufacturing the article sold. While it deals, and is a dealer, its dealings are merely incidental to its occupation of manufacturer."

In City of New Orleans v. Le Blanc, 34 La. Ann. 596, it was said:

"The defendants are either dealers or they are manufacturers. If they are not dealers, they are manufacturers. They may be both. A dealer is not one who buys to keep, or makes to sell, but one who buys to sell again. He stands between the producer and the consumer, and depends for his profit, not upon the labor which he bestows on his commodities, but upon the skill and foresight with which he watches the markets.

"A manufacturer is not one who creates out of nothing, for that surpasses human power; neither is he one who produces a new article out of materials entirely raw. He is one who gives new shapes, new qualities, new combinations to matter which has already gone through some artificial process. * * *

"In so far as they make barrels, hogsheads, and similar articles of wood, such as coopers make, the defendants must be considered as manufacturers, and as such, exempt from the license sought to be collected from them. But the case is different where they deal in articles of wood not manufactured by themselves; as when they buy and sell hoop poles."

In Ong Chew Lung v. Burnett, 232 Fed. 853, 147 C. C. A. 47 it was said:

"If Ong Hung in 1903 was engaged solely in conducting a factory for the manufacture of materials furnished by others, he was not a merchant; but if in addition to the work of a factory he bought and sold goods, he was a merchant."

In Egan v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 68 S. W. 273, it was held that one who manufactured ice and sold it was not a dealer.

The Standard Dictionary defines "merchant" as:

"A person who buys and sells commodities as a business and for profit; especially, one who has a place of sale and stock of goods; a trader."

The same work defines "manufacture" as:

"1. To make or fashion by working on or combining material, form or produce by some industrial process; fashion by hand or machinery. * * 2. To work or fashion by labor into useful or desirable forms; form or make into something."

A merchant is distinguished from a dealer in that he must have a store, stand or other place to keep and sell his goods, while a dealer may buy and sell without such aids to his business. Kansas City v. Ferd Heim Brewing Co., 98 Mo. App. 590, 73 S. W. 302, 303.

[2] From the authorities above referred to it appears that in the absence of statutory regulation or special circumstances, the courts have given the ordinary meaning to the terms "merchant" and "manufacturer." It follows that one who simply manufacturers an article and sells it is not a merchant, and that although a manufacturer may also be a merchant if he buys and sells goods, he does not become one by disposing of the goods he has produced, at a manufacturer's profit. There is no statute in this state which defines the terms, and in the absence of such provision they must be given their ordinary meaning. The Legislature must have had in view the distinction between them when it inhibited the giving of chattel mortgages on the stock in trade of merchants only.

In the case at bar there is no question but that the string beans and catsup which were attached were canned by the Standard Canning Company, and this constituted it a manufacturer. The evidence shows it sold both on contract and on orders for goods which it had already canned. It also shows that goods were sold only to brokers, jobbers, and wholesale grocers. There is no evidence that such goods were sold for any profit other than that ordinarily made by the manufacturer; that is, there were no sales at a figure which would give the company the profit ordinarily made on a purchase and sale by a middleman. The company did not act as its own broker or wholesaler, and there was uncontradicted evidence that it did no retail business and bought no manufactured products for the purpose of making a profit on a resale. It received no profits other than those earned through canning vegetables.

Therefore, giving full weight to the testimony that the company sold its manufactured goods standing in the warehouse, as well as those manufactured to order, such a fact would not be sufficient to render the company a merchant. It follows the court erred in finding the company was a merchant and in holding the mortgage invalid under section 2955 of the Civil Code. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider the other points made by the parties concerning Irwin's right to be classed as a creditor of the company.

[3] It is not claimed the sheriff complied with the provisions of section 2969 of the Civil Code, which provides that before mortgaged property may be attached, the officer must pay or tender to the mortgagee the amount of the mortgage debt and interest, or must deposit such an amount with the county clerk or treasurer to the order of the mortgagee. In Irwin v. McDowell, 91 Cal. 119, 27 Pac. 601, it was said:

"From these sections it clearly appears that an officer has no right to take mortgaged personal property under process against the mortgagor, unless he first complies with the requirements of section 2969; and if he does so, he makes himself liable as for a conversion."

Judgment reversed.

PEOPLE v. ROE. (Cr. 2423.)

1. Homicide ⟸112(1), 122—Rule as to provoking attack does not prevent reliance on self-defense, or defense of another when evidence in conflict.

The rule that one may not by the commission of a felonious assault provoke a deadly counter attack upon himself or another, and in the course of the counter attack kill the assailant and then invoke self-defense, or defense of another, does not prevent defendant from relying on such defenses when the evidence is in complete and irreconcilable conflict, not only as to the purpose and intent with which defendant and her codefendants entered deceased's home, but also as to the nature and magnitude of the initial assault, and as to whether or not deceased, or defendant and her codefendants, were the aggressors.

2. Criminal law ⟸814(1, 3)—Instructions must be confined to points pertinent to issue, and not cover issues unsupported by evidence.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 1093, 1127, the charge must be applicable and confined to the points pertinent to the issue, and to such matters as may be necessary for the jury's information, and may not, though correctly stating abstract legal principles, be extended to cover an assumed issue which finds no support in the evidence, or which the undisputed evidence shows does not exist.

3. Criminal law ⟸1172(6)—Inapplicable instruction, calculated to mislead and probably affecting conclusion, is prejudicial error.

While there may be exceptional cases in which an inapplicable instruction will not prejudice defendant, when it is clear that such instructions are well calculated to mislead the jury, and in all likelihood affected their conclusion to defendant's prejudice on the only issue in the case, the giving thereof, though correct in principle, is prejudicial error.

4. Homicide ⟸300(9)—Charges on self-defense should not have been given when it was undisputed that no attack was being made on defendant.

Where it was undisputed that, when defendant killed deceased, deceased and a codefendant were locked in a death struggle, and there was no evidence or claim that deceased was making any assault on defendant, instructions on self-defense should not have been given at the request of the people.

5. Homicide ⟸300(5), 340(2)—Instructions on self-defense held prejudicial, where claim was that killing was in defense of another.

Where it was defendant's claim that she killed deceased in defense of a codefendant, instructions on self-defense, including an instruction that to justify a killing on the ground of self-defense, it must have appeared to the slayer as a reasonable person that the danger was so urgent and pressing that to save his own life or prevent his receiving great bodily harm, the killing was absolutely necessary, etc., though stated in the abstract, held confusing and prejudicial.

6. Criminal law ⊜823(10)—Instruction requiring defendant to establish that killing was in defense of another by preponderance of evidence held not cured.

An instruction, requiring defendant to establish by the preponderance of the evidence the essentials of her defense that the killing was in defense of another's person, was not cured by an instruction for defendant, if she killed deceased, reasonably believing it was necessary to do so to save her codefendant from a murderous assault, as in conjunction they required the jury to be satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that she had such reasonable cause for belief.

7. Criminal law ⊜1159(2)—Appellate court can only determine whether error has led to verdict.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting new trials unless error has resulted in a miscarriage of justice, while an appellate court has power to a limited extent to weigh the evidence, it is not substituted for the jury, and cannot determine as an original inquiry the question of guilt or innocence, but can only decide whether the error has led to the verdict reached.

8. Homicide ⊜340(1)—Affirmance of codefendant's conviction not conclusive that errors were not prejudicial.

That the District Court of Appeal held a codefendant's conviction upon a separate trial sustained by the evidence does not militate against the conclusion that errors in charging on defendant's claim that she killed deceased in defense of her codefendant operated to her prejudice and contributed materially to the verdict.

9. Homicide ⊜327—Appellate court cannot consider verdict in another case in determining whether errors prejudicial, where proceedings therein not before it.

In determining whether errors in charging on defendant's claim that she killed deceased in defense of her codefendant were prejudicial, the Supreme Court cannot consider the verdict on such codefendant's trial, where the record of the proceedings and evidence in that case is not before it.

10. Criminal law ⊜1186(4)—That another jury might under proper instructions render the same verdict immaterial in determining whether instructions erroneous.

In applying Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting new trials except where there has been a miscarriage of justice to erroneous instructions, it is immaterial that another jury upon a new trial might, upon the same evidence and proper instructions, render a verdict of guilty.

11. Homicide ⊜244(3)—Defendant not required to establish justification by preponderance of evidence, but only to raise reasonable doubt.

Pen. Code, § 1105, casting on defendant the burden of proving circumstances to justify or excuse a homicide, does not require her to prove such circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence, but only by evidence sufficient to create a reasonable doubt, and hence, where defendant claimed she killed deceased in defense of B., it was error to charge that the burden was on her to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that deceased was the aggressor, and that B. used all reasonable means to avoid further conflict.

12. Criminal law ⊜823(10)—Instruction, requiring defense to be established by preponderance of evidence, not cured by instructions on presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt.

The usual instructions as to the presumption of innocence and the necessity of proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt did not render harmless an instruction imposing on defendant the burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence her sole defense that she killed deceased in defense of another.

13. Criminal law ⊜743—When defendant gave contradictory testimony, it was for the jury to determine which was true.

Where defendant gave contradictory answers as to her reason for shooting deceased, it was the province of the jury to determine under proper instructions which statement was true as though they had been made by different witnesses.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Maybelle Roe was convicted of murder in the first degree, and she appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied; Lawlor, J., dissenting.

Davis, Rush & MacDonald, Alfred F. MacDonald, Wm. B. Beirne, J. B. Joujon-Roche, and Verge & Willson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, J. This case is here on rehearing after decision of the District Court of Appeal, First Division, Second District, reversing the judgment of the trial court. Upon behalf of the people it was earnestly contended in the District Court of Appeal, as is contended here, that the trial court's instructions to the jury upon the subject of self-defense—held by the District Court of Appeal to be beyond the issues raised in the case, and therefore confusing to the jury and prejudicial—were, in fact, helpful rather than harmful to the defendant's case, even though the claimed defense of the person of another against a felonious and deadly assault was the only defense which was interposed by the defendant to the charge of murder upon which she was tried and convicted. In this behalf it is the contention of the Attorney General that the evidence educed upon the whole case shows that the defendant was not entitled in any event to interpose the defense of self-defense or the correlated defense of the defense of the person of another, and that therefore neither the instructions given upon the subject of self-defense nor that instruction which erroneously required the defendant to show by a preponderance of evidence certain essentials necessarily involved in the only defense interposed, viz. the defense of the person of another, can be held to have operated to the prejudice of the defendant. With reference to the latter instruction it is further contended that, even though it should be held that the defendant was entitled to have the jury instructed upon the law relative to the right of one person to make a defense of the person of another, still the evidence educed upon the whole case points so overwhelmingly to the guilt of the defendant that it may be fairly said the verdict of the jury would have been the same even if the admittedly erroneous instruction had not been given, and therefore it is insisted that the judgment should be affirmed pursuant to the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

[1] These contentions, as we read and understand the briefs filed in behalf of the people's case, rest upon the erroneous assumption that the evidence as a whole shows overwhelmingly that the affray in which the deceased was killed by the defendant Maybelle Roe was instigated and consummated by her, acting in conjunction with three codefendants jointly indicted with her, pursuant to a conspiracy entered into by all of said defendants, which had for its sole purpose a felonious and murderous assault upon the deceased, and, further, that the evidence shows that, with such purpose and intent, said defendants entered the home of the deceased, where the altercation commenced, and which culminated, on the lawn of the home of the deceased, in the death of the deceased by the hand of the defendant Maybelle Roe. With this assumption as a premise, it is argued that both the right of self-defense and the defense of the defense of the person of another were foreclosed to the defendant upon the theory that it is the law that one who willfully and deliberately, for the purpose of creating a necessity for self-defense, provokes, by the commission of a felonious assault, a deadly counter attack upon him, cannot, because of and in the course of the counter attack, kill his assailant and then invoke the defense of self-defense or the defense of the person of another who, as the result of the original assault, became involved in and was being subjected to the deadly counter assault. Although not embodying a full exposition of the law of self-defense, still, generally speaking, the theory contended for in this behalf comports with a fundamental feature of the law of self-defense as settled and accepted in this jurisdiction, but obviously it can have no application to a situation where, as in the instant case, the evidence adduced upon the whole case is in complete and irreconcilable conflict, not only as to the purpose and intent with which the defendant Maybelle Roe and her codefendants entered the home of the deceased, but also as to the nature and magnitude of the initial assault, and as to whether or not the deceased or the defendant Maybelle Roe and her codefendants were the first aggressors in that assault. People v. Travis, 56 Cal. 251; People v. Hunt, 59 Cal. 430; People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 42 Pac. 307, 30 L. R. A. 403; People v. Kennett, 114 Cal. 18, 45 Pac. 994; People v. Worthington, 115 Cal. 242, 46 Pac. 1061.

It may be conceded that the evidence educed in support of the people's case and relied upon for a conviction, if it stood alone, would suffice to support the verdict. And, of course, if that were the only evidence offered and received in the case, there would be little reason for contending that the inapplicable and admittedly erroneous instructions complained of were prejudicial to the defendant's case. But opposed to this evidence, the record shows facts and circumstances leading up to and attending the killing of the deceased, as disclosed by the evidence educed in support of the defense, which, if believed by the jury, would have tended to create a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, and yet, even though believed by the jury, may well have been held by it, under the erroneous instructions of the trial court, to be lacking in the preponderance which said instructions declared was necessary to overcome the evidence educed in support of the people's case. In this behalf the record shows the evidence offered and received in behalf of the defendant to be as follows:

Mrs. Julia Doane was the owner of a certain dwelling house on Sherman avenue, in Venice, Cal., which she rented on September 5, 1919, to McCullough Graydon, the deceased. At various times there had been considerable controversy over the payment of the rent. Finally Mrs. Doane raised the rent, and, when the Graydons failed to pay the increase, served them with notice terminating their tenancy. Graydon maintained that he had a lease of the premises for a year, while the Doanes insisted that his was a month to month tenancy only. The Graydons continued to occupy the house until May 10, 1920, when they left, taking all their belongings with them with the exception of a sewing machine, which Mr. Graydon ordered turned over to the sewing machine company. About a week after their departure, the Doanes took possession, and on July 17 rented the house furnished for two months at a rental of $150 per month. Graydon sued for possession of the premises, and on July 24 a writ of possession was directed to the sheriff, which resulted in Mrs. Doane's tenants being dispossessed on the 28th of that month.

On August 30th, at about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. Graydon applied at the county clerk's office for a writ of possession. Before issuing the writ the clerk in charge asked Graydon if a bond on appeal had been filed, to which he replied in the negative. However, prior to the issuance of the writ of restitution, and on August 27, Mr. Burr, attorney for Mrs. Doane, went to the county clerk's office to file an appeal bond in the case of Graydon v. Doane. Mr. Graydon was at one of the counters, and Mr. Burr inquired of him whether he had the files in that case, stating to Graydon that he was filing a bond on appeal and wanted to check up some dates. He also mentioned that this was to stay any execution that might issue in the case. August 31 was a holiday, and it was not until the clerk checked up the register of actions on the morning of September 1 that the discovery was made that a bond had been filed, and that the writ was erroneously issued.

At about 10:30 on the morning of September 1 Mr. Doane went to the Sherman avenue house for the purpose of verifying a bill for some plumbing repairs, and met the deputy sheriff there, who told him that Mr. Graydon had been put in possession of the house. Doane returned home, and, after getting into communication over the telephone with Mr. Burr, went back to the Sherman avenue house and ascertained that the sheriff had left. He thereupon told Mr. Graydon that a mistake had been made in giving him possession of the premises, and again left for home, where he received a telephone message, requesting him to go to 36 Sherman avenue.

When Mrs. Doane's attorney, Mr. Burr, learned on September 1 of the clerk's error in issuing the writ of restitution, and that Mr. Graydon had been put in possession of the house, he got in communication with Mr. Oscar A. Bowers, and asked the latter to drive down to Venice and inform Mr. Graydon that the place had been turned over to him by mistake, and told Bowers that if he would get word to the deputy sheriffs in Venice to get in touch with the sheriff's office in Los Angeles, the deputies would be instructed not to levy the writ. Bowers then communicated with the sheriff's office, and they also asked him to deliver the message to Graydon.

Bowers lived with the Roes at their home in Los Angeles, and invited appellant, Maybelle Roe, who had been in ill health for some time, to accompany him on the trip to Venice. They went first to Mrs. Doane's millinery store, and, not finding either of the Doanes there, drove to the Sherman avenue house. When Mr. Doane, in response to the telephone message, arrived at the Sherman avenue place, he found Bowers and Mrs. Roe on the walk in front of the house. Bowers spoke to him about the mistake that had been made, and told him that the sheriff said to call up the latter's office, and that the Doanes could demand possession of the house. Doane then went up on the porch and knocked on the door. Mr. Graydon did not open the door, but talked to him through the window. He asked Graydon to give up possession of the house, but the latter refused. Doane then left and tried, without success, for at least a half hour, to get the sheriff's office at Los Angeles on the telephone. He started back to the house, and saw Mrs. Doane going up the steps. He followed her up the steps and into the house as the door was opened. Mr. and Mrs. Graydon, Miss Marshall, and a taxicab driver were there. Bowers and Mrs. Roe sat in the automobile for some time, and Bowers suggested that, as neither the sheriff's deputies nor the Doanes had come, they perhaps had better return to the city. Mrs. Roe then went up to the house, and, seeing Mrs. Doane there, motioned for Bowers to come up. When he and Mrs. Roe reached the front of the house, Mrs. Doane was looking through the door, and Mr. Doane was standing as if he were just entering the house. Mrs. Roe called to Mrs. Doane, and the latter said she wanted Bowers and Mrs. Roe to come in and verify the statement the sheriff had made. Mr. Graydon remarked: "They can't come in here. You will have no witnesses to any conversation in this house today." And Mrs. Graydon said: "If Mrs. Roe comes in here I will kill her."

They walked up on the porch, Mrs. Roe preceding Mr. Bowers, and when the former reached the door, "Mr. Graydon came through the door at an angle about 45, struck Mrs. Roe right in the face, knocked her glasses off, knocked her right down in the corner on the porch right by the door." Neither Bowers nor Mrs. Roe had said a word up to that time. Bowers then stepped up to catch Mrs. Roe and prevent her falling through the glass doors. He asked Graydon why he had struck her, whereupon Graydon "reached right back out of the door and struck me (Bowers) right over the right eye with a pair of knucks, and immediately struck me again on this side," and at about the same moment Mrs. Graydon rushed in the doorway and hit Mrs. Roe over the head with a blackjack. Bowers had his hands out to keep Mrs. Roe from falling, when Graydon grabbed him by the wrist, ran his arms around behind him, and Mrs. Graydon and Miss Marshall beat him over the head and shoulders. Mr. Doane, a man of about 70 years, tried to separate the two men fighting on the porch, but Graydon picked Bowers up and carried him bodily down on the walk. Mr. Doane's sight is very poor, one eye having been lost in an operation and the other having only partial sight. By the time he felt his way down the steps Mr. Graydon had Mr. Bowers on the ground and was on top of him. They struggled across the lawn and then back again to the center of the yard, and stood, "Mr. Graydon on the right of Mr. Bowers, with his left arm over his shoulder, around his neck, and choking him." Mrs. Graydon then ran out after Mrs. Roe, and Miss Marshall sprang off the porch and hit Mrs. Doane "with something hard," and they both fell to the ground. From the blows he received while on the porch Bowers was rendered unconscious, and the next thing he realized he was lying on the lawn, and Graydon had slipped up Bowers' necktie and was drawing it so tight that Bowers could not breathe. Bowers' eyes were bulging out of his head and his tongue was hanging out. Mrs. Roe pleaded with Graydon not to hurt Bowers, as he was a cripple, to which Graydon replied: "I don't give a damn if he is; I am going to kill him anyhow." Mrs. Roe again begged Graydon not to kill Bowers, and then went back to the porch, and "Miss Marshall came in the house, and she run out and knocked Mrs. Doane down, and I [Maybelle Roe] saw a revolver in her hand, and I grabbed the revolver and fired; I grabbed the revolver away from her and fired," and then dropped the revolver on the ground. She fired the shot because she thought that Graydon was killing Bowers. In falling, Mr. Graydon struck his face on the bricks that were set at an angle on the edge of the grass plat.

After the shooting, Mrs. Graydon handed Mrs. Roe her handbag, and the latter and Mr. Bowers went back to their automobile. They just started the car when the police officers arrived and arrested them. When Mrs. Roe opened up her handbag to take out her handkerchief in order to wipe the blood from her head, she found the blackjack. It was the first time she had seen it. Neither Bowers nor Mrs. Roe had gone to the house armed with a set of brass knuckles or a blackjack. Although the officers took a pair of knuckles from Bowers' pocket, he claims that he never owned or carried a pair of them.

From the evidence in defendant's behalf it appears that Mr. Graydon had made threats against Mrs. Doane on several occasions. Mrs. Florence A. Rennie, who was engaged in the real estate business in Venice, testified that in a conversation with Mr. Graydon some time during the middle or latter part of August, he said, referring to Mrs. Doane, that "he would get that old woman and all she had." Some time during the month of May Graydon also said to Donald H. Gray, a grocer, in speaking of the damage suit against Mrs. Doane: "I am going to get every cent that old woman has got; I will make her look like a dirty deuce." Gray said that he would rather give up the house than have such inharmonious conditions, to which Graydon replied: "My God, I would kill that old woman before I would give up the house."

With regard to the injuries received by the defendants, Bernice Hartley, who was acting as assistant matron at the county hospital when Mrs. Roe was taken to the county jail, testified that the latter had a cut on the left side of her head about three inches long, and a "bump" on the right side, perhaps half as large as an egg.

Mr. Burr, the attorney, saw Mrs. Roe at the jail in Venice about 5:30 on the afternoon of the homicide, and stated that she had a lump on her head, and her hair was thickly matter with blood. He also saw Mr. Bowers, who had an abrasion on his forehead about 2½ inches long, and other smaller cuts on his forehead; also a black eye.

George M. Lingo, who was connected with the Venice police department as a desk sergeant, saw Mrs. Roe and Mr. Bowers when they were first brought to the police station. While he did not make any particular examination to ascertain the extent of their injuries, he noticed that Mrs. Roe had a "puffed place well towards the front on the top of her head"; that there was blood on her face and some in her hair.

Edwin F. Jackson, engineer in the Bank of Italy building, saw Mr. Bowers on September 7 at the county jail. Bowers' eye had been blackened, and he noticed several scalp bruises and marks on his forehead; also the skin "had been knocked off" of Bowers' crippled arm. Under correct instructions the jury, when weighing the evidence of the defense, as above narrated, may well have entertained a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant proceeded to the home of the deceased with any other purpose than to aid in peaceably regaining possession of the premises, which one of her codefendants owned, and that in so doing neither she nor her codefendants had a preconceived intent of provoking a deadly quarrel with the deceased. In short, if there be evidence, as we are satisfied there is, sufficient, if believed, to have warranted, under the rule of reasonable doubt, a finding that the affray out of which the killing of the deceased ultimately resulted was, at its inception, not more than a simple assault upon the deceased, then the deceased would not have been justified in using any greater force than would have been necessary to have defended himself against and repelled such assault. People v. Hecker, supra. And if, as the defendant claims and the evidence introduced in her behalf tends to show, the deceased in retaliation of a simple assault, or a simple trespass, committed a felonious and murderous assault upon her codefendant

Bowers, then it cannot be said that the right of the defense of the person of Bowers against the consummation of such felonious and murderous assault may be rightfully denied to the defendant Maybelle Roe. This being so, said defendant justly complains of that instruction concerning a vitally essential feature of her defense, which put upon her a greater burden of proof than that exacted by the law, and that instruction, coupled with the confusion which must have been created in the minds of the jurors as to what her real defense was by the giving of other instructions wholly foreign to the issue, operated to prevent the jury from adequately comprehending and correctly considering the only defense interposed in her behalf. This was tantamount to depriving her of any defense whatever.

[2] It is true, as has been suggested, that under the provisions of sections 1093 and 1127 of the Penal Code "the judge may * * * charge the jury, and must do so on any points pertinent to the issue, if requested by either party, * * *" and "in charging the jury * * * must state to them all matters of law necessary for their information." It needs no argument, we take it, to demonstrate that the provisions of the above-quoted sections contemplate and require that the trial court's charge to the jury must be applicable and confined to the "points pertinent to the issue," and to such matters of law as may be necessary for the information of the jury. This being so, the charge of the trial court may not, without error, even though correctly stating abstract legal principles, be extended beyond such limitation to the point of covering an assumed issue which finds no support in the evidence, or which the undisputed evidence in the case shows does not exist. Hughes' Instructions to Juries, § 80, p. 70; 1 Blashfield, Instructions to Juries (2d Ed.) § 82, pp. 183–186; Garcia v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 61 S. W. 122; State v. De Wolfe, 29 Mont. 415–426, 74 Pac. 1084; Aguirre v. Alexander, 58 Cal. 21; People v. Dallen, 21 Cal. App. 770, 132 Pac. 1064; Maines v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 109, 31 S. W. 667; Comptoir v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 Pac. 28; In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 304, 305, 44 Pac. 577.

The error of inapplicable instructions rests in the fact that they pertain to points not "pertinent to the issue," and contain matters of law for the jury's consideration not "necessary for their information," and therefore, instead of enlightening, tend to confuse and mislead the jury. This is so because such instructions, in effect, either create a false issue or constitute a misstatement of the real issue, thereby distracting the attention of the jury from and befogging the real issue.

[3] There may be, of course, exceptional cases in which an inapplicable instruction will not operate to the prejudice of a defendant in a criminal case, but when it is clear, as it seems to us in the instant case, that such instructions are well calculated to mislead a jury, and in all likelihood affected their conclusion to the prejudice of the defendant upon the only issue in the case, the giving thereof, even though correct in principle, constitutes error equally as grave as would be the giving of instructions fundamentally wrong. People v. Devine, 95 Cal. 227, 30 Pac. 378.

[4] That the killing was done in the instant case while Graydon, the deceased, and Bowers, the codefendant of the defendant Maybelle Roe, were locked in a death struggle, is an uncontradicted fact. There is no evidence that at the time of the killing Graydon attempted or contemplated an assault upon the defendant Maybelle Roe. No claim was made, and none could be successfully made, under the evidence educed, either for the prosecution or the defense, that at the time of the killing, Graydon, the deceased, was making an assault upon the defendant Maybelle Roe. This being so, said defendant would not have been entitled as a matter of right, as she otherwise would be, to an instruction upon the law of self-defense. And, of course, if the trial court would have been justified in refusing such an instruction, at the request of defendant, because not pertinent to the issue in the case, then, for the same reason, the trial court was precluded from giving such an instruction at the request of the people.

[5] That the several instructions upon the law of self-defense, given to the jury at the request of the people, were calculated to confuse the jury, and must have prejudiced the defendant's case, is affirmatively shown, we think, by the fact that they charged the jury that—

> "In order to justify a killing upon the ground of self-defense, it must have appeared to the slayer, as a reasonable person, that the danger, if any, was so urgent and pressing that in order to save his own life or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm the killing was absolutely necessary; * * * that the killing was done under a well-founded belief that it was necessary for the defendant to kill the deceased at the time to save himself from death or great bodily harm; * * * that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline further trouble before the fatal shot was fired."

While it is true that these and other instructions upon the same subject did not in terms refer to the defendant Maybelle Roe, nevertheless they did refer "to the defendant" and to the "slayer," and Maybelle Roe was the defendant and admittedly the "slayer." Therefore, no matter how abstractly the subject-matters of the instructions were stated, it is idle to contend that said instructions had no reference to the defendant in the case, and if the jury applied, as doubtless they did, the requirements of said instructions to the situation of "the slayer" at the time of the killing, they could not fail to find, in the face of the undisputed fact that she was not being assailed by the deceased at the time of the killing, that it was not necessary for her to kill the deceased in order to save herself from death or great bodily harm, and, therefore, in keeping with the charge of the court, the jury had no alternative but to find the defendant guilty upon the fictitious issue of self-defense, which was, by the instructions complained of, created and injected into the case in conflict with and to the confusion of the defense of the person of another, which was the only defense interposed and relied upon by the defendant, and which, under the evidence bearing upon the situation of the defendant, at the time of the killing, was the only defense available to her.

[6, 7] No instructions were given which tended in any degree to cure the error of the instruction which erroneously charged the jury that a preponderance of the evidence was necessary to the establishment by the defendant of the essentials of the defense of the person of another. While instruction No. 39, and similar instructions, did charge the jury, in effect, that if the defendant Maybelle Roe killed the deceased "reasonably believing it was necessary" to do so to save her codefendant Bowers from a murderous assault, still this instruction, assuming it to be in its entirety a correct exposition of the law in the particulars stated therein, must be read in conjunction with the admittedly erroneous instruction, and when so read, necessarily required the jury to be satisfied, by a preponderance of the evidence, that she had reasonable cause to believe in the necessity for acting in the defense of Bowers, whereas the law required from her upon that phase of the case only such proof as would create a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury. While it is true that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution confers upon this court the power to weigh, to a limited extent, the evidence in its entirety upon which a conviction has been had, still "we are not substituted for the jury. We are not to determine, as an original inquiry, the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence." We are to "decide whether, in our judgment, any error committed has led to the verdict which was reached." People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042. We are satisfied that the verdict of guilty was arrived at by the aid of the inapplicable and admittedly erroneous instructions, and this is so, in our judgment, because they obviously obscured and crippled the defendant's defense to the extent practically of denying to her the right of any defense at all. We are fortified in this conclusion by the fact that a careful review of the cold record before us shows the evidence, educed upon the whole case, to be in irreconcilable conflict and closely balanced, in weight and quality, for and against the guilt of the defendant.

[8-10] The fact that the District Court of Appeal held the conviction of Bowers, upon a separate appeal from a verdict and judgment of conviction obtained, upon a separate trial, to be sustained by the evidence in that particular case, does not militate against the conclusion reached by the same court of appeal, in the instant case, that the errors complained of operated to the prejudice of the defendant and contributed materially to the verdict; nor can the verdict in the Bowers Case be considered by us in arriving at a similar conclusion, for the reason that the record of the proceedings had and the evidence educed in that case is not before us, and therefore we do not and cannot know that the defense interposed and the situation, in so far as the evidence in its entirety is concerned, were the same. Nor is it a matter for consideration, when applying section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, that another jury upon a new trial might upon such conflicting evidence and proper instructions render a verdict of guilty. Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 369, 190 Pac. 36. We, therefore, adopt and approve the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal, as expressed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Victor Shaw, as follows:

"The homicide occurred at the house of McCullough Graydon, the deceased, which he occupied as tenant of Julia Doane, the owner, and who, in company with Oscar A. Bowers, Edward F. Doane, and the defendant, had gone to the house of Graydon, with whom there was a controversy as to his right to retain possession of the same, and where a violent altercation, engaged in over the subject of his vacating the premises, culminated in an encounter wherein all the parties appear to have participated, and in which Graydon was killed by defendant. As to be expected in such a case, the testimony upon the question as to how the trouble originated, who was the aggressor, who participated therein, and the part each took, and for what purpose, whether as peacemaker or aggressor, is in sharp conflict, added to which was much evidence of a circumstantial nature, the determination of all of which questions arising thereon was the province of the jury under the instructions of the court.

"Appellant attacks the instructions given by the court, claiming that as to those covering the question of self-defense, while correct statements of abstract principles of law, they are wholly inapplicable to any issue involved, and that as to another it embodied a statement of an incorrect and erroneous rule of evidence which the jury applied in the consideration of the case.

"Defendant admitted she fired the shot which killed McCullough Graydon. Her sole defense was that the act was committed under circumstances which justified her in believing it necessary, if not to save the life of Bowers, at least to save him from great bodily injury, upon which facts, if established, subject to qualifications stated by the court in charging the jury, she was entitled to an acquittal.

"While she made no claim of justification based upon self-defense, and no evidence was offered touching such issue, the court at great length instructed the jurors as to the law thereon, among other things, in substance charging them that in order to justify the taking of life upon the ground of self-defense it must not only have appeared to the defendant as a reasonable woman that she had reason to believe, and did believe, that she was in danger of her life or of receiving great bodily harm, but that her act in killing deceased was not justified unless the jury found that it appeared to her as a reasonable person 'that the danger, if any, was so urgent and pressing that in order to save his [her] own life the killing of the other was absolutely necessary.' While correct statements of abstract propositions of law, the instruction, since there was no evidence touching the question of self-defense, were not applicable to any issue involved. Moreover, they were well calculated to confuse and mislead the jury into a belief that under the instructions they should convict if, as stated by the court, they were satisfied (as they must have been from the evidence) that the defendant did not commit the act because of a belief, reasonable or otherwise, upon her part that her life was in danger, or that she was threatened with great bodily harm from an attack by the deceased. She made no claim of such character. That the giving of the instructions constituted error admits of no doubt. In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 44 Pac. 577; People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 259, 86 Pac. 187; Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, p. 350.

[11] "As stated, the defendant justified the homicide in defense of the life and protection of another, as to which the court instructed the jury that if Graydon 'was unlawfully attempting to commit a great injury upon the person of Oscar Bowers, and that the force of the circumstances was sufficient to excite the fears of the defendant as a reasonable woman that the said Graydon would succeed in his attempt to commit a violent injury or do great bodily harm to the person of said Bowers, and she reasonably believed that it was necessary to shoot the deceased to prevent the said Graydon from committing said injury to said Bowers, and, acting under such fears and belief alone, she fired the shot which killed the deceased, then and in that event I instruct you that she was justified, and * * * you should find the defendant not guilty.' This statement, however, was qualified by an instruction to the effect that the plea of justification upon such ground was unavailing if the assault upon Bowers by Graydon was procured by the former or made under the appearance of hostility created by Bowers with a view of having his adversary act upon it, in connection with which the court gave an instruction as follows: 'You are further instructed that, it being the claim of the defendant that she shot the deceased in order to save the life of Oscar A. Bowers at a time when said Bowers and said Graydon were fighting, the burden is upon the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence (italics ours) that said Graydon was the aggressor in said fight, and that said Bowers used all reasonable means to avoid further conflict before she fired the fatal shot.'

"While section 1105, Penal Code, casts upon a defendant the burden of proving circumstances that justify or excuse the commission of a homicide, it does not mean that he must prove such circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence. On the contrary, while the burden of showing the circumstances under which the act is justified devolves upon a defendant, 'he is only bound under this rule to produce such evidence as will create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the offense charged.' People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160 [22 Pac. 127, 549]. Under the instruction given, the verdict of the jury was made to depend upon whether or not they found that Graydon was the aggressor, and whether or not Bowers used all reasonable means to avoid further conflict before defendant fired the fatal shot; and they were told to find these facts adversely to defendant unless she established the contrary by a preponderance of the evidence. Such is not the law. Under the instruction the verdict was predicated upon the implied finding that Graydon was not the aggressor, and Bowers did not use all reasonable means to avoid further conflict, which finding as to such negative facts was based upon a preponderance of the evidence, when all that could be demanded of defendant under the law was that she produce evidence sufficient only to create in the minds of the jurors a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the alleged circumstances upon which she claimed justification. Entertaining such doubt, she was entitled to an acquittal without regard to what might appear upon a consideration of a preponderance of the evidence touching the question. Where a defendant justified the act in committing a homicide, the same degree of proof, no more and no less, is required in the determination of the issue upon which guilt or innocence depends as that which is demanded in establishing the commission of the homicide. 'Any other rule as to the weight of the evidence makes one measure applicable to one part of the case and a different one to another part and leads to confusion.' People v. Bushton, supra. In the case of People v. Elliott, 80 Cal. 296, 305, 22 Pac. 207, 210, in discussing a like instruction, the court said: 'The instruction was erroneous for the further reason that it cast upon the defendant the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or that justified or excused the commission of the homicide by a preponderance of the evidence, when it was only necessary that he should introduce evidence sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to his guilt or the mitigating circumstances.' See, also, People v. Lanagan, 81 Cal. 143, 22 Pac. 482; People v. Morris, 3 Cal. App. 1, 84 Pac. 463. Under the law it was necessary only that defendant produce evidence the weight of which was sufficient to create in the minds of the jurors a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the alleged circumstances which justified the homicide, and if, based thereon, they entertained a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the same, defendant was entitled to an acquittal. By the instruction as given, defendant was required to produce in her defense evidence of greater weight than that which the law demands, the effect of which is identically the same as though she had been wrongly deprived of evidence touching the subject altogether.

[12] "While the court gave the usual instructions as to the presumption of innocence and the fact that defendant's guilt must be established beyond a reasonable doubt, such instructions cannot be said to render the erroneous instruction referred to harmless. It was directed to her sole defense, which was the only issue tried, and imposed upon her the burden of establishing facts upon which the plea of not guilty was based by a preponderance of evidence, and therefore the giving of the instruction cannot be said to be nonprejudicial, as where the defense is an alibi or based upon a denial of committing the homicide. People v. Miller, 177 Cal. 404, 170 Pac. 817; People v. Wilt, 173 Cal. 477, 160 Pac. 561.

[13] "The evidence touching the issue was conflicting. Indeed, there appears to have been a sharp conflict in the testimony of the defendant herself as to her reason for firing the fatal shot, in that, while asserting on direct examination that she committed the act in defense of Bowers, she, on cross-examination, in response to the question, 'Well, why did you fire the shot?' stated, 'Because he was killing Mr. Bowers.' And in reply to the question, 'Because who was killing Mr. Bowers?' answered, 'Mr. Graydon.' In response to further questions by the district attorney, she stated: 'I don't know why I fired it. No, I did not fire it at Mr. Graydon; I never fired it at Mr. Graydon.' While in replying to the questions she gave contradictory answers, it was the province of the jury to determine under proper instructions which of the statements was true, just as though they had been made by different witnesses. The same rule applies. The mere fact that her answers were contradictory might, by reason of the conflict, have raised a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors, in which case, as we view the law, she should have been acquitted.

We concur: SHAW, C. J.; WILBUR, J.; SLOANE, J.; WASTE, J.; SHURTLEFF, J.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. In my opinion there are two answers to appellant's contentions concerning the six instructions on self-defense, the soundness of which as propositions of law is not questioned—first, that they were properly given, and, second, that if not applicable the giving of them could not have been misleading. It was the duty of the court to state all matters of law pertinent to the case. Pen. Code, §§ 1093 and 1127. The theory of the prosecution was that the Doanes, Bowers, and appellant had entered into a conspiracy against Graydon forcibly and by the use of pistols, brass knuckles, and a blackjack, to oust him from the premises. Under this theory Graydon would have been justified in taking the law into his own hands against any or all of them and using force against any or all of them proportionate to the danger. In such circumstances appellant would not have been warranted in killing him to save the life of any of them. It was therefore the duty of the court, whether requested by appellant or not, to charge the jury on the subject of self-defense in order to aid them in determining whether Graydon or his adversaries in the affray were at fault at the time appellant intervened and fired the shot. Clearly the right of appellant to intervene depended upon the situation that was presented to her at the time, in view of her acquaintance with all the facts, and the jury could not tell what the legal situation was between Graydon and his adversaries, upon which appellant acted, without instructions on the law of self-defense, for, of course, a mingled question of law and fact was involved. Regarded in this light, the instructions would be equally responsive to the claim of the defense that there was no conspiracy, but that Graydon was the aggressor and was endeavoring to kill Bowers. Moreover, it appears plain to me that these instructions were stated as general propositions of law. The words "defendant" and "slayer" were used, but in the abstract in each instance, and upon no theory can it be claimed they would not have had application to Graydon and his adversaries. But even if it be conceded the instructions were improperly given, I do not see how the jury could possibly have been misled into assuming appellant must be convicted unless she reasonably believed her own life or her bodily safety was in danger, in view of numerous other instructions which were given, particularly No. 39, proposed by appellant, wherein the jury were repeatedly told that if appellant killed Graydon, reasonably believing it was necessary to save Bowers from great bodily injury as a result of an unlawful attack by Graydon, she should be acquitted.

Nor do I think the erroneous use of the phrase "by a preponderance of the evidence," instead of "sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt." calls for a reversal of the judgment. Misdirection of the jury is one of the errors contemplated by section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. The majority opinion proceeds on the theory that, because there is a conflict in the evidence, and that there is evidence sufficient, if believed, to have warranted a finding in favor of appellant under the rule of reasonable doubt, it cannot be held the erroneous instruction did not work a miscarriage of justice.

But as I understand the constitutional provision, our inquiry does not end when such a condition is presented on appeal. We must examine the record, not alone for the purpose of determining whether the jury could have arrived at a different result, but also to weigh the probabilities of whether or not the error had in fact worked a miscarriage of justice. It was said in People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 65, 130 Pac. 1042, 1046, discussing this provision of the Constitution:

"This much, however, we think may be safely said. Section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution must be given at least the effect of abrogating the old rule that prejudice is presumed from any error of law. Where error is shown it is the duty of the court to examine the evidence and ascertain from such examination whether the error did or did not in fact work any injury. The mere fact of error does not make out a prima facie case for reversal which must be overcome by a clear showing that no injury could have resulted. * * *

"The final test is the opinion of the appellate court upon the result of the error. No doubt this view requires the court, to some extent, to weigh the evidence, and form conclusions upon its weight—a function which, heretofore, has been reserved for the jury. But it cannot be doubted that the legislators, in proposing the amendment, and the electors, in adopting it, intended to put upon the courts the performance of just that function. We are not substituted for the jury. We are not to determine, as an original inquiry, the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence. But, where the jury has found him guilty, we must, upon a review of the entire record, decide whether, in our judgment, any error committed has led to the verdict which was reached. If it appears to our satisfaction that the result was just, and that it would have been reached if the error had not been committed, a new trial is not to be ordered."

It does not follow, therefore, that it is sufficient to justify a reversal upon the ground the instruction was prejudicially erroneous that the evidence is in conflict and would sustain a contrary finding; it is the duty of the court to examine the record, including the evidence, in order to determine whether the error actually worked any injury, the burden of showing prejudice being on the party asserting the error.

In my opinion it is altogether improbable that the error affected the verdict. Briefly summarized, the evidence on behalf of the people was to the effect that before the fatal meeting Doane telephoned Bowers, requesting him to go to Venice and give notice that a bond on appeal had been filed, staying execution of the judgment under which Graydon held possession of the property. Bowers thereupon got appellant and proceeded to the house, where the shooting occurred. It appeared that both Bowers and appellant had previously taken sides in the dispute between the Doanes and the Graydons over the right to the possession of the premises; that appellant had once before accompanied Mrs. Doane to the house while Mrs. Graydon was there, and had taken an active part in the argument which ensued. The evidence shows that on the occasion in question Bowers and appellant arrived at the house and called to the Graydons, who were inside, knocking on the windows and the door and using profane language; that Mrs. Graydon left and went to the police station to secure help, but was unsuccessful, and secured a taxicab to take her home; that she endeavored to purchase a revolver at a hardware store, but was unable to do so; that Graydon informed Mrs. Doane, after the latter arrived on the scene, that a mistake had been made, and that he and his wife were leaving; that meanwhile Mr. Doane entered the house, and that Mrs. Doane called out to the others to come on in.

The testimony of both the taxicab driver and Mrs. Graydon is to the effect that appellant immediately struck Graydon over the head with something which Mrs. Graydon said was similar to the blackjack afterwards found in appellant's handbag. It was testified that Bowers also proceeded to attack Graydon, and that in a moment the three men were struggling outside the door, Graydon against Bowers and Doane, with Graydon trying to defend himself. Mrs. Graydon endeavored to go to the assistance of her husband, but was struck over the head by appellant. Recovering herself, she went into the house and procured what she said was a bill file, with which she struck appellant over the head. The struggle progressed to a point where Graydon was on his knees. He had been standing facing the porch, and his hands were held to his back, Mrs. Doane and Bowers in front of him and Doane behind him. His eyes were closed as he sank to his knees. At this point appellant went behind Graydon while he was being held by Bowers and Doane, holding a blue revolver in both hands, and, standing close to him, shot him in the back. This testimony was corroborated by Mrs. Graydon and the taxicab driver. There was evidence that before the shooting Graydon's head and face had been struck with hard instruments which caused abrasions, bruises, and blackened spots. A neighbor from her home close by heard Bowers say, immediately after the shot was fired, "You ——— ———, if that don't finish you, I have something that will." The same witness testified that Bowers, who was still behind Graydon, picked something up off the lawn, and that he and appellant went around behind the house. The revolver was never found.

When the police arrived in response to a summons by Mrs. Graydon and her sister, they found appellant and Bowers in the automobile, the engine of which had been started. The former had the blackjack in her handbag and the latter had the brass knuckles in his pocket, which articles they told the officers they had taken from the Graydons. A woman who lived in the neighborhood had searched the automobile, but found no weapon nor ammunition of any kind. Another witness testified that a short time later Doane went to the automobile. Following this, the police searched the car and found several cartridges under the floor mat. Bowers' son testified that the previous Sunday he heard his father say to appellant, with reference to Graydon, that "his hours are numbered," that appellant had said Graydon would "get his," and that on that occasion Bowers had a blue revolver in his possession. Another son of Bowers testified that several years prior to the trial Bowers had kept a pair of brass knuckles. It may be observed that of those present the disinterested witnesses testified in favor of the prosecution, and that there was no altercation until Bowers and appellant appeared.

It is inconceivable to me that a slip in the instructions as to the measure of proof, involving a distinction which even those learned in the law might fail to notice when stated in the course of a long charge, contributed to the verdict. The jury undoubtedly concluded that appellant and Bowers were vicious meddlers, who injected themselves into the legal dispute between Graydon and Doane. I think that what was said by the District Court of Appeal in the case of the codefendant Bowers (Cal. App.) 204 Pac. 548, concerning the part he and appellant played in the controversy between Graydon and the Doanes, is equally justified by the record in this case. That opinion says:

"Both Bowers and Maybelle Roe, and especially the latter, seem from the evidence to have adopted the Doane-Graydon controversy as personal to themselves. So far as can be learned from any of the evidence, neither Bowers nor Maybelle Roe had any interest whatsoever in the Doane house or any lease made by Mrs. Doane. * * * It was appellant's statement given at the trial that on the day of the affray he took Maybelle Roe with him because she was not feeling well and needed the fresh air. Subsequent developments showed that for a person in enfeebled health Maybelle Roe was capable of great physical activity, for on the occasion of this second controversy, which resulted fatally to Graydon, her participation therein was of the more deadly consequence. That she and appellant Bowers acted with mutual intent and like purposes no reasoning mind can doubt upon examination of the record here exhibited, and by that record it is shown plainly enough that had it not been for the presence and acts of Bowers and Maybelle Roe the controversy between the Doanes and Graydons as to the possession of the house would have been settled in a peaceful way, unaccompanied by the tragedy which occurred."

The jury passed on the respective stories concerning the tragedy, and in view of the verdict of murder in the first degree it must be presumed they accepted the version of the witnesses for the prosecution. Upon this hypothesis the jury must necessarily have concluded that a foul murder had been committed, and utterly rejected the claim of the defense that appellant killed Graydon in order to save Bowers' life. Clearly it was either a deliberate murder or a justifiable homicide. Indeed, as pointed out in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal herein, the testimony of appellant herself as to her purpose in firing the shot was equivocal to say the least. I quote:

"While asserting on direct examination that she committed the act in defense of Bowers, she, on cross-examination, in response to the question, 'Well, why did you fire the shot?' stated: 'Because he was killing Mr. Bowers.' And in reply to the question, 'Because who was killing Mr. Bowers?' answered, 'Mr. Graydon.' In response to further questions by the district attorney, she stated: 'I don't know why I fired it. No, I did not fire it at Mr. Graydon; I never fired it at Mr. Graydon.'"

In view of the verdict, the jury could have given no credence to the story of the defense that, with Bowers standing over Graydon, Doane struggling against him, and appellant standing close by armed and ready to intervene, Graydon was able to throw Bowers to the ground and succeed in choking him by pulling at his necktie. It is plain to me that the jury regarded this as a fabricated defense; that they believed there was absolutely no occasion for killing Graydon, but that the killing was a part of the original conspiracy against him. Upon no hypothesis should it be held that the testimony of the defense was of sufficient weight to have created a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to the guilt of appellant, even though they had been properly instructed on the measure of proof. In other words, it could have made no difference to the jury, even if they observed the distinction between the terms "preponderance of the evidence" and "sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt," which one was used. In my opinion it is improbable that the verdict was affected by any nice question of the quantum of proof, but that the jury concluded the entire defense was destitute of merit. I can hardly believe that the jury was so undecided as to the effect of the evidence that if the rule had been correctly stated to them they would have held appellant guiltless. This is the second jury that has accepted the theory of the prosecution, and in my opinion no other jury would reach a different conclusion on the evidence. The judgment should be affirmed.

UNION TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. v. COLEMAN et al.

Wills ⊜682(1) — Child of beneficiary under trust provision entitled to withdraw from corpus of estate amount equal to withdrawal of other beneficiary.

Where a testator left his entire property in trust during the lives of his widow and the survivor of his two sons, the estate ultimately to vest in the heirs of his sons, 80 per cent. of the income after the death of the widow to be equally divided between these two sons with a power in each son to make certain withdrawals of the corpus of the estate, and providing that in case only one son exercised this power the trustee was to open a separate account with the other son and reinvest an amount equal to such withdrawal for the separate account of this son, "or his heirs and representatives," and one son exercised this power after the death of the other son, who left a child him surviving, that child was entitled to withdraw an amount equal to the withdrawals of the son.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William T. Coleman, deceased. Petition by the Union Trust Company of San Francisco as trustee, for instructions as to a partial distribution of trust funds between William T. Coleman and others, heirs of decedent. From an order directing such distribution, Robert L. Coleman and certain of the heirs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

M. F. Michael and Lloyd Baldwin, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Heller, Powers & Ehrman, Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, and Allen G. Wright, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

MYERS, Justice pro tem. Three separate appeals are here involved, each being from a separate order of the trial court in probate. Two of the orders appealed from are brief, informal minute entries, the substance of which is embodied in the third, a formal order of court signed by the judge and entered at length in the minutes. It is apparent that the determination of the appeal from the complete formal order will be determinative of the three appeals, and the parties have so stipulated. The single question here involved concerns the correct construction to be placed upon certain terms of the will as defining the respective rights of the parties in a contingency which has arisen, and the duties of the trustee with relation thereto.

The testator, William T. Coleman, died November 22, 1893, leaving a last will dated August 28, 1893, which was thereafter admitted to probate, the estate duly administered, and, on April 30, 1895, distributed to the Union Trust Company as trustee, by decree of final distribution, pursuant to the provisions of the will. The testator left him surviving his widow, a son, Robert L. Coleman, then unmarried, a son, Carlton C. Coleman, who had been married and was then divorced, and the latter's son, William T. Coleman, Jr., then about nine years of age. The son, Carlton C. Coleman, died in October, 1895, leaving his son, William T. Coleman, Jr. (respondent herein), surviving; and the testator's widow died in May, 1896. The son, Robert L. Coleman, married after the death of the testator, and had by that marriage a son and daughter, who with himself are the appellants herein; his wife having since died. Thus the sole members of the testator's family now surviving are a son and two grandchildren, appellants herein, and a grandchild by the deceased son, respondent herein.

The provisions of the will are here set forth at considerable length, in order that all the terms and expressions thereof which may shed any light upon the question of testamentary intent here at issue may be revealed. They are as follows:

"Having from my youth gladly shared my means and earnings with my sisters and brother, increasing and afterwards extending those aids to their children well through life, and helping many others of my relations, I feel that I have in all their behalf done my whole duty.

"Having also with a free hand continuously and pleasurably aided many public and private charities, gratuities, reliefs, promotions and benefactions, I think I have done my full duty in all of that regard also, and should now devote the remainder of my holdings exclusively to the support and uses of my wife and children.

"To that end I hereby give, devise and bequeath unto the Union Trust Company of San Francisco, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of California and having its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, in said state, all my properties, real, personal and mixed and wheresoever situate—in trust, however, and only in trust upon the conditions, trusts, terms and provisions and for the time or times hereinafter set forth.

"A. To pay (subject to B next hereinafter) monthly, if convenient, or at least semiannually, to my wife, Carrie M. P. Coleman, eighty (80) per cent. of the income thereof and with the remaining twenty (20) per cent. to create a fund or reserve fund to be used as hereinafter directed. My said wife shall have such eighty (80) per cent. for her own uses and for the legitimate and ordinary expenses of my sons—the discretion in which regard I leave with confidence to her motherly care.

"B. I desire, provide and direct, as soon as my estate will conveniently and advantageously admit it, and upon the request or assent of my said wife, that each of my sons Carlton C. Coleman and Robert L. Coleman, separately and for his individual account and self, receive and have fifty thousand ($50,000.00) dollars (that is, one hundred thousand [$100,000.00] dollars, gross, to be equally divided between the two), to be so received in part or whole amount if they so choose, in real estate at fair valuations, or in any of my paper securities, at the market values, or in cash, in installments or in lump, according to the convenience of my executors or trustees, and without prejudice to my other properties, and so that the said sons shall each, within reasonably short time, receive fifty thousand dollars as his own separate right, and under his own individual control, with which to begin a business life of his own choosing and in his own way. This I hope will be invested carefully and judiciously by them and each of them, and with prudence and economy and increased by industry be the basis of independent fortunes to each; for this is, and will be, all they are for a long time to receive directly from my estate, except as hereafter set forth, as their portions coming eventually from the estate, their fixed shares of the incomes thereof, and it is enough.

"C. The net revenue of all the rest and remainder of my estate, whatever it be, and wherever and howsoever situate, goes to my wife, Carrie M. P. Coleman (as above set forth) to be by her enjoyed, income and interest, according to her sweet pleasure through life, without let or hindrance and without any accounting to any court or tribunal or to any person or power on earth now or after. Then at and after her death, all then remaining of my estate shall remain in said trustee and trust, as hereinafter provided and said trustee, and its successors, shall hold and administer such estate and the fruits and incomes thereon during the lives of my said sons, Carlton C. Coleman and Robert L. Coleman, and annually, quarterly or monthly, if it may be more convenient, pay to them, and each of said sons or their heirs and proper representatives (until both of said sons shall die, but no longer) of them forty (40) per cent. or two-fifth parts of the net incomes or revenues of the said estate, and the remaining twenty (20) per cent. or one-fifth go to or remain with the body and bulk of the estate (to create said fund or reserve fund hereinbefore mentioned), and be held by my executor or trustee as a reserve and safety fund to cover contingencies of extraordinary needs or unusual damages to properties (by fires, or earthquakes, or by exceptional shortages in rents or other income, or resulting from war, epidemic, or other calamity or catastrophe); and also so as to provide for and insure funds for full and perfect betterments and maintenance, as nearly as can be, of all buildings and properties requiring maintenance and betterment (and additions even, if very desirable, but, all ordinary repairs to buildings shall be paid for monthly, and be a part of current expenses, as are taxes, insurance and commissions, independent of, and in no event be drawn from, the reserve fund, if avoidable; so that my properties shall never be allowed to deteriorate and suffer for want of good care. That is to say in brief, my trustee shall divide the net income into five parts, reserving and reinvesting at least one-fifth part, and distributing not exceeding the four-fifths to and between the boys as above and as hereinafter directed.

"And if either of my sons, viz.: Carlton C. Coleman or Robert L. Coleman, should die without legal issue him surviving, but should leave a widow him surviving, then (after the death of my said wife) five per cent. of the net incomes of the whole trust property shall (during the life of my other son) be paid to her; and all the balance of the share and interest in my estate of the son so first dying shall go for the benefit of his brother surviving him to the same trust hereby created, subject, however, to the further provisions hereinafter in this will contained with reference to and for the benefit of the respective widows of my said sons, respectively, if either shall leave a lawful wife him surviving.

"While I have in the above set apart twenty (20) per cent. or one-fifth of the net income of my property to be retained, reserved and reinvested, by my trustees during the said trust; yet to cover contingencies of the possible needs of the beneficiaries under adverse circumstances, and to give them the benefit of more of my estate, if they should really need it, I make this a modifying, yet positive, provision, that: If at the end of five years either or both of my sons should require or desire it, and so express their desires in writing, my trustee is authorized and directed to pay to each or either one of them for his account, a sum equal to five per cent. of his or their share or shares of all the properties held by the trustee; and, at or about the end of each five years thereafter, through their lifetime, they, the said sons, shall be enabled and authorized to draw from the principal, as well as interest accumulated an additional five per cent., or one-twentieth part of the whole of their share of property then remaining and existing and of reserved interest, which will, to that extent, be equal to one per cent. per annum, and so far reduce the bulk of the estate as well as the accumulated reserve fund (if any there be then remaining unused). This is independent of, and separate from the forty per cent. or four-tenths of the annual net income which they shall have been receiving from year to year; but if one of my sons should make withdrawals under this provision and the other should not, then I request and direct my trustee to open a separate account with my son who has not so withdrawn this allowed portion, and reinvest it and all such, for the separate account of his individual self, or his heirs and representatives, managing this account and its accumulations, in same manner and same terms as any other ward client, the other brother having no rights, share or interest therein except perhaps as an ultimate heir thereto." (These italics ours.)

Then follow various directions to the trustee concerning the management of the property, and the will proceeds:

"The reservations or future distributions of my property have extended thus far mainly to my sons (and in part to the surviving widow of the son first dying) but after the death of both of my said sons I give, devise and bequeath all the remainder of said trust estate immediately and at once in absolute fee simple and without limitation, restraint or restriction or trust or condition of any kind, as follows, to wit: One twentieth or five (5) per cent. thereof each to the widows (then living) of my said sons, if either of them shall leave a wife him surviving and such wife shall be living after the death of both of my said sons (but this provision is personal to such widow or widows and on the condition that neither they nor either of them can take unless living after the death of both of my said sons and that no one can take for them, or either of them, by right of representation), and all the rest, residue and remainder (and those words 'rest, residue and remainder' mean and shall mean in every case and instance what remains of said trust estate after such payment to said living widows, or widow, if any; and if there be no such living widows or widow, then such words mean and shall mean all said trust estate) to the heirs of my said sons (per stirpes and not per capita) born in ceremonial wedlock; and I direct the immediate and unlimited grant, transfer and delivery by such trustee, or its successors as and when above provided."

Then follow provisions for the distribution of the estate in the event of both sons dying "without such heirs as are hereinabove mentioned surviving them."

It will be noted that the testator left his entire estate in trust for the term of the lives of his widow and two sons and the survivor of them. Of the income, 20 per cent. was to be set aside throughout the term of the trust, as a reserve fund for the protection of the estate. The remaining 80 per cent. was to go to the widow during her life; and thereafter one-half thereof to each of said sons, "or their heirs and proper representatives." Upon the termination of the trust, the entire estate (except in the contingency of surviving widows of the testator's sons, which did not arise) is to go "to the heirs of my said sons (per stirpes and not per capita) born in ceremonial wedlock." The question here involved arises directly under the portion which we have italicized of the "modifying, yet positive provision" above set forth.

In 1906, acting under authority of this provision, Robert L. Coleman applied to the trustee in writing for 5 per cent. of one-half of the trust fund. This was promptly paid to him by the trustee, in the sum of $10,000, and at the same time the trustee transferred a like amount from the trust fund to a special trust fund for the benefit of William T. Coleman, Jr. This same procedure was repeated twice thereafter, at approximate five-year intervals, with the result that the trustee has paid over to Robert L. Coleman $30,000 from the trust fund, and has transferred therefrom a like amount to a special trust fund for William T. Coleman, Jr. Thereafter the latter applied to the trustee to pay over to him the $30,000 so held by it, and it, being uncertain as to its duty in the premises, filed in the superior court its petition for instructions. All of the interested parties appeared in response thereto, and presented their respective contentions by appropriate pleadings. A hearing was had, resulting finally in the orders from which these appeals are prosecuted, wherein the trial court determined that William T. Coleman, Jr., was entitled to the fund in controversy.

All of the parties hereto, being desirous that this controversy shall be determined solely upon the merits and in accordance with the intention of the testator as expressed in his will, have stipulated that the determination thereof shall be wholly freed from and uninfluenced by any questions of estoppel or waiver or res judicata arising out of any past actions of the parties or the trustee, or any preceding orders of the trial court; and we shall so consider it.

If Carlton C. Coleman had been living at the times of the several 5 per cent. withdrawals by Robert L. Coleman, there could be no doubt as to the duty of the trustee to make a like withdrawal for the benefit of Carlton upon each such occasion. Appealants' contention is that this provision was made by the testator solely for the personal benefit and protection of his two sons, and that no other person can rightly claim any benefit therefrom, or any right thereunder; that the words of donation therein are found in the direction "to open a separate account with my son"; and that the direction to "reinvest it and all such for the separate account of his individual self, or his heirs and representatives," should be construed as if it read "and his heirs and representatives," and that so construed it is merely analogous to the habendum clause in a deed, descriptive of the interest of the grantee in the property so conveyed to him.

The respondent contends that the phrase, "for the separate account of his individual self, or his heirs and representatives," relates to and defines the purpose of the entire direction to the trustee embodied in the italicized words; that by the expression "reinvest it" the testator meant "transfer it from the general trust fund into a special trust fund, for the benefit of such other brother, or if he be dead, then for the benefit of his heirs and representatives." So construed, the words of donation, being found in the expression "reinvest it," inure to the benefit of the other brother, if living, and to his heirs, if he be dead.

Counsel on both sides have furnished the court with a most able, exhaustive, and searching analysis of the words, phrases, and provisions of the will. Numerous authorities are cited, but, as has been frequently reiterated "except for the establishment of general principles, very little aid can be procured from adjudged cases in the construction of wills." This is particularly true when, as here, the will was drafted by a layman without direct assistance from a lawyer. It does not seem highly probable, for instance, that the testator, a layman, by the use of the phrase, "or his heirs," intended thereby merely to create an habendum clause which would operate solely to define as absolute the estate thus bequeathed to his son in money or securities. This becomes more apparent when we note that in making provision for possible surviving widows of his sons the testator added the following explanation:

"But this provision is personal to such widow or widows and on the condition that neither they nor either of them can take unless living after the death of both of my sons and that no one can take for them, or either of them, by right of representation."

The general rules of interpretation of wills were well summarized by the present Chief Justice, speaking for this court in Estate of Peabody, 154 Cal. 173, 97 Pac. 184, as follows:

"The important thing is the intention of the testator. Section 1317. This is to be ascertained from the words of the will, taking into view the circumstances under which it was made. Section 1318. All parts of the will are to be considered in relation to each other so as to form, if possible, a consistent whole. Section 1321. Words are to be taken in their ordinary grammatical sense, unless a clear intent to use them otherwise is apparent and that sense can be ascertained. Section 1324. Technical words are not to be taken in their technical sense if it satisfactorily appears that the will was drawn solely by the testator, and that he was unacquainted with such technical sense. Section 1327. 'A technical construction of words and phrases, although prima facie the one which should prevail, will not go to the extent of defeating any obvious general intention of the testator, since wills are often prepared by those wholly unacquainted with the precise technical force of legal formulas.'"

Considering the entire will in the light of the foregoing rules, we note that the income during the term of the trust was to be divided equally between the two branches of the family represented by the two sons, and that this rule of division should apply after the death of one son the same as before; that upon the termination of the trust the corpus of the estate is to be equally divided between these two branches of the family, "per stirpes and not per capita." There is no room for doubt that the testator understood the difference between a division per stirpes and a division per capita. Neither is there any room for doubt that he understood and had in mind while drafting this will that a bequest might go to the heirs or representatives of a deceased legatee, if a contrary intention was not made apparent in the will. He made such contrary intention clearly apparent in his provision for the sons' widows, but he did not do so in the provision here under consideration.

Remembering that this will was drafted by a layman, a business man, the construction contended for by respondent seems the more natural, reasonable, and in accordance with "common sense." When we consider further that it harmonizes completely with the "obvious general intention of the testator," and that the construction suggested by appellants would be quite out of harmony therewith, we are impelled to the conclusion that the decision of the trial court was correct.

Section 1322 of the Civil Code does not appear to be applicable here, because this is not a case of "a clear and distinct devise or bequest," as affected "by any other words not equally clear and distinct, or by inference or argument from other parts of the will."

Appellants make certain criticisms of the language used in the formal order appealed from, which are well founded. The phrase, "said Robert L. Coleman having no rights, share or interest therein or thereto," should be modified by the insertion immediately following it of the words, "except perhaps as an ultimate heir thereto," as found in the will. The words of paragraph 7 thereof, "that the said decree of final distribution herein be modified and supplemented accordingly," are not a necessary part of the order, and might well have been omitted therefrom. But in view of the stipulation entered into by all parties interested herein no error can be justly claimed here because of their inclusion.

It is ordered that the "formal order" appealed from be modified by the insertion therein of the words above indicated; that as so modified it stand affirmed; that the two informal orders appealed from be affirmed; that respondent have and recover his costs of appeal herein.

GARIBALDI v. ZEMANSKY, Registrar of Voters. (S. F. 10399.)

1. Elections ⟸170—On ballot to elect five justices of the peace, there should be one blank under name of majority candidate, and four blanks under names of remaining nominees.

Though Primary Election Law, § 23, does not provide for blank spaces under the names of majority candidates, required to be printed separately under a designation to vote for a number equal to the candidates receiving a majority at the primary, the General Election Law (Pol. Code, §§ 1196, 1197, 1203, 1205, 1206, 1211) not only provides for printing on the ballot blanks equal to the number of offices to be filled, but for instructions to voters to write the name of a person not on the ballot in the blank space provided, so that it is essential to print a blank space wherein the voter may write in the name of his choice for every office, and the Constitution provides as to officers therein named that the election shall be on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, the same day on which Code Civ. Proc. § 85, provides justices of the peace shall be elected, and hence there should be blank spaces under the names of majority candidates equal to their number, and under the second group a number of blanks equal to the number of offices to be filled after deducting the number in the majority group, and so, where, at a primary election to nominate five justices, one only received a majority, and eight others the next highest vote, there should be one blank under the name of the majority candidate, and four blanks under the names of the remaining nominees.

2. Elections ⟸173—Majority candidate or candidates required to be separately grouped on ballot not to be so designated by words over name or names in such group.

Though Primary Election Law, § 23, designates candidates receiving a majority as majority candidates, and provides for separately grouping such candidates on the ballot at the general election, the words "Majority Candidate," "Majority Candidates," or "Majority Group," should not be printed over the name or names in such group.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Virgil J. Garibaldi, to be directed to J. H. Zemansky, as Registrar of Voters, City and County of San Francisco, requiring him to print a blank space on the ballot following the name of Frank T. Deasy, majority candidate for Justice of the Peace, and omit from the ballot over the latter's name the words "Majority Candidate." Writ granted.

Robert W. Harrison, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

George Lull, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1] Mandamus. At the primary election held on August 29, 1922, five justices of the peace were to be nominated in the city and county of San Francisco. Frank T. Deasy only received a majority of the vote cast at the election for justices of the peace, and James G. Conlin, A. T. Barnett, Thomas F. Prendergast, Rolla B. Watt, Frank W. Dunn, James Carroll, Joseph Golden, and M. J. Sullivan received the next highest vote.

Section 23 of the Primary Election Law of 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1217), provides that the candidate or candidates receiving a majority of all the votes cast under such circumstances shall be printed separately under a designation, "Vote for One," or two, or more; such number to be equal in number to the candidates receiving a majority vote. If one candidate receives a majority vote, the direction is to "Vote for One"; if two, to "Vote for Two," and so on. The Primary Election Law makes no special provision in regard to blank spaces under the names of the persons receiving a majority vote at the primary, and no form of ballot to be used at the general election is printed therein, conforming to the amendments of 1921. Therefore, if the Primary Election Law was alone considered, it might justify the conclusion that there should be no blank spaces under the names of the majority candidates; but the General Election Act not only provides for the printing upon the ballot of blanks equal to the number of offices to be filled, but also specifically provides that the instructions to voters shall direct that, where the voter wishes to vote for the person whose name is not printed upon the ballot, he shall do so by writing the name in the blank space thereon provided. Sections 1196, 1197, 1203, 1205, 1206, and 1211, Pol. Code. In order that these directions may be followed, it is essential that there shall be printed on the ballot a blank space wherein the voter may write in the name of his choice for every office. The effect of the Primary Election Law (section 23), so far as the method of voting is concerned, is to designate separate offices equal in number to the majority candidates, leaving the remainder of the justices (minority candidates) to be elected to separate and distinct offices.

Another consideration leads to the same conclusion. The Primary Election Law devises a scheme for the nomination of candidates who are to be voted upon at the general election. If the voter is deprived of writing in a name of a candidate in opposition to the candidate nominated at the primary election, the effect is to make the nomination an election; whereas, the Constitution provides, with reference to the offices therein named, that the election shall be on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, and the law providing for the office of justice of the peace provides that they shall be elected on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November. Section 85, Code Civ. Proc. It follows that there should be blank spaces under the names of majority candidates equal to the number of such candidates, and that under the second group there shall be printed a number of blanks equal to the number of offices to be filled after deducting the number in the majority group. In this case there should be one blank under the name of Frank T. Deasy, and four blanks under the names of the remaining nominees.

[2] The petitioner claims that the respondent intends to print the words "Majority Candidate," "Majority Candidates" and "Majority Group" over the names receiving the majority of all the votes cast; that is to say, in this case, over the name of Frank T. Deasy. It is true that the statute designates the candidates receiving a majority of the votes cast at the primary as "majority candidates"; but it is apparent that this language is used as a matter of convenience in expressing the intention of the Legislature, and not for the purpose of designating them as such upon the ballot. After designating the majority candidates or majority group, the statute provides as follows:

"Said group on the ballot being preceded by the designation of the office and the words 'Vote for ——,' the blank being filled by a number equal to the number of names in such 'majority group'; and in addition to the 'majority group' there shall be printed on the ballot in a separate group, and separated from such 'majority group.' * * *"

According to this provision the name of Frank T. Deasy should be preceded by the designation of the office, to wit, "Justice of the Peace," and the words "Vote for One."

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

WILBUR, Acting C. J., LENNON, LAWLOR, and WASTE, JJ., and RICHARDS, Justice pro tem., concur.

AKLEY et al. v. BASSETT et al. (L. A. 6904.)

1. Judgment ⟸394—Court may vacate judgment inconsistent with findings, but cannot on motion to vacate change findings of fact.

While the Superior Court may, on motion, under Code Civ. Proc. § 663, vacate a judgment inconsistent with, and not supported by, the findings of fact, that section merely authorizes the substitution of the judgment that should have been given as a matter of law upon the facts found, and the court cannot, on such motion, change any findings of fact.

2. Deeds ⟸128—Rule in Shelley's Case inapplicable to remainder to grantee's heirs under state law.

A deed to the grantee for life, with remainder to his legal heirs according to the state law in fee simple but not to his testamentary heirs and devisees so as to contradict, impair, avoid, or vary the remainder, held not within the rule in Shelley's Case, which was in force in California only until January 1, 1873, when it was abolished by Civ. Code, § 779.

3. Appeal and error ⟸907(3)—Findings held conclusive on appeal on judgment roll alone.

Where an appeal is on the judgment roll alone, the appellate court must accept the findings, notwithstanding that the record contains evidence thereon not in itself sufficient to support them.

4. Judgment ⟸485—Collateral attack proper, where admitted facts show judgment void.

Where the parties admit facts which show that a judgement in a former suit is void, or if they are established without objection, then the case is similar to one wherein the judgment is void upon its face and is subject to attack.

5. Infants ⟸89—Defective service on minor held not cured by appointment of guardian ad litem.

Code Civ. Proc. § 411, subd. 3, providing the manner in which service may be made upon a minor under 14 years, residing within the state, and also upon her father, mother, or guardian, or other person designated by the statute, being mandatory, failure to make complete service could not be cured by the appointment of a guardian ad litem, nor by the appearance of the persons enumerated, other than the minor, in their own behalf.

6. Adverse possession ⟸74—Claim under decree of distribution of estate of grantee in deeds conveying full ownership held color of title.

Where an occupant of land succeeded thereto under a claim founded on the title of his father, who had a deed implying full ownership, and under a decree of distribution in the father's estate, his entry and claim rested upon color of title within the five years' statute of limitation, under Code Civ. Proc. § 322.

7. Tenancy in common ⟸15(5)—When possession of tenant in common adverse to other cotenants stated.

When a tenant in common is in possession of the whole premises, and exercises acts of ownership of an unequivocal character, overt and notorious, and of such nature as, by their own import, to impart information and notice to his cotenants that an adverse possession and disseisin are intended to be asserted against them, his possession is adverse.

8. Tenancy in common ⟸14—Act of cotenant in exclusive possession manifesting intent to hold exclusively is an actual ouster.

Any act of a cotenant in the exclusive possession, which manifests an intention on his part to hold exclusively for himself is equivalent to an actual ouster.

9. Tenancy in common ⟸15(1)—When tenant in common acquires title by prescription stated.

A tenant in common who enters into actual possession under color of title, and who, with his predecessors in interest, has maintained possession and exercised acts of ownership openly and notoriously, claiming as against other tenants and paying taxes assessed thereon for more than five years prior to the commencement of an action against him, thereby acquires title by prescription under the statute of limitations.

10. Tenancy in common ⟸14—Rule of ouster by tenant in common inapplicable, where possession not instituted as such tenant.

When one enters avowedly as tenant in common with others, his possession is the possession of the others, so long as the tenancy in common is not disclaimed, and to constitute ouster there must be acts giving notice to the world of an intent to exclude the cotenants, but such rule is not applicable, where possession was neither avowedly begun as a tenant in common nor instituted under a deed defining his title as such.

11. Remainders ⟸17(3)—Possession of life tenant's grantee held ouster of remaindermen.

Where a life tenant conveyed realty to one who entered into possession and exercised acts of ownership, claiming the entire land for himself, such entry and possession passing to the grantee's heir constituted an ouster of all persons claiming an interest as remaindermen and was such a disseisin as to set the statute of prescription in motion against them, at and from the time they had a right of entry.

12. Life estates ⟸8—Life tenant cannot make his own or his grantee's possession adverse to remaindermen during life estate.

A life tenant cannot, by his dealings with a life estate, make his own or his grantee's possession adverse to the remaindermen, so as to start the statute of limitations against them during the life estate.

13. Tenancy in common ⟸15(4)—Effect of ouster of infant stated.

Ouster of an infant by a cotenant sets the statute of limitations running in favor of the disseisor, but protection is given the infant by the provision of the statute that the adverse holding must continue from that date until the expiration of five years from his attaining majority.

14. Partition ⟸44—Limitations available to establish interest in property.

The statute of limitations may be resorted to in an action of partition, so far as it establishes an interest in the property, notwithstanding that the action for partition between tenants in common is not barred by lapse of time.

15. Adverse possession ⟸3—Statutory provisions as to title by prescription construed.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 318, 319, prescribing seizin within five years before the commencement of an action as a necessary condition to its maintenance, affect only the remedy but not the right itself, while Civ. Code, § 1007, pertaining to the acquisition of title by prescription, confers a substantive right.

16. Limitation of actions ⟸77—Time within which disseized minor must bring action stated.

Where a tenant in common was ousted from possession while a minor, such tenant had, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 318, 319, and 328, five years after his right accrued within which to bring an action either for the recovery of the land or for the land or possession thereof, or for the rents and the profits, and, under section 351, such period is extended by the time of defendant's absence from the state.

17. Tenancy in common ⟸38(5)—Delay of 17 years held laches barring action for recovery of possession.

Where a dispossessed tenant in common might have instituted a suit for recovery of possession in 1901, but failed to bring action until 1918, the cause of action was barred by laches.

18. Partition ⟸10—Action equitable in nature under Code.

Under the Code an action of partition is in its nature and essence equitable.

19. Equity ⟸75—Good faith and diligence must be shown after great lapse of time without assertion of claim.

It devolves on one seeking the aid of equity, where the complaint discloses a great lapse of time without assertion of any claim, and after long-continued acquiescence in acts hostile to the claim, to show circumstances indicating good faith and reasonable diligence.

20. Appeal and error ⟸1009(1)—Whether remedy barred by laches question for trial court.

A party is not to be held barred from his remedy for a wrong, on the ground that he has been guilty of laches, unless his delay in bringing action has been of such length and under such circumstances that it would be inequitable to enter into an inquiry as to the validity of his claim, or to allow such remedy, and the question is in the first instance for the trial court and, if his conclusion is supported by evidence, an appellate court will not interfere therewith.

21. Equity ⟸88—Laches need not be pleaded.

The defense of laches need not be pleaded, but when it appears from the evidence that the seeker of relief in equity has been guilty of laches, the court will deny such relief sua sponte.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Josephine M. Akley and others against Charles N. Bassett and another. On motion of plaintiff named, a judgment in favor of defendant named was set aside and judgment of partition ordered, and, from the order granting the motion and from the substituted judgment, defendant named appeals. Order and judgment reversed.

Millard Patterson and Donald Barker, both of Los Angeles (Wm. H. Neblett, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Robert B. Murphy, Daniel Hunsaker, and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, J. This action was commenced by the respondent Josephine M. Akley and several others for the partition of 814 acres of land, situated about 15 miles from the city of Los Angeles, being a part of the Rancho La Puente, and to recover from the defendant Charles N. Bassett, who is the appellant here, their respective proportionate shares of the rents, issues, and profits of the alleged common property, received and retained by him.

The defendant appeals from an order of the trial court, granting the motion of the plaintiff Josephine M. Akley to set aside the judgment theretofore entered against her and in favor of defendant Bassett, and entering another and different judgment, and from the judgment entered following such order.

The findings of fact and conclusions of law, as first made, the records, pleadings, and files of the cause on which the motion below was considered, the "amended and corrected conclusions of law," on which the different judgment was based, and the judgment itself—all constituting the judgment roll in the cause—are brought here on a stipulated and duly allowed bill of exceptions, from which we have collated the pertinent facts.

By a deed dated October 11, 1870, and recorded March 27, 1873, William Workman and wife deeded the property in question to Joseph M. Workman "for and during the term of his natural life; and upon the decease of him," the said Joseph M. Workman, "unto his legal heirs, according to the laws of the state of California respecting descents and distributions, and their heirs and assigns to and for their sole use, benefit, and behoof, in fee simple absolute forever; but not to the testamentary heirs and devisees of (Joseph M. Workman) in such manner as to contradict, impair, avoid, or vary the * * * declared and limited remainder." Joseph M. Workman, who was the father of Josephine M. Akley, the respondent on this appeal, on March 1, 1895, by a grant deed conveyed the property here in question to O. T. Bassett, father of Charles N. Bassett, the appellant. Immediately after the delivery of said deed to O. T. Bassett, he commenced an action entitled Bassett v. Thornton et al., in the superior court of Los Angeles county, against the plaintiff here and others, to quiet title to the land. The respondent was at that time a minor under the age of 14 years. She had no guardian legally appointed, but her father and mother were both alive. A copy of the summons in the action of Bassett v. Thornton was delivered to the respondent personally, but none was served in her behalf, or at all, on any guardian, or on her father or mother, as required by section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to service of summons on a minor litigant. At no time did respondent's father or mother or any guardian of her person or estate appear in said action in her behalf. It appears from the record that the court trying the cause made an order reciting that respondent and other defendants were minors, and appointing C. K. Holloway their guardian ad litem, to appear and defend the action in their behalf.

Thereafter, on the 25th day of June, 1895, judgment was entered in Bassett v. Thornton, adjudging and decreeing that said O. T. Bassett was the owner in fee simple absolute of the land, and that none of the defendants to that action, including plaintiffs here, had any estate or interest therein. They were, by the terms of the judgment, forever barred from asserting any claim in or to the said lands and premises adverse to O. T. Bassett. No appeal was perfected from said judgment, and in due time it became final. O. T. Bassett died intestate, January 1, 1898, leaving appellant surviving him as his sole heir at law. Such proceedings were thereupon had and taken for the administration of the estate of said O. T. Bassett that on the 20th day of October, 1900, the land described in the complaint in this action was distributed to this appellant, who has not parted with the interest or title derived thereby. Joseph M. Workman, father of the respondent, died March 13, 1901.

When O. T. Bassett acquired the title to the land, by the deed from respondent's father, he entered into immediate possession and at once proceeded to develop the tract for subdivision and sale. He occupied, tilled, and cultivated the land, dug wells, erected pumping plants for artificial irrigation of the soil, planted much of the tract to walnut trees, and to fruit trees of diversified kinds, and various crops, requiring artificial irrigation. The work of improvement was carried on openly and notoriously, and wide publicity was given thereto. Bassett also had prepared and filed for record a map designating the property as "Map of O. T. Bassett's Subdivision of the Workman Tract, being a part of the Rancho La Puente, etc.," with an indorsement thereon that he was the owner of the tract, and that the same was surveyed and subdivided at his request. Within three or four years after appellant succeeded to the estate of his father he began to sell different parcels of the land, and has sold to innocent purchasers, for value, all but 285.45 acres of the tract. These purchasers have erected dwelling houses on their respective holdings, and generally have gone forward with intensive improvement and development of the property. Such was the condition of affairs, and the relation of the parties (except that respondent Josephine M. Akley became of legal age January 13, 1901), when this action was commenced on the 24th day of June, 1918.

The original complaint is in the usual form for partition actions, and therein the respondent alleged that each of the plaintiffs and the defendants Charles N. Bassett and Ida L. Kelso were and had been since March 13, 1901, the date of the death of Joseph M. Workman, the owners in fee simple, and in possession, of the premises described, as tenants in common; that the defendant Charles N. Bassett had "collected, received, obtained, and kept" all of the "rents, issues, and profits" of said real property in an amount "in excess of the sum of $1,000,000"; that said defendant Charles N. Bassett "has not resided in or been within the state of California since January 1, 1902, for periods of time aggregating four years"; and that he never appointed an agent upon whom process could be served. The complaint prayed that the interests of the parties be ascertained, that all adverse claims be determined and that the property be partitioned according to the rights of the parties; that the defendant Charles N. Bassett be compelled to account for the amount of the rents, issues, and profits "received from said real property," and that judgment be entered therefor against him.

On the 6th day of November, 1918, the defendant Charles N. Bassett filed his answer, the contents of which are not disclosed by the record, other than that it set up as defense the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton, obtained in 1895, and already referred to. Josephine M. Akley, whom we shall hereafter refer to as the respondent, thereupon filed an amendment to the complaint, alleging, in addition to the matters contained in the original pleading, certain facts tending to show that, as to her, the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton was wholly null and void, and not binding upon her, in that she was never served with process in the action, and the court never obtained jurisdiction over her in said cause. She further pleaded facts purporting to excuse her delay in bringing the action; also her total lack of knowledge until May, 1917, of said action of Bassett v. Thornton, or of the judgment rendered therein, or of her interest in the property, or of any facts connected therewith sufficient to put her upon inquiry, or of any facts at all connected with said matters; also the circumstances under which she then acquired knowledge thereof and why she did not learn of the same sooner, and the acts and steps taken by her subsequent thereto, and the absence of the defendant Bassett from the state of California. It was further alleged that defendant Bassett had sold to "innocent purchasers for value" all of said land except 285.45 acres, and that, in so far as such purchasers were concerned, the plaintiffs were not attempting to set aside said judgment, and waived, as to them, all right to the land they had bought. The prayer of the complaint was amended by requesting that the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton "be set aside and declared wholy null and void and of no effect whatsoever in so far as the plaintiff Josephine M. Akley is concerned," and that the defendant Charles N. Bassett be restrained from introducing said judgment in evidence against respondent, or claiming any rights thereunder as against her.

The defendant Bassett, whom we shall hereafter refer to as the appellant demurred to the complaint as amended, specifying as grounds of demurrer a want of sufficient facts, uncertainty and ambiguity, the bar of certain sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the laches of respondent precluded any right of recovery by the action. The demurrer was overruled, and appellant filed his answer. He denied, among other matters, respondent's alleged ownership in the property and the invalidity of the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton, and set up a number of affirmative defenses. These are: The conveyance of the property to his father by deed from Joseph M. Workman and wife, and the subsequent facts relating to, the history of, and the judgment in, Bassett v. Thornton, and the succession of the land to appellant through his father's estate; title to the land, as against certain of the plaintiffs other than the respondent, in O. T. Bassett, through mortgage foreclosure proceedings, and purchase at such sale by said Bassett, November 11, 1895; claim of title by adverse and exclusive possession, supported by allegations of continuous occupancy, improvement, cultivation, and use of the land, the payment of all taxes, and absence of any claim on the part of the plaintiffs or any of them; estoppel of the plaintiffs, through acquiescence after knowledge of the possession of the land by appellant's father, O. T. Bassett, appellant's succession in interest thereto, and of the sale by him of various parcels of the land, and of extensive and expensive improvements of the same by the Bassetts, and by the purchasers at such sales, without assertion of any right at any time by the plaintiffs; estoppel of the plaintiffs by reason of an agreement entered into in Bassett v. Thornton, dismissing the appeal in that action, and the acceptance of the benefits by the parties thereto, including the respondent. The bar of various provisions of the statute of limitations is also pleaded by way of separate defense.

After the trial and submission of the issues thus presented, the court made its findings and conclusions of law. Judgment was entered that appellant is the owner in fee simple absolute of the land in question, and that none of the other parties to the land, including the respondent, have any right, title, interest or estate whatsoever therein. Respondent, Josephine M. Akley, alone moved the court to vacate and set aside the judgment and to enter another and different judgment, under the provisions and procedure found in sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The motion was granted. By its "amended and corrected conclusions of law," another judge, sitting in place of the one who tried the case and made the findings, the lower court decided that the respondent and the appellant are tenants in common of the real property involved in the controversy, the former being declared to be the owner in fee simple of an undivided one-ninth interest, and the latter the owner of like title to the remaining eight-ninths of the land. It ordered judgment in partition, and allotment of the several portions of the property, quality and quantity relatively considered, according to the respective rights of respondent and appellant. It also directed judgment in favor of respondent against the appellant, in the sum of $109,302, with interest from the date of the commencement of the action, as respondent's share of the rents, issues, and profits derived from the land. The appeal from the order granting respondent's motion, and from the substituted judgment, brings the action of the trial court before us for consideration and review.

[1] While the superior court has jurisdiction on a proper motion made under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate a judgment as entered, which is inconsistent with, and not supported by the findings of fact, that section merely authorizes the substitution of the judgment that should have been given as a matter of law upon the facts found, and the court cannot, on such motion, change any finding of fact. Dahlberg v. Girsch, 157 Cal. 324, 326, 107 Pac. 616; Hole v. Takeawa, 165 Cal. 372, 376, 132 Pac. 445. Consequently, in the determination of this appeal we are restricted to the case made by the findings of fact in the lower court, considered in the light of the pleadings and the issues made thereby. If the first judgment was the correct legal conclusion upon the facts so found, the trial court had no right to vacate it and substitute a different judgment therefor. We are therefore brought to an analysis of the comprehensive and specific findings of the trial court.

As the foundation of her claim to an interest in the property in question, the respondent alleged, and the court found, that she succeeded to, and became the owner of, an undivided two-eighteenths interest in the land on the 13th day of March, 1901, upon, and by reason of, the death on that date, of her father, Joseph M. Workman, the grantee under the deed from William Workman. Appellant challenges this position, and asserts that, under the rule in Shelley's Case, the deed, which is set out in full in the findings, should have a construction favorable to him. His contention is that the deed, if delivered before January 1, 1873, vested in Joseph M. Workman a fee simple absolute in the land, his heirs taking no estate or interest in the property during his life, leaving him free to dispose of it to appellant's father, as if the deed contained no words purporting to transfer to him less than the fee. There are two reasons why appellant's contention must fail. The first is that he attempts to place an improper construction upon the language of the deed from William Workman to plaintiff's father, the material portions of which are as follows:

"The party of the first part, for and in consideration of the natural love and paternal affection by him borne toward the party of the second part, and for the worldly advantage and better maintenance and support of him, the party of the second part, and in provision for the lawful heirs of him, the party of the second part, hath given, granted, transferred, assigned and conveyed, and hereby doth give, grant, transfer, assign, convey and confirm unto the said party of the second part, with remainder as hereinafter specified and admitted the following described parcel of land: * * *

"To have and to hold the above granted and described premises with the appurtenances and the rents, issues and profits thereof unto the party of the second part, to and for his use and benefit, for and during the term of his natural life; and upon the decease of him, the party of the second part, unto his legal heirs, according to the laws of the state of California respecting descents and distribution, and their heirs and assigns to and for their sole and only use, benefit and behoof, in fee simple absolute forever; but not to testamentary heirs and devisees of the party of the second part, in such manner as to contradict, impair, avoid or vary the hereby declared and limited remainder." The words italicized by us were underlined in the original deed.

[2] The fundamental reason for the rule in Shelley's Case is so well stated, and the cases in which the use of apt language has taken deeds out of its application are so concisely reviewed, in Gordon v. Cadwalader, 164 Cal. 509, 513, 130 Pac. 18, that we refer to the opinion of the present chief justice in that case on this point, and refrain from discussing the subject more at length.

We are satisfied that the terms of the instrument remove it from the application of the rule in Shelley's Case, even though it had been delivered prior to January 1, 1873. Its language clearly indicates an intention on the part of the grantor to limit a life estate in Joseph M. Workman, and to vest a full estate in his legal heirs, according to the laws of the state of California respecting descents and distribution. Montgomery v. Sturdivant, 41 Cal. 290, 298; Gordon v. Cadwalader, supra. O. T. Bassett took no greater interest in the property than his grantor, Joseph M. Workman, had. It follows, therefore, that the deed from Joseph M. Workman to appellant's immediate predecessor did not serve to divest respondent of her future interest in the property, which vested upon the death of her father, on March 13, 1901.

The second answer to appellant's contention is that the rule in Shelley's Case was only in force in this state until January 1, 1873, when it was abolished by section 779 of the Civil Code. Gordon v. Cadwalader, supra. Although the instrument bears date, and was acknowledged, on October 11, 1870, the finding in this action is "that delivery of said deed was made to said Joseph M. Workman on the day of its recordation, to wit: March 27, 1873." In Bassett v. Thornton, the judgment roll of which action is embodied in the findings here, the court found that the deed was delivered "prior to the 1st day of January, 1873." Appellant takes the position that the matter of the recordation of the deed was therefore res adjudicata. We are not now concerned with the contention, for, whether that be so or not, the instrument, whenever delivered, is not subject to the construction appellant would have us place upon it.

For another reason, however, it is necessary for us to consider the adjudication in Bassett v. Thornton, the effect of which was to declare O. T. Bassett the owner in fee simple absolute of the real property, and that the defendants to the action, including the respondent had no estate or interest therein. Anticipating that the appellant would plead that judgment as a bar to her right to recover in this action, the respondent alleged that as to her, although she was nominally and to all intents a party to the action, the judgment therein was "wholly null and void, and of no force and effect whatsoever, and not binding upon" her, as she was not served with process, and the court never obtained any jurisdiction over her. The facts alleged by her in support of her contention, and found by the trial court to be true, are, briefly, these:

On March 1, 1895, said action of Bassett v. Thornton was commenced in the superior court of Los Angeles county, respondent, among others, being a defendant. On March 2, 1895, there was delivered to her, in person, a copy of the complaint and summons in said action, but, although she was at that time but little over 12 years of age, no copy of said summons and complaint were then, or at any time, served upon or delivered to either her father, or mother, or to any guardian of her person or estate, or to any of the persons designated in subdivision 3 of section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides the manner in which summons may be served upon a minor under the age of 14 years, residing within the state. None of the persons designated in that section ever appeared in the action of Bassett v. Thornton on behalf of respondent or for themselves, and she was not served with process in said action, otherwise than by delivering to her personally of a copy of the complaint and summons as before stated. During the pendency of the cause, the court made an order purporting to appoint C. K. Holloway as guardian ad litem of respondent and two other minor defendants. An answer was thereupon filed in the action by the defendants, the three minors purporting to appear and join therein by their guardian ad litem. After evidence introduced, and submission of the cause, the court gave its decision and entered judgment, the effect of which, as already stated, was to declare the plaintiff Bassett the owner in fee of the property, the foundation for the judgment, as shown by the findings in the action, being the delivery of the deed from William Workman to Joseph M. Workman, followed by open, notorious, adverse possession in him for 25 years, and his subsequent conveyance to O. T. Bassett, appellant's father.

[3, 4] Although the findings in the judgment roll of Bassett v. Thornton contain a recital that respondent and the other minor defendants in the action "had been duly and regularly served with summons," the trial court in this cause, after finding the facts narrated above, further found, as alleged by the respondent, that the purported service was not sufficient to confer jurisdiction over respondent's person, or jurisdiction to appoint said C. K. Holloway as her guardian ad litem. Under the rules applying to the consideration of appeals on the judgment roll alone, we are bound to accept the findings in the present case as establishing that there was no service of summons upon, or duly authorized appearance in Bassett v. Thornton on behalf of this respondent. The fact that the record contains some evidence bearing upon such finding which is not in itself sufficient to support it cannot be considered. Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 170, 185, 27 Pac. 658; Hill v. City Cab, etc., Co., 79 Cal. 188, 191, 21 Pac. 728; Cutting Fruit Packing Co. v. Canty, 141 Cal. 692, 696, 75 Pac. 564. We dismiss appellant's objection, that respondent may not attack a judgment, regular on its face, by citing the former decisions of this court to the effect that the rule is not that a judgment, which is void, will be enforced as if it were valid, but that it cannot be shown to be void except in certain ways. But if the parties admit the facts which show that the judgment is void, or if they are established without opposition, then, as a question of law upon such facts, we do not see why the case is not like that where the judgment is void upon its face. Hill v. City Cab, etc., Co., supra; People v. Harrison, 107 Cal. 541, 546, 40 Pac. 956; Lake v. Bonynge, 161 Cal. 120, 133, 118 Pac. 535. In the present case, as in the Hill Case, the findings establish the fact that there was no service of summons upon, or authorized appearance by, or in behalf of the respondent. The provision of the Code, supra, requiring personal service of summons upon respondent, then under 14 years of age, and also upon her father, mother, guardian, or other person designated by the statute, was mandatory. Without such completed service the court acquired no jurisdiction over her person for any purpose. As such service was not had, the defect was not cured by the appearance of any one of such persons other than the minor, in his or her own behalf. The court had no right in such case to appoint a guardian ad litem for respondent, and the acts of such guardian as to her were void and of no effect. Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 616, 637, 638; McCloskey v. Sweeney, 66 Cal. 53, 4 Pac. 943; Johnston v. S. F. Sav. Union, 63 Cal. 554, 562; Redmond v. Peterson, 102 Cal. 595, 599, 36 Pac. 923, 41 Am. St. Rep. 204; Chambers v. Jones, 72 Ill. 275, 278; McMurtry v. Fairley, 194 Mo. 502, 512, 91 S. W. 902; 30 Cyc. 223. The judgment in Bassett v. Thornton being void as to respondent, the trial court was correct in holding that her interest in the property involved in this action was in no way affected thereby.

The respondent became of legal age January 13, 1901. The death of her father, at which time her remainder interest in the property vested, occurred March 13th of the same year. This action was not commenced until the 24th day of June, 1918, or more than 17 years after the disability of non-age was removed, and after the respondent was in position to assert her claim to an interest in the land. In an endeavor to meet the claim of adverse possession, and title by prescription in appellant, and a defense based upon her own laches, respondent alleged, by way of an excuse for such a long period of inactivity, that, until about one year before commencing this action, she did not know, nor was she ever informed of any fact that would lead her to suspect that she owned any right, title, interest, or estate in the property, and did not know that the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton had been entered against her. Other facts purporting to explain the delayed discovery, and setting forth what respondent finally did in the way of initiating this action, are pleaded. She also alleged the absence of appellant from the state for the greater portion of the 17-year period. These allegations, other than appellant's absence, were traversed by the appellant, who set forth the facts upon which he relied to establish title by prescription in himself, and to show laches on the part of respondent.

[5] In response to the issue of adverse possession the trial court found that O. T. Bassett, appellant's father, entered upon the land under claim of title founded upon the deed from William Workman to Joseph M. Workman, dated October 11, 1870, the deed from Joseph M. Workman and Josephine M. Workman, his wife, to O. T. Bassett, dated March 11, 1895, and the decree in Bassett v. Thornton, quieting his title as against respondent and others, and that his successors in interest, including this appellant, entered upon said lands under claim of title deraigned through him. Therefore, as the appellant succeeded to the land under a claim founded on the title of his father, who had a deed which implied full ownership, and under the decree of distribution in the father's estate, his entry and claim rest upon color of title. Owsley v. Matson, 156 Cal. 401, 402, 104 Pac. 983. Section 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

"When it appears that the occupant or those under whom he claims, entered into the possession of the property under claim of title, exclusive of other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance of the property in question, or upon the decree or judgment of a competent court, and that there has been a continued occupation and possession of the property included in such instrument, decree, or judgment, or of some part of the property, under such claim, for five years, the property so included is deemed to have been held adversely. * * *"

[6-8] Respondent replies that, as the deed from her father did not convey to appellant's father the remainder interest, to which she succeeded on her father's death, in 1901, and as that right was not affected by the judgment in Bassett v. Thornton, she is a tenant in common with appellant to the extent of her interest in the land, and that title by adverse possession may not be obtained by one tenant in common against another. This position is untenable. When a tenant in common is in possession of the whole premises, and exercises acts of ownership of an unequivocal character, overt and notorious, and of such nature as, by their own import, to impart information and notice to his cotenants that an adverse possession and disseisin are intended to be asserted against them, his possession is adverse. Any act of the cotenant in the exclusive possession, which manifests an intention on his part to hold exclusively for himself, is equivalent in law to an actual ouster. 1 Cal. Jur. 544; Feliz v. Feliz, 105 Cal. 1, 5, 38 Pac. 521. A tenant in common, who enters into the actual possession of land under claim and color of title, and who, with his predecessor in interest, has maintained possession, and exercised acts of ownership openly and notoriously, claiming the same adversely to other cotenants who are of age, and to all the world, and paying taxes assessed thereon for more than five years prior to the commencement of an action against him, thereby acquires a title by prescription under the statute of limitations. Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 53, 36 Pac. 364; Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 170, 184, 27 Pac. 658; Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 221.

[9, 10] The rule is that when one enters avowedly as tenant in common with others, his possession is the possession of the others, so long as the tenancy in common is not disclaimed. In such cases, to constitute the ouster there must be acts of the most open and notorious character, clearly giving notice to the world, and to all having occasion to observe the condition and occupancy of the property, that the intention is to exclude, and does exclude the cotenant. The rule thus stated, however, has no application to a case where the possession of the person in question was neither avowedly begun as a tenant in common, nor instituted under a deed or instrument which defined his title as such. Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 358, 11 Pac. 724; Frick v. Sinon, 75 Cal. 337, 339, 17 Pac. 439, 7 Am. St. Rep. 177; Elder v. McClaskey, 70 Fed. 529, 538–540, 17 C. C. A. 251. In this case appellant's father, his predecessor in title, entered into the open and notorious possession of the entire tract under a deed which purported to convey the whole, and the entire interest in the whole, of the property in fee simple, and maintained his interest thereunder. Appellant, in turn, went into possession, and, at the time Joseph M. Workman, the life tenant, died, and the right of respondent accrued, he was maintaining possession, under the decree of distribution in his father's estate, which likewise by its terms purported to vest in him the whole estate, and title in and to the whole property. The entry by appellant's predecessor was the assertion of an exclusive right in severalty, and equivalent to an express declaration that he entered "claiming the whole to himself." The entry and possession, which passed to appellant, was an ouster of all persons claiming an interest in the land, and was such a disseisin as set the statute of prescription in motion against them, at and from the time they had a right of entry. Frick v. Sinon, supra. It is immaterial that the fee-simple deed from Joseph M. Workman to O. T. Bassett, under which the entry was made, actually carried with it only the title to a life estate, or an undivided interest. The extent of the estate purporting to be conveyed characterized the entry and subsequent possession, and showed beyond doubt that they were made under a claim to the whole, and were with the intent to oust all others asserting an interest. Bath v. Valdez, supra. It would seem, therefore, that appellant's possession was never in privity with respondent, as her tenant in common, or in subordination to her claim. Elder v. McClaskey, supra, 70 Fed. 539 and 542, 17 C. C. A. 251.

[11] Respondent takes the position that neither the possession, nor the acts of appellant, or his immediate predecessor, before the death of her father in 1901, at which time her rights accrued, should have the effect of ousting her. It is true that the possession of respondent's father, the tenant for life, was not adverse to her as remainderman. Such life tenant could not, by his dealings with the life estate, make his, or his grantee's possession, adverse to respondent, so as to start the statute of limitations against her during the life estate (Pryor v. Winter, 147 Cal. 554, 559, 82 Pac. 202, 109 Am. St. Rep. 162; McMurtry v. Fairley, 194 Mo. 502, 510, 91 S. W. 902), but, after such life estate terminated, the possession, unless in some way qualified, did become adverse, and the statute of limitations began to run at that time (Mann v. Mann, 141 Cal. 326, 330, 74 Pac. 995). Consequently the facts pertaining to the prior occupation and possession are material elements in determining the question, now presented, whether the possession of the appellant was adverse after the life tenant died. There was no change in the claim, or character of the possession after the life estate fell in. It continued as before, and we can only know its nature by reference to the circumstances under which it began and was perpetuated. Therefore the deed from Workman to Bassett, and the decree of distribution in the latter's estate, prior to the falling of the life estate are of first importance in showing whether the possession taken under them was intended to be, and was in fact, adverse when continued after the time at which respondent's right of entry accrued.

"There can be no doubt of the correctness of this view, on principle, and the authorities fully support it." Taft, J., in Elder v. McClaskey, supra, 70 Fed. 539, 17 C. C. A. 262.

[12] The fact that the respondent did not become of age until January 13, 1901, does not make any difference in the consideration of the question before us. An infant can be ousted from his possession either by a stranger or a cotenant. The ouster sets the statute of limitations running in favor of the disseisor, but protection is given the infant by the provision of the statute that the adverse holding must continue from that date until the expiration of five years from his attaining his majority. The sufficiency of the notice on the part of the disseisor, at the time it is given, is not to be diminished by anything occurring subsequent thereto. The knowledge that the infant would have had from the notice, if he had been capable of comprehending the same, is imputed to him as of the date of the notice as fully as if he were an adult, but the effect of such knowledge is suspended until his majority. Winterburn v. Chambers, supra.

What the appellant, and his predecessor in title, did by way of entering upon, and maintaining possession of the land, and in asserting complete and exclusive ownership, both before and after respondent's right of entry accrued in 1901, is comprehensively set forth in the trial court's findings, the substance of which we recited when stating the various separate defenses pleaded by appellant. We think it unnecessary to repeat those facts here, or to quote extensively from the findings. As an ultimate fact the court found that such ouster by, and possession in, appellant, and his predecessors in title, extending over a period of nearly 25 years, 17 of which passed after the respondent was in position to assert her claim to an interest in the property, imparted constructive notice and knowledge to the respondent and her coplaintiffs, of the adverse nature of appellant's claim. It also found that neither respondent, nor any of the other parties hereto, other than appellant, had been, or were seized, or possessed, of the land within 5 years before the commencement of the action. Its conclusion first adopted was that, by reason of the facts so found, and of such occupancy and possession by the appellant, all of said claimants, other than appellant, are barred from any recovery in this action, and that the appellant "has acquired title to said real property under the provisions of section 1007, Civil Code." If that conclusion is not deprived of support by other facts found, the possession and occupancy of appellant, continued for a period far exceeding the statutory period of 5 years, was, undoubtedly, not only sufficient to bar respondent, and those who like her asserted some legal title, but it was also sufficient to vest a title in fee simple in appellant against all other claimants. Civ. Code, § 1007; Owsley v. Matson, supra, 156 Cal. 404, 104 Pac. 983; Wutchumna Water Co. v. Ragle, 148 Cal. 759, 764, 84 Pac. 162; Woodward v. Faris, 109 Cal. 12, 18, 41 Pac. 781.

[13-15] Respondent points out other findings, which she contends, are inconsistent with and entirely destroy the effect of the finding of prescriptive title in appellant. The first of these is that appellant is a resident of the state of Texas, and during the whole period of time since respondent's rights accrued, has only been in the state of California on infrequent visits, remaining here in the aggregate some 3½ years, and has never designated an agent in the state upon whom summons may be served. Other findings are that "this action is not barred by the provisions of section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure," and that specific allegations of the answer, wherein appellant pleaded the bar of other sections of the statute of limitations, including section 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as a defense to respondent's cause of action, are untrue. It is the law in this state that the statute of limitations may be resorted to in an action of partition, so far as it establishes an interest in the property. And this is in no way inconsistent with the general rule that the action for partition between tenants in common is not barred by the lapse of time. Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 19, 28, 77 Pac. 712. The only provisions of the Code that seem to have any application to this phase of the case are sections 318 and 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 1007 of the Civil Code. The two former prescribe seizin within a period of 5 years before the commencement of the action as a necessary condition of the right to maintain the same. They affect only the remedy, i. e., the action, or means given by the law for the recovery of a right, but not the right itself. On the other hand, section 1007 of the Civil Code, pertaining to the acquisition of title by prescription, which is correlated with, and must be construed with, the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to adverse possession (People's Water Co. v. Anderson, 170 Cal. 683, 684, 151 Pac. 127), confers a substantive right (Billings v. Hall, 7 Cal. 1, 4; Alhambra, etc., Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 600, 14 Pac. 379; Adams v. Hopkins, supra, 144 Cal. 27, 77 Pac. 712). Respondent and those claiming with her had five years after their rights in the property accrued within which to bring an action, either for the recovery of the land or possession thereof, or for the rents and profits out of the same (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 318, 319, and 328; Winterburn v. Chambers, supra), and that period was extended by the time the defendant was out of the state (Code Civ. Proc., § 351; San Diego Realty Co. v. Hill, 168 Cal. 637, 639, 143 Pac. 1021; Foster v. Butler, 164 Cal. 623, 628, 130 Pac. 6).

[16] But the defendant's absence from the state did not deprive the respondent and the others of a remedy. They might have invoked the authority of the court, and, upon service of process by publication in the manner prescribed by the statute, brought an action to determine the adverse claims to the property (Perkins v. Wakeham, 86 Cal. 580, 25 Pac. 51, 21 Am. St. Rep. 67; Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 10 Sup. Ct. 557, 33 L. Ed. 918), or to partition the real estate, as was finally done by the bringing of this action (Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 727, 738, 24 L. Ed. 565; Seculovich v. Morton, 101 Cal. 673, 677, 36 Pac. 387, 40 Am. St. Rep. 106). Section 757 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to suits in partition, expressly provides that summons in such actions may be served on nonresident parties, as in other cases. Respondent and others were in position, immediately upon the death of their ancestor, in 1901, to institute the action. They permitted the years to slip by at the peril of being caught in the exact position in which they are now placed by the findings of the trial court. In order to maintain the action, which, by reason of the other facts, they were permitted to commence, it was incumbent upon them to show that they or their ancestor had been seized, or possessed of the property or premises, in question, within 5 years before the commencement of the action.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 318, 319; Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 535, 540, 95 Am. Dec. 205; Adams v. Hopkins, supra. They were not so seized or possessed, and when such facts appeared at the trial, the inevitable finding resulted that they were "barred from any recovery of the real property, the subject of the action," because, as the court also found, the title had in the meantime passed to the appellant by prescription, under section 1007 of the Civil Code.

[17-20] For another reason we think the first judgment entered in the court below was right. The trial court found that the respondent did not make her demand within a reasonable time and that, as a consequence her cause of action was barred by her laches. This determination is unquestionably correct. The commencement of this action after such a lapse of time, irrespective of the statute of limitations, is in our judgment, the presentation of a stale demand. Casserly v. County of Alameda, 153 Cal. 170, 173, 94 Pac. 765. In this state a suit in partition under our Code is, in its nature and essence, equitable. The action, though regulated to a great extent by the statute, partakes more fully, both in respect to the remedies provided and the mode of procedure, of the principles and rules of equity than those of law. Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 576, 585, 593, 95 Am. Dec. 139; Goodale v. Fifteenth District Court, 56 Cal. 26, 29; Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 529, 619, 2 Pac. 418; Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 444, 456, 27 Pac. 356; Woodward v. Superior Court, 95 Cal. 272, 276, 30 Pac. 535. It devolves on one seeking the aid of a court of equity, where the complaint discloses a great lapse of time without the assertion of any claim, and after long-continued acquiescence in acts hostile to the claim, to show the circumstances indicating good faith and reasonable diligence on his part. Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 250, 81 Pac. 516; Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 46, 78 Pac. 467; Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 53, 36 Pac. 364; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 596, 49 Am. Rep. 100. The respondent failed to establish a sufficient equitable reason why she waited so long before asserting a claim to an interest in the land. The trial court found her specific allegations in support of her contention in that behalf to be untrue, and that there was no justification for the long delay in bringing this action. The only inference that can be drawn from the findings is that the respondent had sufficient knowledge and information, both as to the deed executed by William Workman to her father and of the action of Bassett v. Thornton, to fully comprehend and understand her own rights in the matter, long prior to the time set by her, and that, if she did not have that understanding, she did have information sufficient to put her, as a person of ordinary prudence, on inquiry as to her interest in the property. The trial court therefore reached the only possible conclusion that the plaintiffs in the action, including this respondent and the defendant Ida Kelso, are precluded by the application of the doctrine of laches from any recovery. Chapman v. Bank of California, 97 Cal. 155, 159, 31 Pac. 896; Seculovich v. Morton, supra. A party is not to be held barred from his remedy for a wrong alleged to have been done to him on the ground that he has been guilty of laches, unless his delay in bringing action has been of such length and under such circumstances that it would be inequitable to enter into an inquiry as to the validity of his claim or to allow such remedy. Whether such is the situation is a question in the first instance for the trial court, and, if its conclusion thereon can reasonably be held to find sufficient support in the evidence, an appellate court should not interfere therewith. Suhr v. Lauterbach, 164 Cal. 591, 593, 130 Pac. 2. The specific facts found in this case are ample, in our judgment, to support the further finding by the trial court that the long delay on the part of the respondent in initiating the action was prejudicial to the appellant.

[21] Respondent has urged that the defense of laches should not be recognized in this case for the reason that the defense was not pleaded. In answer, it is only necessary to say that "it is well settled that the defense of laches need not be pleaded, but, when it appears from the evidence that the seeker of relief in equity has been guilty of laches, the court will deny such relief sua sponte." Stevinson v. San Joaquin, etc., Co., 162 Cal. 141, 143, 121 Pac. 398.

Appellant seeks also to invoke the defense of estoppel against respondent, in that he alleged, and the court found, that, after respondent became of age, she received and accepted her share of certain proceeds arising out of an agreement of settlement and dismissal of an appeal taken in the case of Bassett v. Thornton. The finding on the point is so unsatisfactory on the essential elements entering into the application of the doctrine of estoppel that we may well consider the contention to be without support.

From the foregoing it must appear that the judgment and decree first entered by the trial court, to the effect that the plaintiffs in this action, including respondent, have not, and defendant Ida Kelso has not, nor has either or any of the plaintiffs, or said Ida Kelso, any right, title, or interest in the land and premises eventually concerned in the litigation, but that the appellant is the owner in fee simple of all of such property, was right and was the only judgment and decree that can properly stand on the findings and proper conclusions of law. The lower court was in error when it granted the motion of the respondent to vacate and set it aside and to substitute the judgment finally entered in its place and stead.

As an order reversing the order and judgment appealed from, without other direction, will leave the original conclusion of law and judgment in force, it is not necessary to make any order directing a new conclusion of law or the entry of another judgment. Dahlberg v. Girsch, 157 Cal. 324, 332, 107 Pac. 616.

The order vacating the original judgment and amending the conclusion of law upon which the same was based is reversed, as is the judgment entered in pursuance of said order.

MOTOR TRANSIT CO. et al. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 10099.)

1. Carriers ⟸10—Railroad Commission has only power given by Constitution and statute.

The sole source of the Railroad Commission's power to act on a complaint that an auto stage company is operating without a certificate of necessity and convenience, is to be found in the constitutional and statutory provisions creating and controlling its jurisdiction and authority.

2. Carriers ⟸10—Commission authorized to hear and determine complaint against auto stage company.

Under the constitutional provisions relative to the powers of the Railroad Commission, Public Utilities Act, §§ 60 and 61(a), relative to complaints and orders by the Commission, and Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, §§ 4 and 7, adopting the provisions of the Public Utilities Act, the Commission had power to hear and determine a complaint that an auto stage company was carrying on a business for which it had no certificate of public necessity and convenience.

3. Carriers ⟸10—Commission's jurisdiction limited to complaints germane to subject of regulation and control.

Public Utilities Act, § 60, made applicable to auto stage companies, by the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, does not give the Commission power to hear all complaints affecting public utilities, but, in view of section 7 of the last-mentioned act, only jurisdiction to hear and determine such complaints as are germane to the subject of regulation and control of such public utilities.

4. Carriers ⟸10—Statute requiring certificate of convenience and necessity held a regulatory statute.

Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, § 5, requiring a certificate of public convenience and necessity as a condition precedent to the construction or extension of a plant or line of the utilities to which it applies, is a regulatory statute within the constitutional and statutory provisions authorizing the Railroad Commission to supervise and regulate public utilities.

5. Carriers ⟸10—Commission cannot enforce contracts, but jurisdiction not defeated because of contract.

The Railroad Commission is not empowered to enforce private contracts between individuals, but the fact that an order in pursuance of its power and under its duty to regulate public utilities and compel the performance of their duties to the public incidentally requires the doing of an act which carries out the terms of a private contract, does not divest it of jurisdiction.

6. Constitutional law ⟸81—Regulation is proper exercise of police power.

Statutes for the regulation of public utilities are a proper exercise by the state of its police power.

7. Constitutional law ⟸81—Established utilities subject to police power when exercised.

As soon as the police power is exercised for the regulation of public utilities, all phases of operation of established utilities become at once subject to the police power thus called into operation.

8. Carriers ⟸10—Commission authorized to hear complaints against companies operating before enactment of statute.

Under the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, the Railroad Commission has power to hear and dispose of complaints against companies securing their operative rights prior to May 1, 1917, notwithstanding the provision excepting, from the requirement that a certificate of public necessity and convenience be obtained, those transportation companies actually operating at the time the act became effective.

9. Carriers ⟸10—Injunctive order by Commission held authorized.

Under Public Utilities Act, § 61, authorizing the Railroad Commission, after hearing any complaint, to make and file its order, an order requiring a transportation company to cease operating as such between certain points, was not an unauthorized exercise of its injunctive powers, it being enforceable if necessary by court proceedings, under section 75.

10. Carriers ⟸10—That Commission cannot enforce orders does not prevent it from making them.

That the Railroad Commission has no power to enforce its orders cannot be successfully urged as a denial of the power to make the order, when such power is expressly given it by statute.

11. Carriers ⟸10—Certificate of convenience and necessity required of companies commencing operation after date of original act.

In view of Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, § 5, requiring auto stage companies to obtain certificates of public necessity and convenience, but excepting companies then operating, the amendatory act (St. 1919, p. 459, § 3), relieving from the necessity of securing such certificate companies operating in good faith at the time that act becomes effective, does not confer a franchise on companies then operating illegally without compliance with the original act, and only rights acquired prior to May 1, 1917, may be exercised without such certificate.

12. Carriers ⟸10—Agreement held admission that auto stage company had not done local service between certain points.

An agreement, by an auto bus company not to apply to the Railroad Commission for permission to handle local traffic between certain points on its through line, was an admission that no such local service had been held out by it prior to May 1, 1917, as otherwise under the statute no application for permission would have been necessary.

13. Carriers ⟸10—Evidence in proceeding before Commission held to show local service not rendered prior to statute requiring certificate.

Evidence in a proceeding before the Railroad Commission, on complaint against an auto bus company for carrying on a local business between intermediate points on its through line without a certificate of public necessity and convenience, held to support findings of the Commission that such local service was not rendered prior to May 1, 1917.

14. Carriers ⟸10—Auto bus company operating through service not entitled to render local service without certificate.

Under Auto Stage & Truck Transportation Act, § 5, excepting transportation companies actually operating in good faith at the time the act became effective, from the necessity of obtaining a certificate of public convenience and necessity, a company, operating a through service prior to the date the act became effective, has no right to extend its service to intermediate points without such certificate.

15. Courts ⟸89—Decisions of commission not stare decisis.

Orders of the Railroad Commission, which are conclusive between the same parties only for the purpose for which they are made and not binding in subsequent proceedings, cannot bind different parties under the rule of stare decisis.

In Bank.

Certiorari proceeding by the Motor Transit Company and another against the Railroad Commission of the State of California and another. Writ dismissed.

H. W. Kidd and A. W. Ashburn, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Clyde Bishop, of Santa Ana, and Hugh Gordon and William W. Clary, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. Petitioners in this proceeding seek to have reviewed by this court an order of the Railroad Commission directing the cessation of service by the petitioner Motor Transit Company "as a transportation company for the transportation of persons or property for compensation between the termini of Santa Ana and Anaheim and intermediate points." The hearing before the Commission arose out of a complaint by one auto stage company against the alleged unlawful operations of a competing auto stage company between the cities of Anaheim and Santa Ana.

The "A. R. G. Bus Company," prior to May 1, 1917, operated an automobile stage service between Los Angeles and San Diego, over a regular route passing through the cities of Anaheim, Orange, and Santa Ana. On January 24, 1920, it sold and transferred its business and operative rights to petitioner O. R. Fuller, who subsequently, on November 27, 1920, with the approval of the Railroad Commission, sold the business and rights so acquired to Motor Transit Company. Respondent A. B. Watson, under the name of Crown Stages, operates a local passenger service between Santa Ana and Los Angeles, the operative rights between Santa Ana and Anaheim and intermediate points having been acquired by virtue of operations prior to May 1, 1917, and those between Anaheim and Los Angeles by purchase of the rights of the Valley Stage Line. The routes of the two companies practically parallel each other between Los Angeles and Santa Ana.

On May 7, 1920, respondent Watson filed with the Railroad Commission a complaint against Fuller, the then owner of the competing line, setting forth that the latter was undertaking to transport local passengers between Los Angeles and Santa Ana and intermediate points without having sought or obtained from the Railroad Commission a certificate of public necessity and convenience, thereby violating the provisions of chapter 213, § 5, Statutes of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 330) as amended in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 457, § 3), and praying that the Commission make an order discontinuing said unauthorized service. The statute just referred to provides that—

"No transportation company shall hereafter begin to operate any automobile, * * * auto stage, for the transportation of persons * * * for compensation on any public highway in this state without first having obtained from the Railroad Commission a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity require said operation, but no such certificate shall be required of any transportation company as to the fixed termini between which or the route over which it is actually operating in good faith at the time this act becomes effective."

The commission found that the predecessor in interest of the Motor Transit Company, viz., the A. R. G. Bus Company, had not in good faith operated a local business between Santa Ana and Anaheim prior to May 1, 1917; that its published tariffs and time schedules did not contemplate such local service; that the principal owner and manager of its said predecessor had executed, in the name of that company, a written agreement under date of May 4, 1918, not to "apply to the Railroad Commission for permission to handle any local traffic between Anaheim and Santa Ana or intermediate points"; that the right to inaugurate such local service was not subsequently conferred upon the Motor Transit Company by any certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the Railroad Commission, and that the operations complained of were unauthorized and in violation of the provisions of the statute. Stats. 1917, c. 213, p. 330, as amended; Stats. 1919, c. 280, p. 457. Upon these findings the Commission based its order directing the defendants in said proceeding to desist operating as a transportation company between the termini of Santa Ana and Anaheim and intermediate points.

Petitioner contends that the respondent Commission was in any event without jurisdiction of the subject-matter embodied in the complaint presented in the proceeding before the Commission and that, if the Commission did have such jurisdiction, it exceeded the same by making an order which in its nature and effect was injunctive. The latter contention involves the main objection presented upon this proceeding and is rested primarily upon the argument that, inasmuch as the Public Utilities Act does not expressly confer the power to make orders, injunctive in character, the Commission was without power to make the order complained of here.

[1, 2] The sole source of the Commission's power to act in the proceeding at all is to be found in the constitutional and statutory provisions which create and control the jurisdiction and authority of the Commission. The constitutional provisions pertinent to the point presented provide, among other things, that—

"The Commission shall have the power * * * to hear and determine complaints against railroad and other transportation companies * * * shall have and exercise such power and jurisdiction to supervise and regulate public utilities * * * as shall be conferred upon it by the Legislature. * * *"

Pursuant to these constitutional provisions, the Legislature enacted the "Public Utilities Act" (Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. 18; Stats. 1915, p. 115) and the so-called "Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act" (Stats. 1917, c. 213, p. 330; Stats. 1919, c. 280, p. 457). The regulation of auto stages was not included in the provisions of the Public Utilities Act as originally enacted nor as subsequently amended (Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. 18; Stats. 1915, p. 115), but the "Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act" in terms vested in the Railroad Commission the power and authority to supervise and regulate every transportation company in this state. Stated more precisely in the language of the latter act:

"The Railroad Commission of the state of California is * * * vested with power and authority to supervise and regulate every transportation company in this state. * * * The Railroad Commission shall have power and authority, by general order or otherwise, to prescribe rules and regulations applicable to any and all transportation companies." Stats. 1917, ch. 213, § 4, p. 333.

By specific reference to the Public Utilities Act, the Commission is given power to hear and determine complaints against transportation companies in exactly the same manner and to the same extent as it has of complaints against other public utilities. This power is conferred by section 7 of the "Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act," which provides that—

"In all respects in which the Railroad Commission has power and authority under the Constitution of this state or this act, applications and complaints may be made and filed with the Railroad Commission, process issued, hearings held, opinions, orders and decisions made and filed, petitions for rehearing filed and acted upon, and petitions for writs of review or mandate filed with the Supreme Court of this state, considered and disposed of by said court, in the manner, and under the conditions and subject to the limitations and with the effect specified in the Public Utilities Act."

It obviously follows that sections 60 and 61 (a) of the Public Utilities Act, as originally enacted and still in force, which prescribe the power of the Commission to hear and determine complaints against public utilities make and measure the power of the Commission to proceed in the instant case. These sections provide that—

"Complaint may be made by the Commission of its own motion or by any corporation or person * * * by petition or complaint in writing, setting forth any act or thing done * * * by any public utility including any rule, regulation or charge heretofore established or fixed by or for any public utility, in violation * * * of any provision of law or of any order or rule of the Commission."

"At the time for any hearing before the Commission, * * * the complainant and the corporation or person complained of * * * shall be entitled to be heard and introduce evidence. * * * After the conclusion of the hearing the Commission shall make and file its order, containing its decision."

Evidently the Commission proceeded under the power given by section 60, above quoted, of the Public Utilities Act, to entertain complaints against any transportation company for any "act or thing done * * * in violation * * * of any provision of law" and found upon the facts presented pursuant to the allegations of the complaint before it that the Motor Transit Company was operating a local service in violation of section 5 of the "Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act" (Stats. 1917, c. 213, p. 333), which, as before stated, provides, in substance, that no auto stage shall be operated on the highways of this state without a permit from the Commission, unless such company was actually operating in good faith along such highway prior to May 1, 1917. These statutory provisions, when read and considered together, we think empowered the Commission to hear and determine the controversy presented to it in the instant case.

[3] It may be conceded, as is contended, that section 60 is not to be literally construed to give the Commission power to hear all complaints affecting public utilities. Clearly it was not the purpose of the statute to provide the Commission with power to adjudicate all controversies between litigants in the ordinary sense. It is not claimed, for instance, that this section would authorize the Commission to hear and determine a charge of libel made against a public utility. The measure of the jurisdiction of the Commission is to be found in a consideration of the power granted, which must be read and construed with relation to and in conjunction with the context and purpose of the statute in its entirety. Section 7 of the "Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act" (Stats. 1917, p. 335), giving the Commission power to hear and determine complaints against transportation companies, provides that such power shall be exercised "In all respect in which the Railroad Commission has power and authority under the Constitution of this state or this act." The power and authority so conferred upon the Commission under the Constitution and the Public Utilities Act is the power to supervise and regulate. The Commission, therefore, is limited in its jurisdiction to hear and determine only such complaints as are "germane to the subject of the regulation and control of public utilities." Pacific Telephone, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 691, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 22; City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 526, 534, 192 Pac. 25, 10 A. L. R. 1425.

[4] Clearly section 5 of the "Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act" (Stats. 1917, c. 213, p. 333) requiring a certificate of public convenience and necessity as a condition precedent to the construction or extension of the plant or line of certain enumerated utilities, of which the petitioner is one, is a regulatory statute. It is in the interest of the public that the service rendered by public utilities be adequate and of good quality and the rates as low as possible commensurate with good service and a reasonable return to the owner. The certificate of public convenience and necessity is the means whereby protection is given to the utility rendering adequate service at a reasonable rate against ruinous competition. The person or corporation obtaining a certificate must operate at the times and in the manner prescribed by such certificate, thus furnishing uniform and efficient service to the public. If any one else would be at liberty to operate without such a certificate he might operate at his own pleasure and only under favorable conditions, thus making it impossible for the holder of a certificate to successfully carry on his business. It is the public interest in efficient service which is being safeguarded by the requirement of a certificate. Oro Electric Corp. v. Railroad Commission, 169 Cal. 466, 475, 147 Pac. 118; Public Utilities v. Garviloch, 54 Utah, 406, 181 Pac. 272, P. U. R. 1919E, p. 182. Such requirement is part of the regulation of transportation companies in the interest of the public. This, therefore, being a regulatory statute, the Commission, in hearing and determining that the petitioner was violating the provisions of that statute, was acting within its jurisdiction to hear and determine complaints "germane to the subject of the regulation and control of public utilities."

[5] This disposes of petitioners' contention that the Commission is by its order in effect enforcing a private contract between individuals which, of course, the Commission is not empowered to do. Western Ass'n of Short Line Railroads v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 577, 162 Pac. 391, 1 A. L. R. 1455. The fact that an order of the Commission, given in pursuance of the Commission's power and under the Commission's duty to regulate public utilities and compel the performance of their duties to the public, incidentally requires the petitioners to do an act which carries out the terms of a private contract, does not, of course, operate to divest the Commission of its jurisdiction.

[6-8] Nor is there any merit in petitioner's contention that, because of the establishment of petitioners' operations prior to May 1, 1917, they are not subject to the regulations of the Commission. Statutes for the regulation of public utilities are a proper exercise by the state of its police power. As soon as the power is exercised, all phases of operation of established utilities, become at once subject to the police power thus called into operation. Producers' Transportation Co. v. Railroad Commission, 251 U. S. 228,[1] Law v. Railroad Commission, 184 Cal. 737, 195 Pac. 423, 14 A. L. R. 249. The statute is applicable not only to those public utilities coming into existence after its passage, but likewise to those already established and in operation. The "Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act" (Stats. 1917, c. 213) is a statute passed in pursuance of the police power. The only distinction recognized in the statute between those established before and those established after the passage of the act is in the method of the creation of their operative rights. A certificate of public convenience and necessity is required for any new operation, but no such certificate is required of any transportation company for the operation which was actually carried on in good faith on May 1, 1917. This distinction in the creation of their operative rights in no way affects the power of the Commission to supervise and regulate them. Obviously the power of the Commission to hear and dispose of complaints is as effective against companies securing their operative rights prior to May 1, 1917, as against those subsequently securing such rights under a certificate of public convenience and necessity.

[9] Granting, as must be done in view of what has been said, that the Commission had jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy here, it follows that the order given by the Commission, requiring the Motor Transit Company to refrain from doing the act found by the Commission to have been done in violation of a provision of law, is not an unauthorized exercise by the Commission of injunctive powers. The statute by its express terms authorizes the Commission "to make and file its order." Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess., § 61, p. 53. As held in Holabird v. Railroad Commission, 171 Cal. 691, 154 Pac. 831, this section authorizes the Commission to make whatever order may be necessary in the exercise of its jurisdiction.

As a practical matter of procedure such an order is proper. If the order so given by the Commission is obeyed, then no further legal steps are necessary. It is only when such order is disregarded that it becomes necessary for the Commission to institute an action in the courts to secure its enforcement. Until such order is given there is no basis upon which the Commission can ask the aid of the courts.

The statute, instead of conferring upon the Commission the means of directly enforcing such orders, has provided (Public Utilities Act, § 75) for the institution by the Commission of court proceedings, or for the issuance of process by the court to carry out and make effective the orders of the Commission. As was said in Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Superior Court, 43 Cal. App. 332, 341, 185 Pac. 195, 199:

"The purpose and intent in enacting section 75 is obvious. The Public Utility Act invests the Board of Railroad Commissioners with large powers in the control of public utilities, and gives it powers to fine and punish for contempt. But the Commission is not a court and has not complete court machinery. It was seen that cases might arise where punishments for contempt and fine would not accomplish the objects sought, that writs of mandamus and injunction might be needed, and such writs the Commission had no power to issue. It might become necessary for it to avail itself of the equity powers of the courts. Without express authority granted by the Legislature to so do, the question of its right to bring suit might be raised in any litigation arising. Anticipating such contingency, express power was conferred upon the Commission to avail itself of court processes and writs, so that its power in this regard might not be questioned."

[10] Of course, the mere fact that the board has no power to enforce its orders cannot be successfully urged as a denial of the power to make the order, when that power is expressly given it by the statute. Turner Creamery Co. v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry., 36 S. D. 310, 154 N. W. 819, P. U. R. 1916A, 1083; Cincinnati, New Orleans, etc., v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. 184, 16 Sup. Ct. 700, 40 L. Ed. 935. New York has a similar method of enforcing the orders of its Public Service Commission, and the courts of that state have, without questioning the power of the Commission to make such order, sustained their validity by the issuance of writs of mandamus and injunctions to enforce them. Public Service Commission v. New York & Queens Gas Co., 103 Misc. Rep. 703, 170 N. Y. Supp. 1009; Public Service Commission v. Brooklyn Heights Railroad, 105 Misc. Rep. 254, 172 N. Y. Supp. 790; Public Service Commission v. International Railway, 106 Misc. Rep. 364, 174 N. Y. Supp. 708.

The petitioner strongly relies upon the case of White Bus Co. v. Railroad Commission (L. A. 5856) to support its position that the Commission had no jurisdiction to make an order injunctive in character. The Commission, in that case, refused to take jurisdiction of a threatened violation of the law. Upon an application for certiorari to review this order this court dismissed the proceeding,[1] thus confirming the refusal of the Commission to take jurisdiction. In view of the fact that the Commission has only the authority expressly delegated to it by statute and no power to control mere threatened violations of the statute has been conferred, the Commission, of course, had no jurisdiction to enjoin such threatened violation. On the other hand, the statute having expressly conferred upon the Commission the power and the duty to take jurisdiction of actual violations, obviously the case last above cited and relied upon by petitioner has no weight as a precedent in the instant case.

[11] It is the further contention of the petitioner that "Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act" (Stats. 1917, c. 213, § 5), having been subsequently amended by the Statutes of 1919 (Stats. 1919, c. 280, § 3), the latter statute must govern and control the rights of petitioners. In the former statute no certificate was required of those operating in good faith prior to May 1, 1917. The latter statute relieves from the necessity of securing such a certificate companies operating in good faith "at the time this act becomes effective" (June 22, 1919). Manifestly, those companies commencing operations subsequent to May 1, 1917, without the certificate of public service and convenience required by the statute were violating the statute, and we cannot hold it to have been the intention of the Legislature to confer a franchise upon auto stage companies by virtue of their operation prior to the date the amendment went into effect, when such operation, by the very terms of the former statute, would have been illegal. We are therefore constrained to hold that any rights to maintain local service without a certificate of public convenience and necessity must have been acquired prior to May 1, 1917. This being so, the order in question was not in excess of the Commission's jurisdiction and must be upheld, if there be sufficient evidence to support the finding of the Commission that petitioners were not on said date maintaining a local service.

[12, 13] That there is sufficient evidence in this regard admits of no question. While the proof is not overwhelming, it is amply sufficient to support the findings. There was practically no affirmative evidence to show that the A. R. G. Bus Company, predecessor in interest of the petitioner, actually operated a local service between Santa Ana and Anaheim prior to May 1, 1917. Neither do the published schedules and time-tables show such operation. On the other hand, there was affirmative evidence that petitioners' predecessor in interest did not, prior to May 1, 1917, undertake to render local service between Anaheim and Santa Ana. This evidence is the agreement executed by E. S. Goode, general manager of the A. R. G. Bus Company, in behalf of the company, not "to apply to the Railroad Commission for permission to handle any local traffic between Anaheim and Santa Ana and intermediate points." This is an admission that no local service had been held out by such company, as otherwise, under the terms of the statute, no application for permission to the Commission would have been necessary. There is also in evidence the testimony of Mr. Goode that only occasional passengers were carried locally, and that only when there was a vacant seat, showing that the business undertaken and held out to the public was a through and not a local business. Without analyzing in more detail the evidence presented, taken in its entirety it is sufficient, in our opinion, to support the findings of the Commission.

[14] Finally, it is the contention of petitioners that the operation of through service prior to May 1, 1917, necessarily gave them a vested right to maintain the local service in question, and this right having been conferred by the Legislature, the Commission was not only without power to deprive them thereof, but exceeded its jurisdiction in determining and directing that only such service as was in actual operation prior to said date could be continued without a certificate of public convenience and necessity. This contention cannot be maintained. The primary purpose of the Legislature in enacting this statute was not to confer a franchise upon the operating companies but to give into the power of the Commission for regulation and control in the interest of the public the operation of auto stages for transportation. It did this by requiring every auto transportation company to secure from the Commission a certificate of public convenience and necessity. It relieved from the necessity of obtaining such certificate the companies actually operating in good faith at that time. The purpose in so exempting such companies was to refrain from interfering with the operations as then carried on—in other words, to confirm in these operators the rights they were at that time exercising. But such exemption was, obviously, only to the extent of the operations then conducted. To hold that by the operation of a through line on that date petitioners were given a franchise to operate to any extent that they, in their judgment, might see fit, limited solely by the restriction that the operations must be between the same termini and over the same route, would be to materially decrease the power of the Commission over these lines and thus overlook the primary purpose of the enactment which was to give to the Commission, in the interest of the public, the fullest power possible to regulate the operation of auto stage companies.

[15] Incidentally involved in the contentions hereinbefore discussed is the contention that the decision of the Commission in a prior proceeding, wherein it was held that the right of one of two competing auto bus companies to carry through passengers between San Diego and Los Angeles included the right without the issuance of a certificate of public convenience and necessity to take and carry local passengers between Anaheim, an intermediate point, and Los Angeles, was in the nature of stare decisis and, therefore, should have controlled and concluded the decision of the Commission in the instant case. In the case of Stratton v. Railroad Commission, 186 Cal. 119, 126, 198 Pac. 1051, 1054, it is said:

"The Commission is not a judicial tribunal in the strict sense. * * * The Commission is essentially an administrative and legislative tribunal, and not a court. * * * The peculiar effect of a determination of fact operating to conclude the question for other purposes than those of the very proceeding in which the determination is made is confined to strictly judicial determinations alone."

Orders of the Commission being conclusive between the same parties only for the purpose for which they are made and not being binding upon the same parties in subsequent proceedings, certainly, such orders cannot be said to be binding upon different parties, and orders of the Commission, not attaining the status of res adjudicata, obviously, cannot be held to rise to the dignity of stare decisis.

The writ is dismissed.

MILLER & LUX, Inc., v. SAN JOAQUIN AGR. CO. et al. (Civ. 4094.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 14, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 13, 1922.)

1. Covenants ⟸68—Payment of expenses of litigation as to irrigated lands held covenant running with land.

Where, by quitclaim deeds, several parties defined and apportioned water rights, the contract providing that the expense of litigation caused by diversion of water should be ratably contributed by the parties in proportion to the amounts of land severally irrigated by them, and that the stipulations and agreements should inure to the heirs and assigns of each of the parties, and the deeds thereunder provided that the grantee should perform all the terms of the contract, the covenant as to the expenses of litigation was one running with the land, in view of Civ. Code, § 1460.

2. Covenants ⟸84 — Effect of partition on covenants running with land stated.

Where a deed to two persons contained a covenant running with the land as to payment of expenses of litigation in regard to water rights, and the two grantees partitioned the land, the covenant bound each grantee only as to the particular lands to which the fee vested wholly in him under Civ. Code, § 1466, so that, where such expense was incurred, each was liable for his pro rata, based on lands retained.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Miller & Lux, Inc., against the San Joaquin Agricultural Company and another, to recover money expended in the conduct of certain litigation. From a judgment allowing recovery in a sum less than that sued for, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, and Gail C. Larkin, of Los Angeles (Joseph C. Sharp, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants based on a common count for money paid. In its complaint it sued for $705.06. It was awarded a judgment for $404.40. Being dissatisfied with the amount of its judgment, the plaintiff has appealed, and has brought up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The controversy arose out of the expenditure of moneys expended in certain litigation, the results of which were of interest to all of the parties concerned. The plaintiff conducted the litigation from the beginning to the end. During a part of the time the predecessors in interest of the defendant J. W. Goodwin were parties to the litigation and shared in the expenses. Later, when the defendant J. W. Goodwin became the owner of certain of the properties, he was substituted for his predecessor, and he remained a party to the litigation until the same was terminated. The liability of the defendant J. W. Goodwin is claimed to rest on two different theories, one that he was so liable by reason of an alleged covenant running with the land, and the other theory is that he was liable on an implied contract. In view of the conclusion which we have reached on the first theory, it will not be necessary for us to consider the second theory. A part of the expenses were incurred when J. W. Goodwin and Luther J. Holton owned the land as tenants in common. On February 5, 1916, those two men entered into partition deeds. As from that date on the defendant Goodwin claims that the expenses should be divided, and that Goodwin should not be charged more than one-half thereof; whereas, the plaintiff contends that, under the provisions of section 1659 of the Civil Code, Goodwin and Holton would be jointly and severally liable for the whole. Of course, the liability of the defendant, measured as based on an alleged covenant running with the land, is quite different from his liability on an implied contract.

We will consider the case in the first place under the theory that the plaintiff's rights rest on an alleged covenant running with the land. On the 4th day of June, 1901, the predecessor in interest of the defendants, and numerous other parties, entered into a contract which is set forth in the bill of exceptions. For the purpose of this opinion it is sufficient to state that the said contract is of such a nature that it is, in effect, a quitclaim deed by certain of the parties to certain other parties, including the predecessor in interest of the defendants, and in general, is and constitutes a limitation, definition, and apportionment of the rights of the several parties to the use of the waters of the Fresno river and the San Joaquin river. One of the paragraphs of that contract provides:

"If hereafter any person shall attempt to divert any water from either of said rivers to the prejudice of the parties hereto, the expenses of any litigation caused thereby shall be ratably contributed by the parties hereto in proportion to the amounts of land severally irrigated by them from such river. Each and every of the stipulations and agreements herein contained shall bind and inure to the benefit of the successors, heirs, and assigns of each and every of the parties hereto, in the same manner as if they had therein been expressly named."

[1] The deed conveying title to Luther J. Holton contained a provision to the effect that he agrees to perform all of the terms of the above-mentioned contract. The deed from Holton to Goodwin provides that the same is made subject to the stipulations contained in the deed to Holton. Taking these conveyances together, we think that the contention of the plaintiff is sound when it contends that the parties had created a covenant running with the land. Civ. Code, § 1460. When thereafter the fee to parts of these lands was conveyed to Goodwin and Holton the covenant became binding on both of those owners. Civ. Code, § 1465.

[2] When thereafter, on the 5th day of February, 1916, Goodwin and Holton entered into partition deeds, and Goodwin parted with title to certain lands, and Holton, on the other hand, parted with title as to the remaining lands theretofore owned by the two, the covenant running with the land bound each grantee in the partitioned lands as to the particular lands to which the fee vested wholly in the grantee and at the same time the covenant ceased to run against the lands title to which had been wholly transferred. The last proposition is expressly declared by statute. Section 1466 of the Civil Code provides:

"No one, merely by reason of having acquired an estate subject to a covenant running with the land, it liable for a breach of the covenant * * * after he has parted with it or ceased to enjoy its benefits."

That statute was, of course, a part of the contract as much as though it had been expressly written into it. Under the provisions of the alleged covenant running with the land, and the calls of the statute read in connection therewith, it may be conceded, for the present purposes, that Holton and Goodwin were jointly and severally liable to the plaintiff while they together held the title as tenants in common; but, upon the partitioning being had, it is equally clear that each of those owners became severally liable for his pro rata based on lands retained and at the same time each of them became discharged as to any liability to the plaintiff for any of the obligations that might thereafter arise between the plaintiff and either of said grantors of or concerning the interest in the lands title to which passed by the partition deeds. In other words, the express contract, by its own terms, immediately became a several contract.

By the partitioning had, Holton took 1,050 acres and Goodwin took 8,070 acres—Holton took 11.51 per cent. and Goodwin took 88.48 per cent. Each became liable thereafter for a share of the obligations in the same proportion, viz. Holton for $103.30, and Goodwin for $725.51. It follows that the judgment in favor of the plaintiff should have been for a sum equal to at least $705.06, the amount which the plaintiff claimed in its complaint; but the amount awarded by the trial court was only $404.40.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by F. F. Pellissier against the Whittier Water Company and others. From an order denying application for temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for respondent Whittier Water Co.

Farrand & Slosson, of Los Angeles, for respondent California Domestic Water Co.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order denying his application for a temporary injunction restraining the defendants, or either of them, pending the determination of the merits of his action, from shutting off plaintiff's water supply or disconnecting his water lines from defendants' conduit or ditch, so long as plaintiff pays to said defendants the sum of $120 a year for an amount of water not to exceed an average of two miner's inches perpetual flow for use upon plaintiff's property. Plaintiff also asked that his right to said amount of water at said price be settled and determined by the court, and, thereupon, that the defendants be permanently restrained from interfering therewith.

Briefly, the allegations of the complaint are that plaintiff's predecessors in interest in certain land described in the complaint granted to the predecessors in interest of the defendants a right of way over said land for the conduit or ditch which supplies that and other property with water; that in consideration of the grant of said right of way, the grantees agreed that they would always allow the use of water for said land now owned by plaintiff, upon the lowest terms and most favorable conditions that the water was allowed to others. By virtue of the right secured by said contract to plaintiff as successor in interest to said grantors, and by virtue of a further right which he alleges arose by reason of a subsequent contract between himself and one of the predecessors in interest of the present defendants, plaintiff claims to be entitled to water for use on his land at the rate of $120 a year, which amount he has tendered to the defendant Whittier Water Company. The said company insists that plaintiff pay for water at the rate of 5 cents for 100 cubic feet, which charge is more than twice what plaintiff contends he should pay for the same under existing contracts.

Plaintiff alleges that the defendant Whittier Water Company has notified him that, unless he immediately pay to said company the whole sum purported by said defendant company to be due from said plaintiff to said company, said defendant company will immediately cut off his water connection in said conduit or ditch, and will furnish plaintiff with no further water.

Among other allegations, the defendant Whittier Water Company, in its answer, states that the charge for water furnished to plaintiff is the usual and customary charge made by said defendant for domestic and industrial service of water as the same has been and was on file with the Railroad Commission of the state of California; that the question of extent of jurisdiction of said Railroad Commission over the rates charged and the amount of rates to be charged for water service by defendant Whittier Water Company to plaintiff and the lands of plaintiff, is now pending and undetermined before said Railroad Commission of the state of California.

The only question presented by this appeal is whether, pending the trial of the cause, the plaintiff is entitled to have a preliminary injunction restraining defendants from shutting off his water supply so long as he pays to said defendants for said water an amount less than the amount that would be due the defendants under the rate fixed by the Railroad Commission for service to the public generally. It is entirely clear from the pleadings and affidavits in the record that the defendant Whittier Water Company is not threatening to deprive the plaintiff of water in the event he pays for same the usual and customary charge at the rate on file with the Railroad Commission of the state of California. Plaintiff may, in due course, secure a determination of his alleged right to a preferential rate for water; and in the event that matter is decided in his favor, his damages are definite and certain; he would be entitled to recover the amount of the overcharge theretofore made by said defendant, which, according to the record, would be about $20 a month. As to the defendant California Domestic Water Company, it is alleged:

"That the title to the right of way for said conduit or ditch and the title to said conduit or ditch extending through plaintiff's lands became and now is vested in the defendant California Domestic Water Company, with certain rights therein vested in the defendant Whittier Water Company; but plaintiff is informed and believes, and upon information and belief alleges, that all rights of the defendant Whittier Water Company in and to said conduit or ditch and in and to said right of way for the same, are now about to terminate and cease."

It is further alleged that—

"Plaintiff has demanded of Whittier Water Company that it continue the service of water to plaintiff under the terms agreed upon, and has also "demanded of the defendant California Domestic Water Company, which said company is the legal owner of said conduit or ditch, that said company furnish him with water from said conduit or ditch and continue the service of water heretofore received by plaintiff for his needs upon said 'home place'; the said company has notified plaintiff that it will furnish him no water from said conduit or ditch either now or after the expiration of said defendant Whittier Water Company's right in and to said conduit or ditch, either at the rate agreed upon between plaintiff and the East Whittier Land and Water Company, or at any other rate, or at all; and plaintiff alleges that said defendant California Domestic Water Company will, upon the expiration of the defendant Whittier Water Company's rights in and to said conduit or ditch disconnect plaintiff's lines from said conduit or ditch and will, if said lines should now be disconnected by said Whittier Water Company, refuse to furnish plaintiff with water for his needs upon said 'home place' unless enjoined from so doing by order and decree of this court."

The California Domestic Water Company denied that the rights of the defendant Whittier Water Company in and to said conduit or ditch and said right of way were about to terminate and cease. It alleged that the East Whittier Land & Water Company, one of the successors in interest of the original grantees of the right of way, had conveyed to defendant California Domestic Water Company by deed the ditch and right of way involved here, but by said instrument said grantor reserved to itself the entire carrying capacity of said ditch and flume in excess of a capacity sufficient to carry 800 inches of water in a continuous stream; that after the conveyance to the said California Domestic Water Company, the East Whittier Land & Water Company conveyed all of its right, title, and interest in and to the aforesaid ditch to the defendant Whittier Water Company, and on the 26th day of April, 1913, said defendant Whittier Water Company was the owner of the interest in said ditch and flume reserved by the said the East Whittier Land & Water Company in its said deed to defendant California Domestic Water Company; that on the 26th day of April, 1913, said Whittier Water Company conveyed all of its right, title, and interest in and to said ditch and flume to defendant California Domestic Water Company; that said defendant California Domestic Water Company ever since has been and is now the owner of said ditch and flume.

The ultimate questions, raised upon this state of facts, as to the obligation of California Domestic Water Company, as the present owner of the ditch and right of way, to furnish plaintiff water in accordance with the terms of the instrument on which he relies, are not presented to us upon this appeal; that matter will be examined into on its merits by the trial court when a trial is had.

Upon the question of the necessity or propriety of a preliminary injunction against defendant California Domestic Water Company, we find the following allegations in the answer of said defendant: That the California Domestic Water Company has never delivered to plaintiff any water whatsoever on account of plaintiff's alleged rights and claims under said deed referred to in plaintiff's complaint; that the California Domestic Water Company has never delivered to plaintiff any water at all; that at all times since October 15, 1902, the said East Whittier Land & Water Company, and its successor, the Whittier Water Company, have delivered water to the said plaintiff; that at all times since its incorporation in 1902 the California Domestic Water Company has been a mutual water company; that all of the water owned and developed by said company is needed for the use of its stockholders, and all thereof has been for many years past used by its stockholders for beneficial purposes. It is further alleged that by a certain instrument, bearing date of April 26, 1919, the California Domestic Water Company leased to said Whittier Water Company, for a period of three years, the right to transport through the ditch involved here a certain amount of water; that the rights and privileges secured to said Whittier Water Company by said instrument expire on April 26, 1922; that the California Domestic Water Company is willing that the Whittier Water Company continue to transport said amount of water through said ditch for the purpose of supplying its customers and all persons to whom it may have delivered water heretofore, including the plaintiff, provided it pays to said California Domestic Water Company the reasonable value of the use of such portion of said conduit necessary to transport said amount of water.

[1-4] It appears from the foregoing that the California Domestic Water Company has never furnished water to plaintiff, and does not deny to the Whittier Water Company the right to transport its water through the ditch and supply the plaintiff, provided it pays the reasonable value of such a privilege, and the Whittier Water Company has alleged that it will continue to supply plaintiff with water through said ditch, provided he pays the rate established by the Railroad Commission. The plaintiff, therefore, while awaiting a determination of his rights in a trial of the action on its merits, can suffer no irreparable injury. His damage, if any, can be accurately measured by any overcharge which he may pay for water. Such a state of facts does not warrant the issuance of an injunction pendente lite. The remedy by injunction is summary, peculiar, and extraordinary, and it ought not to be issued except for the prevention of great and irreparable injury. Relief by injunction must always rest in the sound discretion of the court, governed by the nature of the case, and will be granted, ordinarily, only where there can be no adequate pecuniary compensation because it would be difficult or impossible to ascertain the damages resulting from an act, as in such a case the legal remedy fails. But where damages can be accurately measured and will fully compensate for any loss that may be suffered by plaintiff, as in the present case, an injunction is not proper. Unless there is a clear abuse of discretion, this court will not overthrow the order of a trial court in granting or refusing a preliminary injunction. Miller & Lux v. Madera Canal, etc., Co., 155 Cal. 59, 62, 99 Pac. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391.

directing them to declare petitioner elected a director of said district, and requiring issuance of a certificate of election. Writ denied.

Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, for petitioner.

W H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. An application was made to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandate, commanding the directors of the Honcut-Yuba irrigation district to declare petitioner elected to the office of director of division 1 of said district, and commanding one F. M. Turner, secretary of said board of directors, to issue to petitioner a certificate of election to such office. The Supreme Court ordered the alternative writ to issue, and made it returnable before this court. The parties appeared and agreed upon the facts as follows: The Honcut irrigation district is a duly organized and existing irrigation district. The individual defendants named as directors were the duly elected, qualified, and acting directors thereof. The defendant Turner is the duly appointed, qualified, and acting secretary of the board of directors. The district is divided into five divisions, numbered 1 to 5, inclusive, and in the petition for organization the prayer was, and the supervisors so ordered, in establishing the district and fixing its boundaries, that the election of directors in the district be at large. Charles F. Cox and C. N. Hill were the directors of divisions 1 and 5 respectively. On June 27, 1922, an election was held in the district for the purpose of determining whether or not said Cox and Hill should be recalled from office. At said election a majority of the votes cast at large in the district and the majority of the votes cast in divisions 1 and 5 favored the recall of said directors. At said election petitioner was a duly nominated and qualified candidate for the office of director representing division 1, and J. L. Jackheck was also a candidate for said division. At said election in the district at large petitioner received 20 votes, and Jackheck received 54 for said office of director of division 1. In division 1 petitioner received 7 votes and Jackheck none, there being no other candidate for said division; on July 3, 1922, the board of directors canvassed the returns of said election and ascertained the result as above stated. After such canvass petitioner demanded of said board and each member thereof that they declare him elected to the office of director of division 1, and thereupon demanded of said secretary that he make out and deliver to petitioner a certificate of election to said office. The said board and members thereof declined and refused to declare petitioner elected to said office, and the secretary likewise refused to issue to him a certificate of election.

ABBEY v. BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF HONCUT-YUBA IRR. DIST. et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 19, 1922.)

1. Waters and water courses ⟸227—Directors of irrigation district composed of five divisions may be elected at large, if so ordered by board of supervisors.

Under Irrigation District Act, § 5, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1368, directors of an irrigation district composed of five divisions can be elected at large, if it is so ordered by the board of supervisors in response to request in petition for establishment of the district.

2. Statutes ⟸197—"And" may be substituted for "or," and vice versa.

Whenever necessary to arrive at the evident intent of a statute, courts will substitute "and" for "or," and vice versa.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitons, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, And; Or.]

Application by E. W. Abbey for writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to Board of Directors of Honcut-Yuba Irrigation District,

[1] The main discussion relates to the question whether the directors of an irrigation district composed of five divisions can be elected at large if it is so ordered by the board of supervisors, or must they be elected by the electors of each division separately, notwithstanding such order. Confessedly, the solution of this question depends upon the proper construction of section 5 of the Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 255) as amended by Stats. 1915, p. 1368, as follows:

"If, on said final hearing, the boundaries of the proposed district are defined and established, said board shall make an order dividing said district into five divisions, as nearly equal in size as may be practicable, which shall be numbered first, second, third, fourth and fifth, and one director shall be elected for each division by the electors thereof; provided, that if so requested in said petition, the board may order that there shall be only three divisions in said district, and that only three directors be elected, and that the directors may be elected by the district at large, or by divisions, as such petition shall provide, but in any event such directors shall be elected to represent separate divisions and shall be residents of the respective divisions they are elected to represent."

In our opinion section 5 of the act under consideration plainly authorizes the board of supervisors to order that the directors of an irrigation district of five divisions shall be elected at large. The proviso contained in section 5 permits two departures from the general requirements of the preceding parts of the section: (1) The establishment of three instead of five divisions, with one director for each division; (2) the election of directors by the district at large. There is nothing in the language of the proviso indicative of an intent to limit such election at large to districts of three divisions. One of the exceptions must necessarily precede the other in the wording of the proviso, and it is unimportant which is stated first. If the position of the exceptions were transposed, the latter then preceding the former, it would hardly be contended that the board could not provide for the election of directors at large in districts of five divisions.

The conclusion that the Legislature intended to authorize the election of directors at large, whether three or five, is fortified by other provisions of the act and by the history of the legislation on the subject. In the amendment of 1891 to the Wright Act, it is provided that—"The board of supervisors may, if so requested in the petition, order that there may be either three or five directors, as said board may order, for such district, and that they may be elected by the district at large." Stats. 1891, p. 142.

The amendment further provides that, upon presentation of a proper petition, the board of directors may "order that on and after the next ensuing general election for the district, there shall be either three or five directors, as said board may order, and that they shall be elected by the district at large, or by divisions, as so petitioned and ordered." It is conceded that either of these provisions authorized the election of five directors at large.

[2] In defining the duties of the board of supervisors in the organization of a district, section 5 of the act of 1897 provided:

"That if so requested in said petition, the board may order that there shall be only three divisions in said district, and that only three directors be elected, or that they be elected for the district at large."

If the meaning of this provision is to be determined in strict accordance with its grammatical construction, it does not authorize the election at large of directors in a district of three divisions, because the use of the word "or" in such connection presents a choice. Webster defines the word as:

"A particle that marks an alternative as, you may read or may write—that is, you may do one of the things at your pleasure, but not both. It corresponds to either. You may ride either to London or to Windsor. It often connects a series of words or propositions, presenting a choice of either."

Under a strict grammatical construction, the provision would authorize the election of directors at large in a district of five divisions, else it would have no application, but not in a district of three divisions. But, of course, statutes are not to be construed with any such nicety of discrimination as to the use of words in obvious disregard of the legislative intent as gathered from the whole act. Whenever necessary to arrive at the evident intent of a statute, courts will substitute "and" for "or," and vice versa. Washburn v. Lyons, 97 Cal. 314, 32 Pac. 310; Geiger v. Koblika, 26 Wash. 171, 66 Pac. 423, 90 Am. St. Rep. 733; Union Ins. Co. v. United States, 6 Wall. 759, 18 L. Ed. 879. Section 28 of the act of 1897 provides that—

Upon presentation of a proper petition as therein provided, the board of directors may "order that on and after the next ensuing general election for the district, there shall be either three or five directors, as said board may order, and they shall be elected by the district at large, or by divisions, as so petitioned and ordered."

No one would contend that this section does not authorize the election of five directors at large. From a consideration of the whole act, it clearly appears that it was the intent to authorize provision for the election of directors at large in districts of three divisions as well as in those of five. If these conclusions are well founded, then from 1891 to 1915 it was permissible to provide, either by the board of supervisors in the organization of a district or by the board of directors thereafter, for either three or five directors, and that in either case they be elected at large or by divisions. A legislative intent to change the procedure consistently in operation for a period of 24 years ought not to be presumed, in the absence of clear language indicating such intent.

In 1915, the Legislature, in one act, amended sections 5 and 28. Stats. 1915, p. 1367. Section 5 as so amended, and as it now stands, directs that the board of supervisors, in the organization of a district, divide it into five divisions, and that one director be elected by each division, and then provides:

"That if so requested in said petition, the board may order that there shall be only three divisions in said district, and that only three directors be elected, and that the directors may be elected by the district at large, or by divisions, as such petition shall provide."

The word "and" is defined by Webster as:

"A particle which expresses the relation of connection or addition."

In the clause providing for the election of directors at large, the word "and" is undoubtedly used to express the relation of addition, and not that of connection in the sense that the clause which it introduces is limited in its application to the preceding clause. The substitution of "and" for "or," as the latter word appeared in the statute of 1897, eliminates all question as to whether a choice was intended. From the use of the word "they" in the corresponding clause of the statute of 1897 it might be argued that the pronoun related only to its nearest antecedent. The amendment of 1915 removes all doubt by substituting "the directors" in place of the pronoun in the earlier statute. The expression "that the directors may be elected by the district at large" is couched in language so broad and comprehensive that it cannot, in any sense, be said to be limited to the "three directors" mentioned in the preceding clause.

By the same act section 28 was amended to provide:

"In any district the board of directors thereof must, upon a presentation of the petition therefor, by a majority of the holders of title, or evidence of title, of said district, evidenced as above provided, order that on and after the next ensuing general election for the district, there shall be either three or five directors, and that they shall be elected by the district at large, or by divisions as such petition shall provide."

Clearly, under section 28 as so amended, the directors of a district of five divisions were required, upon presentation of the petition provided for, to order the election of directors at large. If it were conceded that the language of section 5 is uncertain or ambiguous, the certain provisions of section 28, enacted at the same time and in the same act, are such as to remove the uncertainty or ambiguity. The Legislature must be presumed to have intended a consistent and harmonious scheme for the government of irrigation districts organized under the act, and no reason can be assigned for denying, in one section, the authority to provide, on proper petition, for the election of directors at large in the organization of a district of five divisions and in the next section requiring the directors to so provide upon presentation of a similar petition.

"It is well settled that in the construction of statutes, for the purpose of ascertaining the legislative intent, regard is to be had not so much to the exact phraseology in which that intent has been expressed, as to the general tenor and scope of the entire legislative scheme embodied in the act. Mere philology often sticks in the bark, and so becomes an obstruction rather than an aid to a correct exposition of the meaning of the statute." Palache v. Pacific Ins. Co., 42 Cal. 418, 430.

"A statute should always be so construed, if reasonably possible, as to give each part thereof the meaning and effect which, from the act as a whole, appears to have been intended. A narrow or restricted meaning should not be given to a word, if it would result in an evasion of the evident purpose of the act, when a permissible, but broader, meaning would prevent the evasion and carry out that purpose." In re Reineger, 184 Cal. 97, 103, 193 Pac. 81, 83.

If a semicolon were substituted for the comma after the clause "that only three directors be elected," it would be obvious that the provision for the election of directors at large was intended to apply to districts of five divisions as well as those of three. Punctuation is not usually a controlling factor in the interpretation of statutes.

"For the purpose of arriving at the true meaning of a statute, courts read with such stops as are manifestly required." United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 10 Sup. Ct. 625, 33 L. Ed. 1080.

The fact that section 28 has been amended since 1915 is not material in arriving at the legislative intent in the act of that year. The intent of the proviso in section 5, as amended in 1915, and which has not since been changed, could not be affected by subsequent amendments of other sections not inconsistent with the proviso. The legislative scheme, as disclosed by the amendatory act of 1915, and by prior legislation on the subject, seems plain. If so requested in the petition for the formation of the district, the supervisors were and are given authority to order the election of directors at large, whether three or five. If not so ordered, then it was within the power of the board of directors, upon the presentation of a similar petition, to order the election of such directors at large. Whether construed in strict accordance with its own terms, or in the light of "the general tenor and scope of the entire legislative scheme embodied in the act," section 5, in our opinion, authorizes the board of supervisors to provide for the election of directors at large, whether the number of divisions in the district be three or five.

The order to show cause is discharged, and the writ denied.

PEOPLE v. PEARSON. (Cr. 892.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 4, 1922. Rehearing Denied Nov. 3, 1922.)

1. Rape ⟸51(1)—Evidence held to justify verdict of guilty.

In a rape prosecution, evidence of prosecutrix and admission of defendant justified a verdict of guilty.

2. Witnesses ⟸266—Refusal to rule on questions before they were asked not error.

In a rape prosecution, where defendant's attorney stated he intended to cross-examine prosecutrix as to opportunity which she may have had to become pregnant through intercourse with some one other than defendant, the court's refusal to rule on questions before they were asked was not a curtailment of the cross-examination, and, where no objection was sustained to any question, the answer to which contradicted facts related by prosecutrix, there was no error.

3. Criminal law ⟸789(4)—Instruction on reasonable doubt correct statement of law.

An instruction that "it is sufficient if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt from all the evidence in the case the crime charged was committed" was a correct statement of the law.

Simon Pearson was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Verge, O. V. Willson, and J. B. Joujon-Roche, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. [1] Defendant was convicted of rape. The complaining witness, a girl of 15 years, is a niece of defendant's wife. There is no dispute as to the fact that on the morning of the 1st day of July, 1921, while the complaining witness was visiting in the home of her aunt and the defendant, the aunt arose early and left the house to go for some coffee. When she left the niece was asleep. The complaining witness testified that when she awoke the defendant was in her bed, and that she was wet about her private parts, and that afterwards they were sore; that she felt the soreness inside the genital organs. Later, when she failed to menstruate, the services of a physician were secured. Two physicians testified that in their opinion the evidence which they found showed that she had been pregnant; that a miscarriage or abortion had taken place, and that the pregnancy lasted from about four to six months. A written statement signed by defendant was introduced in evidence, in which he admitted that he had gotten into the bed of the complaining witness while she was asleep and during the absence of his wife from the house. The details of the contents of this writing need not be recited here, but it constituted an admission by the defendant that he attempted an act of sexual intercourse with the complaining witness, and did everything necessary to do this except to accomplish penetration. This admission, with the evidence of the girl and the physicians, is sufficient to justify the jury in returning a verdict of guilty. It follows that the court was correct in denying the defendant's motion to advise the jury to acquit.

[2] Appellant insists that the trial court erroneously curtailed the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness. From a statement made by counsel for the defendant it appears that he intended to cross-examine concerning any opportunity which the prosecutrix may have had to become pregnant through intercourse with some one other than the defendant. Counsel attempted to make an offer of proof, and stated that he desired to cross-examine the witness with reference to her relations with other boys. However, the record shows that the court repeatedly informed counsel that no ruling would be made except as questions were asked and objections made thereto. Near the conclusion of the discussion upon this matter the court said:

"I am not going to designate how to try your case. You go ahead and try it, and I will rule on the facts as they come. * * * Now, as to any question that you might ask other than the general question, I can't rule on it until your question is asked, and then I will rule on it."

The court did not sustain an objection to a question the answer to which could directly or inferentially contradict the facts related by the complaining witness. For all that appears in the record, had the questions contemplated been asked, objections to them doubtless would have been overruled.

[3] There was no error in giving the instruction:

"It is sufficient if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt from all the evidence in the case that the crime charged has been committed."

That that is a correct statement of the law is elementary.

Appellant complains concerning the refusal to give certain other instructions, but from a careful examination of the entire charge to the jury we are satisfied that no error was committed in this regard, and that the charge as a whole informed the jury correctly upon all of the points requested, although in somewhat different language from that suggested. We find no merit in the other allegations of error contained in the appellant's brief.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J.

BIAGGI v. RAMONT et al. (Sac. 3168.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 9, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸933(4)—General order granting new trial presumed on appeal not to have been based on insufficiency of evidence.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, providing several causes upon which motion for new trial can be based, where the general order granting a motion for new trial did not designate therein any reason for the action, it will be presumed on appeal that the motion was not based on insufficiency of evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⟸714(6)—Certificate of judge that granting motion for new trial was for insufficiency of evidence not considered when dehors record.

Where, on appeal from an order granting new trial, a certificate of the judge was presented which stated that the motion was granted because of insufficiency of evidence and an application was made for an order causing the transcript to be returned to the trial court to permit a nunc pro tunc order correcting the record to recite what actually took place, the certificate, being dehors the record, cannot be considered.

⟸For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

3. Appeal and error ⊜659(1)—Method of correcting omission in record of statement as to reason for granting new trial stated.

Where the order granting a motion for new trial did not state that it was granted for insufficiency of evidence, the proper way to present the matter would be by a nunc pro tunc order made by the trial court, which could have been incorporated in the transcript of the record on appeal on a motion for diminution of the record.

4. Appeal and error ⊜440—Right of lower court to correct clerical omissions not suspended by appeal.

The right of the lower court to correct clerical omissions is not suspended or impeded by an appeal.

5. Appeal and error ⊜867(2)—Omission of record to state that new trial was granted for insufficiency of evidence precludes consideration of question on appeal, unless evidence insufficient in law.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, providing for new trial for several causes, where an order granting a new trial did not designate any reason for such action, the Supreme Court is precluded from considering whether the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict, unless it is insufficient in law and without conflict in any material point.

6. Taxation ⊜745—Tax deed from collector to the state only deed authorized at time of tax sale.

Where at the time of a tax sale, Pol. Code, § 3771, provided that property delinquent for taxes should be sold to the state, section 3776 provided that the collector should make a certificate of such delinquent sale, section 3780 provided that the owner might make redemption within five years or at any time prior to entry or sale by the state, and section 3785 provided that, if no redemption was made, the collector must make the state a deed of the property, a deed made by the collector "to the highest bidder" was void.

7. Taxation ⊜696—Law at time of tax sale governs right of redemption.

The law existing at the time of a tax sale governed the sale and regulated the right of redemption.

8. Trial ⊜337—Fact that jury disregarded instructions as to evidentiary weight of recitals in deed did not make the verdict against law.

The fact that the jury disregarded instructions as to the evidentiary weight of recitals in a deed improperly admitted in evidence does not make the verdict against law.

9. Quieting title ⊜47(1)—Where execution of quitclaim deed disputed, instruction on prima facie presumptions arising from certificate of acknowledgment should have been given.

Where in action to quiet title defendant claimed by quitclaim deed, which the grantor disputed, but his testimony was uncertain and not free from suspicious circumstances, an instruction on the prima facie presumptions of law arising from a certificate of acknowledgment, and that an identity of person is to be presumed from an identity of name, should have been given (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1948, 1963, subd. 25).

10. Deeds ⊜121—Quitclaim deed transfers title.

A quitclaim deed is as efficient to transfer title as a grant, bargain, and sale deed.

11. Appeal and error ⊜977(3)—Order granting new trial conclusive on appeal, unless abuse of discretion appears.

On appeal from an order granting a new trial, the action of the trial court will not be disturbed, if upon any hypothesis it can be sustained, and is conclusive unless an abuse of discretion appears.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action to quiet title by George Biaggi against W. F. Ramont and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. R. Biaggi and H. A. Gabriel, both of San Jose, for appellant.

Dennett & Zion, of Modesto, for respondents.

WASTE, J. [1] This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial. The plaintiff, out of possession, brought an ordinary action to quiet title. The defendants Ramont, husband and wife, answered, alleging ownership in fee simple, possession and right of possession in themselves, and set up certain proceedings under sales for delinquent taxes, whereby they claimed to have acquired title to the property. The cause was tried with a jury. The only special issue requested was refused by the court, and the jury returned a general verdict "for the plaintiff." No findings were made, and the only judgment entered was that plaintiff recover his costs. Defendants thereupon made a motion for a new trial, specifying as grounds insufficiency of the evidence, that the verdict was against law, and errors in law occurring at the trial. The court granted the motion, and the clerk entered a general order to that effect, without designating therein any reason for such action. Consequently, on the face of the record as presented here, it will be presumed that the motion was not based on the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

[2, 3] Respondents assert that as a matter of fact the court granted the motion for a new trial because of the insufficiency of the evidence, among other reasons, and so stated at the time, but that the fact was not made to appear through an erroneous entry of the order by the clerk. They present here a certificate of the judge who tried the case, which so states, and make application for an order causing the transcript to be returned to the trial court to permit a nunc pro tunc order to be made, correcting the record so that it shall recite what actually took place. Such a certificate is dehors the record, and may not be considered. The proper way to have presented the matter, had either party deemed it of importance, would have been by a nunc pro tunc order made by the trial court, which could have been incorporated in the transcript here on a motion for a diminution of the record. Newmire v. Schacht, etc., Truck Co., 22 Cal. App. 308, 310, 134 Pac. 336.

[4, 5] The right of the lower court to correct the clerical omission of the clerk was not suspended or impeded by the appeal. Boyd v. Burrel, 60 Cal. 280, 284; Fay v. Stubenrauch, 141 Cal. 573, 575, 75 Pac. 174. Nor was the court precluded from correcting the entry merely because the record itself did not show that it was incorrect. Kaufman v. Shain, 111 Cal. 16, 21, 43 Pac. 393, 52 Am. St. Rep. 139. Because of the provision of section 657, supra, we are precluded from considering the question whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict, unless it is insufficient in law, and without conflict in any material point. Read v. Pac. Electric Ry. Co., 185 Cal. 520, 197 Pac. 791.

The plaintiff relied on title in himself, acquired in 1919, by a grant, bargain, and sale deed from "Anton Alves," who purchased the property from George Perley in 1889. The proper chain of title from the United States patent down to Alves is contained in the record. The respondents introduced in evidence, over the objection of the plaintiff, the record of a certificate of sale of real estate, showing that the property was sold to the state of California by the tax collector of Stanislaus county, July 1, 1910, because of nonpayment by Alves of the state and county taxes for the year 1909. The record of the certificate contained the following additional notations:

"State and County Taxes for fiscal year 1910 and 1911 not paid. See Vol. ... page 1, Roll of 1910. State and County Taxes for fiscal year 1911 and 1912 not paid. See Vol. ... page 1 Roll of 1911. State and County Taxes for fiscal year 1912 and 1913 not paid. See Vol. .... page 1 Roll of 1913. Redeemed this 3rd day of July 1915 by R. C. Payne by payment to County Treasurer of the sum of $16 no/100."

There was also introduced the record of a tax deed from the tax collector, purporting to convey the property to R. Crossman Payne, and dated July 2, 1915. On February 27, 1918, Payne, by grant, bargain and sale deed, conveyed the property to the defendant W. F. Ramont, and there was introduced in evidence a purported quitclaim deed from Anton Alves to the same defendant, dated November 27, 1918.

On the foregoing record the case presented is one in which the appellant rests upon a good chain of title and conveyance to himself, and the respondents claim by reason of a purported tax title from the state, and a purported quitclaim deed from the delinquent owner, who is also plaintiff's grantor. The plaintiff made timely objection in the court below to the introduction of the records showing the various steps in the acquisition of the tax title by the respondents. The objections were overruled, and the records were admitted, but no evidence was introduced to vary or contradict their recitals in any particular. In determining that the verdict is, or is not, against law, we are first led to a consideration of the question whether or not the certificate of sale for delinquent taxes, the assessment roll, and the purported tax deed are, in themselves, sufficient evidence of title in respondents.

[6, 7] It at once appears that the deed from the tax collector is void on its face. The property was sold to the state of California on July 1, 1910, for the nonpayment of taxes for the year 1909. No deed was ever executed by the tax collector to the state, and the state has never deeded the property to any one. At the time of the sale, section 3771 of the Political Code provided that all property delinquent, upon which the taxes, penalties, and costs had not been paid, should, by operation of law and the declaration of the tax collector, be sold to the state. Stats. 1895, p. 327. Section 3776 provided that the tax collector should make out a certificate of such delinquent tax sale, and specified what it should contain. Under section 3780 a redemption of the property sold might be made by the owner, or any party in interest, within five years from the date of the sale to the state, or at any time prior to the entry or sale by the state. Stats. 1895, p. 328. Section 3785 provided that if no redemption was made within such five-year period, the tax collector, or his successor, must make the state a deed of the property (the italics ours), the instrument to contain certain recitals. Stats. 1909, p. 921. The law existing at the time of the sale governed the case, and regulated the right of redemption. Johnson v. Taylor, 150 Cal. 201, 205, 88 Pac. 903, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, 119 Am. St. Rep. 181; Walsh v. Burke, 134 Cal. 594, 66 Pac. 866; Main v. Thornton, 20 Cal. App. 194, 196, 128 Pac. 766. The instrument introduced in evidence by the respondents is not "a deed to the state," the only conveyance authorized by the law (section 3785, supra) in force when the sale was made in 1910. It would seem that the tax collector attempted to make a deed of the property "to the highest bidder," under section 3771 of the Political Code, as amended in 1913 (St. 1913, p. 557) and in the form presented by section 3785b, which was added to the Code the same year (St. 1913, p. 558). As a result respondents introduced in evidence a void deed, which showed no title or interest in themselves, under their purported tax title, sufficient to defeat the title and claim of the appellant. Jones v. Luckel, 174 Cal. 532, 534, 163 Pac. 906; McArthur v. Goodwin, 173 Cal. 499, 160 Pac. 679; Bublitz v. Reeves, 40 Cal. App. 75, 180 Pac. 28. Aside from the foregoing conclusion it may be well to note that the deed is not in proper form in any event. Pol. Code, §§ 3785, 3785b. It seems to be the form prescribed for conveyances from the state in those cases in which the state has become the owner of property which has been sold for taxes, and the deed to the state has been filed with the controller. Pol. Code, §§ 3897, 3898.

[8] Respondents complain that the jury returned a verdict not in accord with the instructions of the court. "The only evidence before the jury," they say, "except plaintiff's and defendants' chain of title, and evidence as to the identity of Alves, were the records of the tax sales above mentioned. These, the court instructed the jury, were prima facie evidence of the facts set forth, and since no other evidence of any kind was introduced, or offered, the jury clearly violated the instructions of the court, and brought in a verdict contrary thereto, and contrary to law, and evidently the court so held by setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial." Aside from giving a general instruction as to the burden of proof, the number and credibility of witnesses, requested by the respondents, the trial judge, at the instance of the appellant, read to the jury certain sections of the Political Code relating to the evidentiary effect and conclusiveness of the recitals in tax deeds, and to the resale of lands sold to the state. The reading of these sections could in no degree have prejudiced respondents' cause. The tax deed introduced in evidence was void, but the jury was no doubt led by the giving of the instruction to believe that the court was of the opinion that the instrument was valid. The fact that the jury disregarded instructions as to the evidentiary weight of recitals in a deed improperly admitted in evidence does not make the verdict against law. Tousley v. Pac. El. Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 457, 462, 137 Pac. 31.

[9, 10] Certain errors of law are relied upon by the respondents to justify the order granting a new trial. Considerable doubt was injected into the record as to whether the "Anton Alves" who executed a quitclaim deed of the property to respondent Ramont in 1918 was the same person who executed the grant, bargain, and sale deed of the same property to the appellant in 1919. Respondents requested the trial court to submit to the jury, as a special issue, the question whether or not the deed purporting to "grant" the property to Ramont was "executed by the Anton Alves who owned the property," and in that connection they requested an instruction on the question of the presumptions of law arising from certificates of acknowledgments, and from identity of names. The court refused to submit the special issue, which as framed did not literally conform to the fact, and did not give the instruction. The special issue could have been easily corrected by changing the word "grant" to "quitclaim," and, notwithstanding the discretion vested in trial courts as to giving or refusing special issues, we think the question might well have been submitted to the jury. The plaintiff deraigned title through Anton Alves by a deed from the latter made in 1919. The defendants claimed through a tax title which was void on its face. But defendants also claim through a quitclaim deed from Anton Alves made in 1918. They produced that deed in evidence, regular on its face, duly acknowledged and certified by a notary public. A quitclaim deed is as efficient to transfer title as a grant, bargain, and sale deed. Graff v. Middleton, 43 Cal. 341, 344; Myers v. City of Oceanside, 7 Cal. App. 87, 93, 93 Pac. 686. If the Anton Alves who executed and acknowledged defendants' deed was the same Anton Alves who owned the land in question, it necessarily follows that title is in the defendants and not in the plaintiff. Thus the question of identity was the vital question in the case.

Plaintiff produced one Anton Alves as a witness, who testified that he was the man who owned the land; that he executed the deed to plaintiff in 1919, and that he did not execute the deed to defendants in 1918. But his testimony was uncertain and unsatisfactory, and not free from suspicious circumstances. The jury under proper instructions might have discredited and disbelieved it.

[11] In this state of the case the court should have given an instruction as requested by defendants, on the prima facie presumptions of law arising from a certificate of acknowledgment, and that an identity of person is to be presumed from identity of name. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1948, 1963, subd. 25. On an appeal from an order granting a new trial the action of the trial court will not be disturbed if upon any hypothesis it can be sustained. Its action is conclusive upon this court, unless an abuse of discretion is made to appear. Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 506, 508, 123 Pac. 288; Union Lumber Co. v. Webster, 15 Cal. App. 165, 113 Pac. 891.

No other error of law found in the record presents a cause for a new trial, and we will presume that the court below reached the conclusion that it had failed to instruct the jury on a vital matter upon which an instruction had been requested.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

Ex parte PEPPERS. (Cr. 2461.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 9, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⊜13—Act regarding shipment of frosted oranges held too vague to form basis of criminal prosecution.

St. 1921, p. 1239, § 10, providing that oranges shall be considered unfit for shipment when frosted to the extent of endangering the reputation of the citrus industry, if shipped, is too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to form the basis of a criminal prosecution.

2. Constitutional law ⊜62—Act held void as delegating legislative authority to administrative board.

St. 1921, pp. 1235, 1241, §§ 4, 15, 16, empowering the director of agriculture and his agents to declare oranges unfit for shipment when frosted to the extent of endangering the reputation of the citrus industry, is void, as delegating to an administrative board the legislative power of determining what acts or omissions of an individual are unlawful.

In Bank.

Application by T. H. Peppers for a writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure release from custody on a charge of violation of "the California Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act." Writ granted.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, for petitioner.

Thos. L. Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and T. C. Becker, both of Los Angeles, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Jno. W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. Application for writ of habeas corpus. The applicant was charged by a complaint in the justices' court of Los Angeles township, county of Los Angeles, with the violation of the provisions of an act of the Legislature approved June 3, 1921, known as "the California Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act" (St. 1921, p. 1234). The complaint was in three counts, by the first of which the applicant was charged with a misdemeanor in having offered for shipment to a common carrier at Downey, within said county, three boxes of oranges which had not been inspected or passed upon by the county horticultural commission of said county or any of his deputies, as is required by the rules and regulations established by the director of the state department of agriculture, respecting shipments of oranges, then in full force and effect. By the second count in said complaint the applicant herein was charged with having committed a misdemeanor consisting in having willfully and unlawfully packed, shipped, and offered for shipment at Downey, in said county, three boxes of oranges, which oranges were not virtually free from serious defect in this, that the contents of said boxes of oranges contained 15 per cent. or more of oranges showing marked evidence of frost injury, to wit, drying in 20 per cent. or more of the exposed pulp as shown on a transverse through the center, and having a water-soaked appearance showing on two or more segments, and having the presence of crystals and crystalline deposits on two or more segments as defined in and provided by the rules and regulations established by the director of the state department of agriculture respecting shipments of oranges, then in full force and effect. By the third count in said complaint it was charged that the applicant herein had committed a misdemeanor by having willfully and unlawfully packed, shipped, and delivered for shipment to a common carrier at Downey, in said county, three boxes of oranges which were "unfit for shipment in this, that said oranges were frosted to the extent of endangering the reputation of the citrus industry, if shipped."

It is the contention of the applicant herein that as to the first count in said complaint the prosecution cannot be maintained for the reason that while the act of 1921 empowered the director of agriculture of the state of California "to define, promulgate and enforce such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of this act," there was not enacted any provision declaring that a violation of such rules and regulations should be a crime, and hence that the applicant could not be successfully prosecuted for a violation of such rules and regulations under the authority of In re Potter, 164 Cal. 735, 130 Pac. 721. The respondent concedes the force of said contention under said authority, but still insists that the said rules and regulations of the state director of agriculture may be read, construed, and held effective in definition and aid of the provision of the statute claimed to have been violated in the other two counts of said complaint. Whether or not this would be true depends upon whether the provision of the statute claimed to have been violated by the other two counts of the complaint is not of itself too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to either furnish, standing alone, the basis for a criminal prosecution, or to be susceptible of being aided by the rules and regulations of the department of agriculture. If it is found to be so, the other two counts in said complaint must also fail.

In this view of the case the questions raised upon this application involve the interpretation to be given to the provisions of the act in relation to the shipment of oranges, claimed to be defective through having been frosted, and involve also the scope of the powers and functions of the state director of agriculture, with special reference to the shipment of oranges in alleged violation of these provisions of said act.

The California Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act is declared in its title to be "an act to promote the development of the California fruit, nut and vegetable industry in state and interstate markets, and to protect the state's reputation in these markets by establishing standards and standard packages for certain fruits, nuts and vegetables specified therein, and to prevent deception in the packing and sale of fruits, nuts and vegetables, to provide for the certification of fruits and vegetables including the payment of fees; to prescribe penalties for violation of the provisions hereof," etc. Stats. 1921, c. 719, p. 1234. By section 4 of said act "the director of agriculture is hereby empowered, * * * to enforce all the provisions of this act." By section 15 of said act "the director of agriculture is empowered to define, promulgate and enforce such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of this act"; the provisions of said act having particular reference to oranges are embraced in that portion of section 10 thereof which reads as follows:

"Oranges shall be deemed properly matured for shipment or sale under the provisions of this act when the juice contains soluble solids equal to or in excess of eight parts to every part of acid contained in the juice, the acidity of the juice to be calculated as citric acid without water of crystallization; provided, that the oranges have attained at least twenty-five per cent. yellow or orange color before picking, and oranges which are substantially or at least seventy per cent. colored at the time of picking shall be deemed properly matured for shipment or sale, irrespective of analysis of the juice. When packed, shipped, delivered for shipment, offered for sale or sold, oranges shall be virtually free from insect and fungous diseases and other serious defects. Oranges shall be considered unfit for shipment when frosted to the extent of endangering the reputation of the citrus industry, if shipped. The foregoing provisions shall not apply to shipments of oranges to foreign countries other than the Dominion of Canada, during any season, provided such shipments are made after the first day of November."

[1] The particular portion of the foregoing provisions of said act brought in question by the applicant's attack upon the two remaining counts in said complaint is the provision therein that—

"Oranges shall be considered unfit for shipment when frosted to the extent of endangering the reputation of the citrus industry, if shipped."

It is the applicant's contention that the above-quoted clause in said act is too vague, indefinite, and uncertain, standing alone, to furnish the basis of a criminal prosecution such as is sought by the third count of said complaint; and that it is also too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to furnish the basis for such a definition thereof by the department of agriculture, as is alleged in, and attempted to be enforced by, the second count of said complaint. We are of the opinion that both of these contentions must be sustained. Considering the said clause in said act by itself and unaided by the attempted definition of the department of agriculture, it will be seen that it does not purport to forbid the shipment of all the frosted oranges. It thus concedes that oranges may be frosted and may still be the proper subject of shipment and consumption without in any way "endangering the reputation of the citrus industry." What defect then shall render certain of such oranges unfit for shipment as "endangering the reputation of the citrus industry"? What is the reputation of the citrus industry? Is it for the production and shipment of oranges of a certain standard of color, or of sweetness, or of juiciness, or of palatability? How is the producer whose oranges have been touched with frost to know, from the terms of this act, whether or when he will be violating it in offering his fruit for shipment? By what standard is the complainant to reach the conclusion that the provisions of this clause of the act are being violated by one shipper and not by another? What limitation is therein placed upon the power of the magistrate or of the jury to arbitrarily determine that one shipper of frosted oranges has violated the statute, and that another, shipping precisely the same quality of oranges, has not? The vice of this sort of legislation is quite aptly pointed out in the case of U. S. v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214, 23 L. Ed. 563, in which the court says:

"If the Legislature undertakes to define a new offense, and provide for its punishment, it should express its will in language that need not deceive the common mind: Every man should be able to know with certainty when he is committing a crime. * * * It would certainly be dangerous if the Legislature could set a net large enough to catch all possible offenders, and leave it to the courts to step inside and see who could be rightfully detained, and who should be set at large."

In the case of Louisville, etc., Railroad Co. v. Commonwealth, 99 Ky. 132, 35 S. W. 129, 33 L. R. A. 209, 59 Am. St. Rep. 457, wherein the court was considering the validity of an act providing that a railroad company should not charge more than a reasonable or just rate of fare for the transportation of passengers, the court, in holding the act void for uncertainty, said:

"There is no standard whatever fixed by the statute, or attempted to be fixed, by which the carrier may regulate his conduct; and it seems clear to us to be entirely repugnant to our system of laws to punish a person for an act, the criminality of which depends, not upon any standard erected by the law which may be known in advance but on one erected by a jury. And especially so as that standard must be as variable and uncertain as the views of different juries may suggest, and as to which nothing can be known until after the commission of the crime."

In the case of Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 84 Pac. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750, in which the question of the validity of a statute empowering the board of medical examiners to revoke the certificate of a physician for unprofessional conduct and which defined unprofessional conduct in part to consist in "all advertising of medical business in which grossly improbable statements are made," this court said:

"The right which a person possesses under the Constitution and the laws to practice his profession as a physician and surgeon cannot be made to depend upon a provision of a statute as vague, uncertain, and indefinite as is the provision we have been considering. If a physician's license is to be revoked for 'grossly improbable statements'; if he is to be thereby deprived of his means of livelihood, of his right to practice a profession which it has taken him years of study and a large expenditure of money to qualify himself for, on the ground that he has made 'grossly improbable statements' in advertising his medical business—it is requisite that the statute authorizing such revocation define what shall constitute such statements so that the physician may know in advance the penalty he incurs in making them. It is an easy matter for the Legislature to declare what statements in the advertisement of medical business shall be deemed 'grossly improbable,' and it must do so, and not leave it to a board of medical examiners after the publication is made to determine in its judgment whether the statements were or were not 'grossly improbable,' and according to its particular view of the matter revoke or refuse to revoke the license. The right to practice medicine cannot be made to depend upon such a vague, uncertain, and indefinite provision."

Many other cases might be cited dealing with the essential infirmity of this sort of legislation, but we think these will suffice to show that the clause of this act under consideration is entirely too vague, indefinite and uncertain to form the basis of a criminal proceeding. This disposes of the third count of the complaint assailed in this proceeding.

[2] The second count thereof is sought to be upheld by the respondent herein upon the ground that the Legislature has lawfully transferred to the department of agriculture, acting through its executive officer, the director of agriculture, the power to define the meaning of said act as to the clause in question so as to render enforceable its terms. The provisions of the act relied upon as sustaining this contention are section 4 thereof, which reads: "The director of agriculture is hereby empowered * * * to enforce all the provisions of this act"; section 15 thereof, which provides that, "The director of agriculture is empowered to define, promulgate and enforce such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of this act," and section 16 thereof, which provides that, "The director of agriculture and his duly authorized agents or employés may investigate and certify to shippers, and other interested parties the quality and condition of fruit, vegetables and other farm products under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe." Conceding for the sake of argument, but not deciding, that the foregoing provisions of said act do embody a legislative attempt to confer upon the department of agriculture the power to make more certain the clause of said act declaring that "oranges shall be * * * unfit for shipment when frosted to the extent of endangering the reputation of the citrus industry, if shipped," it is our conclusion that the Legislature had no power to thus delegate to an administrative board or officer its exclusive power and function of determining what acts or omissions on the part of an individual are unlawful. People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624; Ex parte Cox, 63 Cal. 21; Board of Harbor Commissioners v. Redwood Co., 88 Cal. 491, 26 Pac. 375, 22 Am. St. Rep. 321; Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, supra. There is nothing said in Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 Pac. 442, which conflicts with these views; if, as we have held, the language of the act declaring that "oranges shall be considered unfit for shipment when frosted to the extent of endangering the citrus industry, if shipped," is too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to form the basis of a criminal action, it follows that the act in question has not defined what shall constitute such a defect in frosted oranges as would render their shipment unlawful; not having done so, it is clear that any attempt on the part of an administrative board or officer so to do would be an act of legislation, and, as such, beyond the constitutional powers of such board or officer.

The application is granted, and the petitioner discharged.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. LUSCHER et al.
(Civ. 3866.)

1. Bail ⊂⊃89(1)—Allegations in action for forfeited bail held sufficient to establish that accused had notice of his trial.

In an action to recover bail for the failure of one accused of a felony to appear, an allegation that on a certain day accused "was duly and regularly arraigned, * * * and the trial * * * was then and there set down for the 30th day of January, 1920," is a sufficient allegation that the accused was notified of the time and place of his trial; Pen. Code, § 977, requiring that one accused of a felony must be personally present in court at the time of his arraignment.

2. Bail ⊂⊃92 — Finding of consideration for bail bond held sufficient.

A finding in an action on a bail bond that the accused was released "solely by reason and in consideration of the making execution and filing of said bond" is not open to attack merely because there was a cash bail of $250 which was part consideration for the release; it being evident that the word "solely" is surplusage.

3. Bail ⊂⊃93 — Judgment joint and several against cosigners on bail bond valid in absence of limitation to joint liability only.

A judgment jointly and severally against cosigners of a bail bond which does not indicate that it is limited only to a joint liability is valid under Civ. Code, § 1659, providing that such instruments are presumed to carry a joint and several liability.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by the County of Los Angeles against L. C. Luscher and E. P. Woods. From a judgment for the plaintiff, first-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Louis G. Guernsey and F. E. Davis, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, County Counsel, of Los Angeles, and J. H. O'Connor and Roy W. Dowds, Deputies County Counsel, for respondent.

WORKS, J. [1] This is an action to recover on a bail bond executed by defendant to secure the appearance of one Ray J. Ford in court in response to a felony charge. Ford did not appear at the time set for his trial, and the court thereupon made its order declaring the bond forfeited. Judgment herein went for plaintiff against both defendants, jointly and severally, for the amount of the bond, which was $1,000. Defendant Luscher appeals.

The first point made by appellant is that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it is barren of allegation that Ford was ever notified of the time and place of his trial. The assailed pleading contains the averment:

"That on the 10th day of November, 1919, the said Ray J. Ford was duly and regularly arraigned, * * * and on the said 10th day of November, 1919, * * * did enter a plea of 'Not guilty,' * * * and the trial of the said Ray J. Ford * * * was then and there set down * * * for the 30th day of January, 1920."

Section 977 of the Penal Code provides that one under a felony charge must be personally present in court at the time of his arraignment. Therefore the allegation that Ford was arraigned is equivalent to an allegation that he was present at the time the arraignment occurred. As the cause was "then and there set down" for trial on a given date, he had direct notice of the fact. The complaint is sufficient.

[2] Appellant's next contention is that there was no consideration for the execution of the bail bond. This legal question is presented in the form of a claim that a certain finding of the trial court is not supported by the evidence. The finding is to the effect that the release of Ford from custody, which occurred immediately after the giving of the bond, "was solely by reason and in consideration of the making, execution, and filing of the said bail bond. * * *" It appears that, after the bond was executed, appellant's cosigner and codefendant in this action was unable to qualify upon it. He was required upon that account to deposit the sum of $250 with the court, and the bond was thereupon approved, and Ford was released. It is now contended that the release was in consideration of the execution of the bond and of the deposit of the $250 together, and that it was not "solely" by reason of the execution of the bond. If the payment into court of the amount named is to be regarded as a deposit of cash bail in lieu, partially, of bail bond—a point which we neither examine nor decide—and if the release of the prisoner was because of bond and deposit of cash together, we cannot see how the point made by appellant is good. The use of the word "solely" in the finding, which followed the averments of the complaint, plainly may be regarded as surplusage, for there was a consideration for the bond if the release occurred partially because of its execution, and there is no doubt under the evidence that it did. The point made by appellant is not well taken.

[3] The only remaining contention of appellant is that the trial court erred in rendering judgment jointly and severally against the defendants; the insistence being that the obligation was a joint one. It is enough to say as to this question that there is no language in the bond pretending to make it the joint obligation of the signers. Under the provisions of section 1659, Civil Code, such an instrument is presumed to carry a joint and several promise.

Judgment affirmed.

PLACER COUNTY et al. v. LAKE TAHOE RY. & TRANSPORTATION CO. et al.
(Civ. 2434, 2437; Sac. 3280, 3285.)

1. Public lands ⟸39(3)—Effect of filing of declaratory statement to locate town site stated.

While the filing of a declaratory statement is not necessary to the location of a town site, yet, under Act Cong. March 2, 1867, it is proper to take that course as the initial step for making a town-site entry in preference over the making of a cash payment as the first step looking to the pre-emption of lands for such purpose, the effect of such statement being to vest an inceptive right in actual or bona fide settlers upon such lands.

2. Public lands ⟸41—Burden held upon occupant of public commons to overcome prima facie case made by introduction of map showing dedication.

In a suit by the judge of the superior court as trustee for public commons to quiet title thereto, where a map made by a surveyor under authority of the Legislature was introduced, showing the commons designated as such, the map constituting prima facie evidence of the contents thereof, the burden was upon defendant to overcome such prima facie case.

3. Public lands ⟸41—Actual occupancy prior to location of town site not shown.

In a suit by the judge of the superior court as trustee to quiet title to a block of land alleged to be public commons, evidence introduced by defendant held insufficient to show actual occupancy by its predecessor in title at the time of the location of the town site, under Act Cong. March 2, 1867, so as to except such occupancy from the land dedicated.

4. Estoppel ⟸110—Defense unavailable where not pleaded.

In a suit by the judge of the superior court as trustee for public commons included in a town-site location, defendants could not avail themselves of the doctrine of estoppel where not pleaded.

5. Public lands ⟸41—Evidence held insufficient to show right of railroad company in public commons.

In a suit by the judge of the superior court, as trustee for public commons under a town-site location, brought against a railroad company which claimed a franchise from the county board of supervisors to maintain its tracks along a certain turnpike, evidence held not to sustain the burden on defendant of showing that the track passing through the commons was within the grant.

6. Fixtures ⟸4—Whether personalty affixed to land becomes part thereof question of intent.

The question as to whether personal property affixed to land becomes a part thereof is largely one of intention to be determined by general tests, including the adaptation of the personal property to the use or purpose to which that part of the realty to which it is connected is appropriated.

7. Fixtures ⟸26—Railroad tracks and buildings held personalty.

Where a railway company lays its tracks and erects buildings for the proper conduct of its transportation business over and across land under a claim of right, such property cannot be held to become a part of the realty, but will at all times retain the character of personalty.

8. Adverse possession ⟸8(1)—Title cannot be acquired as against public.

Where ground is reserved for or dedicated to public purposes, title thereto cannot be acquired as against the public by adverse possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Fred V. Wood and J. J. Trabucco, Judges.

Action by the County of Placer and others against the Lake Tahoe Railway & Transportation Company and others to quiet title and for an injunction. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Reversed in part and affirmed in part in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

J. B. Landis and W. B. Lardner, both of Auburn, and Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for plaintiffs.

Raglan Tuttle, of Auburn, and H. F. Droste, of San Francisco, for defendants.

HART, J. This is a controversy over a block of land, known and designated as block 6 of the town of Tahoe City, Cal., and which is alleged and found by the court to be public commons.

It is alleged that the defendants are and have been for many years wrongfully and without right in possession of and occupying certain portions of said block, claiming the ownership thereof in fee. The prayer of the complaint is that said block of land be adjudged and decreed to be and is and constitutes public commons of said town of Tahoe City, "for the use and benefit and enjoyment of the inhabitants thereof and the public in general"; that the defendants nor any of them have any right, title, interest or estate therein, and that they and each of them and their agents, etc., be forever restrained and debarred from asserting any right, title or interest therein or thereto, and that the judge of the superior court in and for the county of Placer be adjudged to be the legal owner of said land and that he holds and owns the same as trustee "and is entitled to exclusive possession thereof in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants of said Tahoe City town site, jointly, and collectively."

The defendants railway company, Tahoe Mercantile Company, and Mercantile Trust Company, etc., answered the complaint, interposing specific denials and certain alleged special defenses. It is alleged by the trust company that defendant railway company became and was at the time of the commencement of the action indebted to said trust company in the sum of $500,000, and that, to secure the payment of said indebtedness, defendant railway company executed and delivered to defendant trust company a mortgage, dated October 1, 1901, and duly recorded, covering all the real property described in the complaint and all personal property of said railway company; that said indebtedness has not been paid, and that the same has been ever since the date thereof, and now is, a valid and subsisting lien upon said real and personal property, etc. Defendant railway company alleges that for more than 15 years last past, said defendant has been actually engaged in the business of transporting passengers for hire for the general public, by means of a steam railroad, between the towns of Truckee, in Nevada county, Cal., and said Tahoe City; that its line of tracks and its switches cross the said block 6, and that for many years it has used and is now using said tracks and switches in connection with its business as a common carrier; that likewise it has been for many years, and is now, using the buildings (8 in number) and the real property on which they stand (being a part of block 6) in connection with its business of transporting goods and passengers for hire for the general public, and as a common carrier. And by all the defendants it is alleged that the cause of action stated in the complaint is barred by sections 315, 318, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Defendant Tahoe Mercantile Company filed a cross-complaint, setting up its ownership of the part of said block 6 to which it claims title, the same bordering upon the lake and embracing several hundred feet, the shore line being approximately 217 feet and the right angle lines 126 and 150 feet, respectively, alleges that, without right, the plaintiffs claim to own some interest in said land, and asks that it be adjudged that plaintiffs have no interest therein.

The judgment decrees that said block constitutes a public commons of said city, but that the defendant Tahoe Mercantile Company was the owner of an equitable interest in a certain described part of said block; that the defendant Lake Tahoe Railway & Transportation Company (for many years using a part of said block for its tracks, buildings, etc.) has no right, title, interest, or estate of any nature or kind in said block or in any part thereof; that the last-named defendant be, and it is by the decree, required "to forthwith remove all tracks, water pipes and buildings erected or used by it and now located in said public commons"; that "J. E. Prewett, as judge of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Placer, as said judge, and as trustee, holds, owns and is entitled to the exclusive possession of said part of said block 6 in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants of said Tahoe City town site and of the public generally under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'an Act for the Relief of the Inhabitants of Cities and Towns upon Public Lands,' approved March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. L. 541)" and in accordance with the provisions of a certain act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved March 30, 1868 (Stats. 1867–68, p. 692). The decree enjoins all the defendants from using or occupying any of said block in any manner or from asserting title thereto or an interest therein, or any part thereof, except that part to which it is adjudged that the defendant Tahoe Mercantile Company has an equitable title.

There are two appeals: (1) By the plaintiffs from that part of the judgment adjudging the Tahoe Mercantile Company is the owner of an equitable interest in and title to a part of said block 6, and also from that part which in effect adjudges that the defendant railway and transportation company has the right to remove from said block its tracks, water pipes, and buildings erected and maintained thereon by said defendant. (2) An appeal by the defendants railway company and Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, from so much of the judgment as adjudges and decrees that said defendant railway company has no right, interest, estate, or title in or to the portions of said block occupied and used by said railway company.

The land within the boundaries of which block 6 is embraced is, as seen, situated in Placer county, and borders on the southwestern boundary of Lake Tahoe being described as the "southeast quarter of section 6, township 15 N. of Range 17 E., Mt. Diablo base and meridian" and for some years prior to and on or about the 11th day of July, 1868, was "surveyed public domain of the United States." During all the years of 1868 to 1872 a number of persons settled and resided upon and occupied said land, and said land constituted an unincorporated town known as Tahoe City. In the year 1868 the Honorable D. W. Spear, the then county judge of the county of Placer, in pursuance of a request made in the form of a petition by the requisite number of the resident householders of said town, caused the said land to be surveyed and plats, maps, and field notes made, and proceeded, as the statutes require, to have a patent to said land issued to him as such county judge, and for the purposes in such statutes set forth. The survey of said land was made by one Sam Bethel, a deputy United States surveyor, who made a map of said land and thereon delineated and designated all streets, alleys, public squares, and public commons, etc., as the same existed at the time and which had been theretofore dedicated to a public use, and also the precise boundaries and area of each and every lot or parcel of land claimed by any person. Said map was made in triplicate and certified under oath by Bethel as a map of Tahoe City, etc. This map was regularly filed for record in the office of the county recorder of Placer county. On said map the land in the block involved in this controversy is marked and designated as "public commons." On the 11th day of July, 1868, said D. W. Spear, as county judge, proceeding according to the provisions of the federal statute of 1867, filed in the United States land office at Sacramento a declaratory statement of the purpose of the inhabitants of said Tahoe City to enter said land as a town site. The record shows that a contest was pending before the general land office at Washington between the town site of Tahoe City and one Thomas Bittencourt and several other pre-emption claimants, and that the department, after a hearing, not only disallowed and rejected the claims of Bittencourt et al., but also disallowed and rejected said town-site application on the ground that it was made to appear in and by said application that said town site did not contain the number of inhabitants in actual occupancy and use of the proposed town site, which is required by the said act of Congress of 1867 as the prerequisite to the establishment of any portion of the public domain as a town site. An order was later made, however, granting the town-site applicant a further hearing on his application, and on August 2, 1871, the commissioner of the general land office addressed a letter to the register and the receiver of the United States Land Office at Sacramento, in which it was stated that the Secretary of the Interior, while affirming the conclusion of the commissioner in the Bittencourt pre-emption applications, had "modified the ruling of this office, in this: That the proper authorities can now enter said town site (of Tahoe City) under the act of 1867, notwithstanding the fact that said town site contained less than 100 inhabitants."

On December 5, 1871, Spear, county judge, as such, in trust for the inhabitants of said town of Tahoe City made a cash entry (No. 682) of the land as a town site for said town. The register and the receiver of the United States land office at Sacramento were notified of this entry by the general land office on the 24th day of June, 1872, and that the same was passed for patenting, "in accordance with the entry as authorized by letter of August 2, 1871." On September 10, 1872, a patent from the United States was issued for said town site to said D. W. Spear, county judge, etc., as such judge, in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants of said town site of Tahoe City, said patent being certificate No. 682, and based on said cash entry No. 682.

As before intimated, the court found that block 6 constituted a public commons with the exception of a fractional portion, of which it found that the defendant Tahoe Mercantile Company is the equitable owner; that the defendant Lake Tahoe Railway, etc., Company has no interest of any kind or nature in said block 6, or any portion thereof; that the railway company was indebted to the defendant trust company in the sum of $500,000, as alleged, and that said debt or any portion thereof has never been paid, but that the latter company does not have, and never has had, a valid lien on the real property in block 6, claimed by said railway company, as security for the payment of said indebtedness or for any purpose.

The rights of the defendant trust company, in so far as they are affected by this litigation, are, of course, merged in those of defendant railway company, since manifestly whether the lien claimed by the former upon the portion of block 6 claimed by the railway company is or is not valid depends entirely upon whether the latter's claim of ownership of said property is or is not valid.

The defendant mercantile company bases its claim of ownership of the fractional portion of block 6, to which the court decided that it owns the equitable title, upon the alleged occupancy and use of said parcel of said block by one John C. Chesrown.

The defendant Lake Tahoe Railway, etc., Company claims its right to the portions of said block occupied and used by it under a purported franchise from the board of supervisors of Placer county, granting it the right to run and maintain its tracks along and across a public highway, known as the Truckee and Tahoe turnpike, which, it is claimed, runs over and across block 6. All the defendants set up the contention that the plaintiffs are estopped from maintaining this action.

As shown, the declaratory statement and the cash entry of the town site herein involved were filed and made under the act of Congress of March 2, 1867. Rev. Stats. U. S., p. 437. Section 2387 of said Act (U. S. Comp. St. § 4791), in substance and effect, provides that, where any portion of the public lands, not subject to entry under the agricultural pre-emption laws, have been or may be settled upon and occupied as a town site, the corporate authorities of such town, or, if not incorporated the judge of the county court of the county in which such town is situated may enter in the proper land office, and at the minimum price, the land so settled and occupied, and hold the same in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their several interests. Said section further provides that, as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sales thereof, such trust shall be executed under such regulations as may be established by the Legislature of the state or territory in which such town is situated.

Section 2388 of said act (U. S. Comp. St. § 4792) provides, in part:

"The entry of the land provided for in the preceding section shall be made, or a declaratory statement of the purpose of the inhabitants to enter it as a town-site shall be filed with the register of the proper land office, prior to the commencement of the public sale of the body of land in which it is included, and the entry or declaratory statement shall include only such land as is actually occupied by the town, and the title to which is in the United States. * * *"

The Legislature of the state of California, in pursuance of the direction contained in the said act of Congress, at its session of 1867, 1868 (Stats. 1867, 1868, p. 692), passed an act regulating the duties of the county judge under said act of Congress. The state statute provides that it shall be the duty of such judge upon being requested by petition by a stated number of resident householders of such town, to proceed to the taking of the necessary legal steps for the entry of the lands as a town site, to cause a survey of the lands to be made and a plat and map thereof made and filed, and mark by suitable monuments the lands which the inhabitants of such town claim, particularly designating in such survey all streets, roads, lanes and alleys, public squares, churches, school lots, cemeteries, and commons "as the same exist and have heretofore been dedicated in any manner to public use." etc.

The finding that block 6, at the time of the making of the Bethel survey, constituted public commons, is well fortified by the evidence. The dispute here is, as stated, as to the fractional portion of said block claimed by the mercantile company and a like portion thereof claimed by the railway company. As to these claims, we are of the opinion that there is not sufficient evidence to support either, and that the trial court was therefore right in rejecting the railway company's claim and wrong in allowing the mercantile company's claim. Before passing to a consideration of the evidence, however, a view of the provisions of the federal and state statutes may well first be taken.

The question first discussed in the briefs is as to the legal effect of the filing by the county judge of the declaratory statement on July 11, 1868, the contention of the defendant being that it is merely to withdraw temporarily the town-site lands from sale by the government—that is, "pending the submission and hearing of the proofs relative to the requirements of the town-site act"—and that it does not, as in the case of a cash entry, create an "inceptive right" to title to the lands involved.

Section 2388 of the Act of Congress of 1867, supra, explicitly provides two different initiatory steps looking to the patenting for town-site purposes government lands subject to such entry—the one by cash entry and the other by the filing of a declaratory statement. While it may be true that the filing of a declaratory statement will not bind the government, it certainly must be true that the effect of such filing is to protect, for a reasonable or limited time, the settlers for whose benefit the filing of such statement is made, against subsequent settlers. If it does not have this effect, then the declaratory statement can accomplish nothing and the insertion in the acts of Congress, relative to the acquisition of title to lands of the public domain of the provision authorizing the filing of such a statement, was an idle act. But the provision was intended to serve a purpose, as is shown by the decisions of the Department of the Interior and by the decisions of the courts.

In Re Application of Mather, 5 Decisions, Land Department, p. 633, it is said:

"The declaratory statement is a notice given by the settler of his intention to purchase the land and such notice protects his claim against subsequent sellers for a specified time. The notice is for the protection of the settler, not of the government."

In Re Pre-emption Declaratory Statement of Ellen Barker, 4 Decisions of Land Department of Interior, 514, 515, it is held:

"The filing of a declaratory statement is not made a condition precedent to the exercise of the pre-emption right (section 2259, R. S.); it is merely a protection against the claims of subsequent settlers," citing Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72, 20 L. Ed. 485.

In Re Pre-emption Entry of Paris Meadows et al., 9 Decisions, Land Department of Interior, pp. 41, 44, it is said:

"What then is the office of the declaratory statement? It is a notice given by the settler of his intention to purchase the land described therein, and such notice protects for a limited time his claim against subsequent settlers, by being duly filed in the proper local land office, where it is to be noted on the proper record. Any one thereafter seeking to claim the land is not prohibited from putting a claim of record, but he is notified that he does so subject to the claim of the pre-emption declarant whose intention has thus been announced."

See, also, 10 Decs., Dept. of Interior, pp. 617, 618.

The case of Lockwitz v. Larson (Utah Sup. Ct.), 52 Pac. 279, is illuminating upon the matter in hand. That case involved a contest over lots in a town site located under the act of Congress of 1867, and it is therein held, in effect, that, as to the location of town sites on government domain, under the act of Congress of 1867, the filing of a declaratory statement by the proper officers is an "entry" within the meaning and intent of said act, and further held that—

"the interests of the occupants attach simultaneously with the making of a town-site entry, and that no person who may have occupied land on the town site previous thereto, or may occupy such lands thereafter, but who was not a settler and occupant at the time of the entry, is a beneficiary under the act, nor can such person derive any benefit directly by reason of the entry."

[1] It is to be conceded, of course, that the filing of a declaratory statement is not necessary to the location of a town site, yet, as has been shown, it is proper, under the act of Congress of 1867, to take that course as the initial step for making a town-site entry in preference over the making of a cash entry as the first step looking to the pre-emption of lands for such a purpose; and, while the scope of a declaratory statement does not extend as far as a cash entry in the preservation of the rights of the settlers; while, in other words, the declaratory statement may not be an actual entry in the same sense that a cash entry is and, to effectually serve the purposes for which it is intended, must be kept alive by following it up within proper time after it has been filed by other steps essential under the law to the establishment of a town site, yet the effect of such filing is, even if not as against the government, certainly as against the claims of others, to vest in those who are actual or bona fide settlers upon and occupants of portions of such lands at the time of the filing of such statement an inceptive right to the portions so settled upon and occupied.

It follows from the conclusion thus announced that, unless the evidence is such as to support the implied finding of the court that Chesrown was an actual settler upon and occupant of the land claimed by the defendant mercantile company, prior to and at the date of the filing of the declaratory statement on July 11, 1868, the judgment in favor of said defendant cannot be upheld; and so this brings us to an examination of the evidence.

[2, 3] In the first place, it is to be observed that a map made in 1863 was introduced in evidence and thereon block 6 was marked and designated as public commons and the Bethel map, as seen, corresponds in that particular with said map of 1863. We refer to the last-mentioned map because it is stated by counsel for the defendants that there is no evidence to show that prior to the survey of the town site made by Bethel in 1871 block 6 constituted a public commons and because, also, they contend that the mere fact that Bethel marked and designated block 6 on his map as public commons is not evidence that the block was previously regarded as public commons. Now, as to the Bethel map on which the whole of block 6 is marked and designated as public commons, said map having been made by and under the authority of the act of the Legislature of 1867 and 1868, supra, constitute, by virtue of the provisions of section 3 of said act, "Prima facie evidence of the contents and correctness thereof in all the courts of this state." Hence, the burden was upon the defendant mercantile company to overthrow or overcome, by competent evidence, the fixed probative effect imparted by the law to said map and the field notes made at the same time. This burden the mercantile company failed to sustain. Indeed, a careful examination of the record has firmly convinced us that Chesrown at no time, either prior or subsequently to the filing of the declaratory statement, was an actual settler upon any part of block 6, unless the wharf built by him over the water from said block may be deemed to be a portion thereof. In other words, there is no evidence showing that he ever settled upon or occupied the portion of block 6 now claimed by the defendant mercantile company, and that all that he ever did claim was the right to pass over the road crossing block 6 and leading to his wharf—that is, a right of way over the commons. He testified that he first went to Tahoe City in the year 1869 and departed therefrom permanently in the year 1877. He did not, however, reside continuously at said town during the period from 1869 to 1877, but during a part of the years 1869, 1871, and 1876 worked at Truckee and other places. In the fall of 1871, though, he started the construction of a wharf or pier on the lake, the same extending from the shore line of block 6 into and over the lake for a distance of about 150 feet. Upon this wharf or pier, at the extreme eastern end thereof, he erected, in the year 1872, a building, which he used for a warehouse and a saloon and which he termed, as it has ever since been known, the Tahoe Custom House. He stated that he started the saloon in said building in the month of May, 1873, and conducted it until the fall of 1873, when he sold the wharf and custom house to two parties named A. F. Campbell and J. O. Forbes. Here we may state that there is a variance between the testimony of Chesrown and the deed to Campbell and Forbes as to the time when the transfer was made. It is probable that Chesrown meant to testify that he opened the saloon in 1872, for the deed to his grantees was dated January 27, 1873. But this variance is immaterial. The deed conveyed to Campbell and Forbes whatever title Chesrown had—

"in a certain peace of property situated at Tahoe City, * * * known as the Lake Tahoe Custom House, together with all lumber on hand, wharves, warehouses, break wattrs, furnutur, fictures with lands rodes & leading to the above described property." (This conveyance is the foundation and source of the mercantile company's claim to title to the portion of block 6 now occupied and claimed by it.)

Chesrown testified that when he built his wharf the land known as public commons (block 6) was not occupied by any one; that he never made use of the land adjacent to the wharf; that there was an old barn standing on the block, but that he did not know who put it there; that no one claimed to own the barn, and different persons at different times, including himself, had used it for temporary purposes and convenience. He said that he never claimed any part of block 6 and had never continuously occupied or used any part of it except a road leading to the wharf and passing over and through the commons, and that such use was only that which was common to the general public. He testified that he never at any time claimed to own the barn referred to and that while he was the owner of the custom house he did not know of any one claiming to own the commons or any part of them, that he never used any land around the wharf, and that he did not build a store there. He stated that he assisted Bethel a part of one day in the survey of the town site. While assisting the surveyor, he said he did not go out on the commons and point out any particular piece of land thereof which he claimed that he had ever settled upon or occupied, but that he merely told Bethel that he would like to have him mark out a passage way or roadway over the commons to his wharf for his convenience and that of others going to the wharf. It was however shown that, in a deposition taken prior to the trial, Chesrown stated that while the survey of the town site was being made by Bethel, he (Chesrown) pointed out and indicated to the surveyor the portion of the block now claimed by the mercantile company as the portion thereof that he "calculated to get a deed to," and that he requested Bethel so to mark the said block on the map. In fact, as to this matter, his deposition showed that he deposed as follows:

"I know I told him (Bethel) I wanted the piece of land there for a landing and told him to make that out when he was making the map, and to make so much front, and I thought he done it—he made the map right there in the hotel after he got done surveying."

He stated in his deposition that he pointed out the boundary lines of the portion that he claimed, and those lines correspond with those within which the portion of block 6 claimed by the mercantile company is embraced.

It is very clear from the foregoing testimony that, as stated before, Chesrown never claimed any portion of block 6 and much less was he a settler upon any portion of said block at the time of the filing of the declaratory statement. As a matter of fact, the deed from Chesrown to Campbell and Forbes, it will be observed, does not convey or purport to convey the lot claimed by the mercantile company as described in the pleadings. All that the said deed purports to convey is the wharf and the road or right of way leading thereto. It is true the word "lands" is used in the deed, but since it was unquestionably shown by Chesrown's own testimony that he never settled upon or claimed the land adjacent to his wharf, it would seem that what he meant by the use of the word "lands" was the right to pass over the road leading to his wharf, which road, as we have seen, passed over and across block 6. It is also a circumstance of some significance that Chesrown did not mention in his deed to Campbell and Forbes the barn referred to. It is obvious from this that, as he testified, he never made any claim of ownership of said barn or the ground upon which it stood. The fact that he told the surveyor that he desired to claim or get a deed to the portion of said block now claimed and occupied by the mercantile company is of no legal consequence. The act of Congress under which town sites may be located or established on the public domain intends that the same may be done entirely for the benefit of those who are actual settlers upon said town site at the time that any authorized initial step for such location is taken, and it is as clear as any proposition can be that the mere intention of a party to claim any portion of such town site, unaccompanied by the act of settling upon the same, cannot have the effect of vesting in such person any right whatsoever to the piece of land which thus he has in mind.

[4] Thus (to repeat) it is plain that Chesrown was not, nor did he pretend to be, a settler upon any part of the commons involved in this litigation at the time of the filing of the declaratory statement. Indeed, it is not shown by any evidence in the case—not even by his deposition of which certain portions got into the record for impeachment purposes only—that he was a settler upon any part of the commons at the time of the making of the cash entry in the month of December, 1871. It, of course, follows that the claim of the mercantile company, based as it is entirely upon the asserted rights of Chesrown, is wholly without a valid foundation and cannot be sustained, unless we are required to uphold its contention that the plaintiffs are estopped from maintaining this action as against it because it was shown that the said defendant, with the knowledge and tacit assent or acquiescence of the plaintiffs, had for many years continuously been in possession of and had erected, and at great expense maintained, buildings for business and other purposes upon the lot claimed by it. In other words, the point is that the said defendant had put expensive improvements upon said lot and had maintained the same for many years under a claim of right and that the plaintiffs during all those years had knowledge of those facts and by silence had consented thereto. This involves the plea of the doctrine of equitable estoppel or estoppel in pais, but, assuming that such a defense is appropriate to a case of this character, the answer to the contention is that estoppel was not pleaded, and it is so well settled that authorities need hardly be cited in support of the proposition that where a party relies upon estoppel in pais it is his duty to plead it, and where he has failed to do this the question cannot be considered. See Burk v. City of Santa Cruz, 163 Cal. 807, 810, 811, 127 Pac. 154; Clarke v. Huber, 25 Cal. 593; Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982; Delger v. Jacobs, 19 Cal. App. 197, 206, 125 Pac. 258.

We are now brought to the consideration of the appeal by the Lake Tahoe Railway & Transportation Company. As seen, it is first contended by said company that it derived the right to the portion of block 6 over and across which its tracks are maintained and upon which it maintains certain buildings from the board of supervisors of Placer county. This defendant also undertakes to invoke the doctrine of equitable estoppel as a defense against the action by plaintiffs. But as to this last proposition we may as well here say that, since it is true that this defendant did not plead estoppel or rely upon it as defense in the court below, what we have said upon that subject in disposing of the appeal of the mercantile company is equally applicable to the attempt of the railway company now to avail itself of the defense of estoppel as against the right of the plaintiffs to maintain the action against it.

[5] The contention of the railway company that its right to occupy the portion of block 6 over which its tracks cross was granted to it by the board of supervisors is, in our judgment, not sustained by the record. The resolution by the board of supervisors in terms merely granted to said defendant the right to cross the road, known as the Truckee and Tahoe turnpike—

"at any and all points, and also a right of way along such parts of said road as the said company may desire to use for the line of said railway as shown by the map of preliminary survey and map of location to be hereafter filed."

It will be noted that there is nothing in this resolution or purported franchise which expressly vests in the railway company the right to run its tracks over or across block 6 or to erect and maintain buildings thereon. This right, however, in so far as the maintenance of its tracks and switches is concerned, might be implied from the fact, if it were a fact, that the turnpike crosses the commons and the line of tracks of the railway company runs along so much of said turnpike as passes through and over the commons. But, in the first place, it is to be stated that it is not clear that the wagon road running through the commons is a part of the Truckee and Tahoe turnpike. There is in other words, no evidence which satisfactorily shows that the road passing through the commons is any part of the turnpike, and in support of the claim that it acquired the right to run and maintain its tracks over and across the commons, the burden was upon the railway company unmistakably to show that the road passing through the commons was a part of the turnpike. This necessarily must be true, since the right purporting to be granted by the board of supervisors to the railway company to run its tracks along and across the said turnpike is expressly limited to the route of said turnpike, and the maintenance of its line of tracks along any other way or route would be beyond the terms of the purported franchise. In the second place, it is to be said that, even if the roadway running through the commons is a part of the turnpike, it appears from the evidence without conflict that the railway company did not run the portion of its tracks through the commons along such portion of said turnpike, but that it located its tracks on the commons a considerable distance from and west of said road. This, of course, was not in accordance with any right which the resolution of the board of supervisors purports to grant to the company.

But there is, it seems to us, another answer to the claim that the railway company legally derived any right from the board of supervisors as a result of the resolution referred to. Section 5 of the Act of 1868, as seen, provides that all streets, roads, etc., cemeteries, squares, and commons marked and platted on the map of the town site as prescribed and directed by the provisions of said act shall be deemed and considered and—"they are hereby declared to be, dedicated to public use, by the filing of such town plat in the office of the county recorder, and shall be inalienable, unless by special order of the board of supervisors of the county, so long as such town shall remain unincorporated."

It is the contention of the railway company that it was in pursuance of the authority impliedly given the board of supervisors by the italicized portion of the foregoing provision of the act of 1868 that the resolution granting said company a right of way over block 6 was adopted. Indeed, if any authority existed in the board of supervisors to grant a railway company a right of way over the public commons of the town site in question it is to be found alone in section 5 of the Act of 1868 as above quoted herein. But a serious question arises as to whether the provision referred to is to be given the construction to which counsel for defendants here attempt to subject it. We do not think the construction so given is sound. The public commons and all other pieces of property located within the town site and dedicated to a public use were and are held in trust by the authorized public authorities for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town of Tahoe City, and it certainly was not intended by the Legislature that the board of supervisors of the county should be vested with the arbitrary power of diverting the trust from its expressed purposes or of disposing of such pieces of property without the consent of those for whose benefit such property was set aside and held. It is not made to appear that such consent was given. It is true that the statute makes no express provision requiring such consent to be expressed, but the very fact that the lots which were dedicated to public use were intended to be and are held in trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town of Tahoe City is itself sufficient to preclude the idea that such property might be disposed of by the board of supervisors without first obtaining the consent of the beneficiaries of the trust. Moreover, it is very clear that, even if the board of supervisors had the power to transfer such property and so allow it to be converted to other uses than that to which it is dedicated, it would not have the authority to make a gift of the property, nor cut it up by granting rights of way either for railroads or other kinds of roads over and across the same. Manifestly, the provision under consideration is not limited in its application alone to public commons. It has application to all the pieces or parcels of property embraced within the town site which are dedicated to public use, and obviously it is not a reasonable assumption that it was intended that the board of supervisors should thus be vested with power to grant rights of way for a railroad over and across a cemetery or a school lot. There can be no doubt that the provision referred to was intended for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town, and its purpose probably was to enable them, whenever it might appear best for the public interests or the public convenience, to change the locations of their cemeteries, public schools, squares, and commons from where they are designated on the map to other places within the town site, in which case, we assume, if found necessary to do so, the board of supervisors may, upon request of such inhabitants, expressed in appropriate form, authorize by special order the sale of such lots, for the benefit, however, of the inhabitants.

There is no legal force to the contention of the plaintiffs that that part of the decree which permits and orders the removal by the railway company of the tracks, buildings, structures, etc., maintained on block 6 by said defendant, is erroneous. The record shows that the structures erected and maintained on the property, aside from the railroad tracks, consist of a couple of cabins, a paint shop, a shed, a cottage, an engine house and a car barn. These were erected and used as essential equipments of the railway company "plant," so to speak, or used in aid of the operation of the business of said defendant as a transportation company. The argument is that these structures became and are a part of the realty by virtue of the provisions of sections 660 and 1013 of the Civil Code.

[6] It is not necessary in this case to enter into a general or an exhaustive discussion of the principles underlying the law of fixtures or to undertake to distinguish the occasions on which personal property annexed to real property becomes a part of the latter from those on which such property when so annexed retains its original identity. It is enough to say that, generally speaking, the question whether personal property affixed to land becomes a part thereof is largely one of intention, and this intention is to be determined by certain general tests, of which the one most pertinent to the present consideration is the adaptation or application of the personal property to the use or purpose to which that part of the realty to which it is connected is appropriated. See 10 R. C. L. 1059; 11 R. C. L. 1062; Breyfogle v. Tighe et al. (Cal. App.) 208 Pac. 1008. In this case, it must be borne in mind, the personal property annexed to the land by the defendant railway company was for the purposes of its business as a transportation company. A railroad company is a public agency and an instrument of commerce, and its tracks and the buildings necessary to carry on its purposes are mere accessories to the operation of its business.

[7] The public necessity or requirements or the very exigencies of its purposes may at any time make it convenient and to the interest of the public as well as to itself to abandon a certain right of way and remove its tracks and equipments to another, and therefore we think it only responsive to sound reason to say that where a railway company lays its tracks and erects buildings for the proper conduct of its transportation business over and across land under a claim of right, such property cannot be held to become a part of the realty, but will at all times retain the character of personalty. The view thus expressed is sustained by a large number of cases, to which we will make simple reference without reproducing the expressions found therein. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Nyce, 61 Kan. 394, 59 Pac. 1040, 48 L. R. A. 241; Wagner v. Cleveland, etc.,

R. Co., 22 Ohio St. 563, 10 Am. Rep. 770; Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Morgan, 42 Kan. 23, 21 Pac. 809, 4 L. R. A. 284, 16 Am. St. Rep. 471; Sangamon, etc., R. Co. v. Morgan County, 14 Ill. 163, 56 Am. Dec. 497; Randall v. Elwell, 52 N. Y. 521, 11 Am. Rep. 747; 11 R. C. L. pp. 1079, 1080, and cases cited in the footnotes. The maintenance of railroad tracks and the essential equipments of the transportation business upon a piece of land involves as a rule the appropriation of so much of the land thus occupied to a use or purpose to which it is not naturally or customarily adapted. In other words, when realty is so appropriated and used, it is not devoted to the ordinary or usual purposes or uses of land. Nor, obviously, can it be said that the structures erected upon the land in dispute has had or can have the effect of enhancing the value of the land or improving or benefiting it for the purpose to which otherwise it might be devoted or, in ordinary circumstances, is adapted.

[8] We have now considered all the points discussed in the briefs with the exception of that involving the plea by all the defendants of the statute of limitations, as to which it is sufficient to say that it is well settled that, where a piece of ground is reserved for or dedicated to public purposes and therefore becomes public property, title thereto cannot be acquired as against the public by adverse possession, and the right of action to recover possession of the same for the public purposes to which it has been dedicated is not subject to the statute of limitations. Board of Education of the City and County of San Francisco v. Martin et al., 92 Cal. 209, 28 Pac. 799, and cases therein cited; Howard v. Oroville School District, 22 Cal. App. 544, 551, 135 Pac. 689.

For the foregoing reasons, that part of the judgment affecting and in favor of the Tahoe Mercantile Company is reversed, and that part of the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs and against the Lake Tahoe Railway & Transportation Company, including the part thereof awarding to said Lake Tahoe Railway & Transportation Company the right to remove its tracks, buildings and equipments from said block 6 of said Tahoe City, is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District is denied.

In denying the petition for transfer to this court, we withhold approval of that portion of the opinion dealing with the power of the board of supervisors to grant rights of way across the common. Inasmuch as the opinion holds that the supervisors did not make such grant, it is unnecessary to determine that question.

HEBERLING et al. v. DAY et al.
(Civ. 2433.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 31, 1922.)

1. Action ⟸38(1)—Alleging two sets of circumstances under which right to lien was invoked not statement of two different causes of action.

In an action to foreclose a lien where it was alleged that plaintiff filed a lien on the building April 27th, alleging a statutory completion on April 1st, and in another paragraph that the building was accepted May 22d, and plaintiff, to cure defects in the lien filed, filed a lien June 4th, the statement of two different sets of circumstances under which the remedy may be invoked to secure a single relief did not involve the statement of two different causes of action.

2. Mechanics' liens ⟸158—Amended lien may be filed within the 30 days within which original may be filed.

An amended lien may be filed within the 30 days within which an original claim may be filed.

3. Mechanics' liens ⟸5—Procedure adopted for invoking liens liberally construed.

The right to liens is constitutional and the procedure adopted by the Legislature for invoking it must be liberally construed.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1039(2)—Several causes of action, if united but not separately stated, without prejudice where defendants informed of all facts relied on.

Where facts constituting several causes of action were separately stated, except that pleader omitted to allege "except that the allegations of paragraphs 1 to 5, both inclusive, are hereby expressly referred to herein and made a part," it was without prejudice to defendants; it appearing that they were informed of every fact which plaintiffs relied on for recovery.

5. Mechanics' liens ⟸290(5)—Findings of two different completion periods from which lien claimants could file liens not inconsistent.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, is not inconsistent merely because it provides that certain acts of the owner or those constructing a building shall, for the purpose of filing liens, be deemed equivalent of completion, and findings that there has been a deemed completion and also an actual completion of the same building are not inconsistent, as they merely mean that there are two different starting points from which the time within which claims of lien may be filed begin to run and claimants could file claims with respect to either point.

6. Mechanics' liens ⊂⊃281(2)—Evidence sustained finding of completion of building by use and occupation of owner.

Evidence held to sustain a finding of completion of a building by use and occupation of the owner some time between April 1st, and April 27th.

7. Mechanics' liens ⊂⊃281(4)—Evidence sustained finding of amount of claim for lumber.

Evidence held to support finding of amount due lumber company on claim for lien and that materials were furnished on estimates.

8. Mechanics' liens ⊂⊃154(2)—Affidavit attached to notice of claim for lien held sufficient.

Where the affidavit attached to a notice of claim declared that the claim "contains a correct statement of * * * demand after deducting all just credits and offsets," the requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, were met.

9. Mechanics' liens ⊂⊃204—Assignor of lien claim held to have sufficient interest to entitle him to file lien.

Where a lien claimant assigned his claim to a bank as collateral to a loan, even though prior to the date of filing, he still had sufficient interest in the claim to entitle him to file a lien.

10. Mechanics' liens ⊂⊃157(1) — Absence of corporate seal on notice of claim did not render claim invalid.

Corporate seals import only prima facie verity to corporate contracts, and where a notice of claim of lien, properly verified, was refused of record on June 20th, because the corporate seal of claimant was not affixed, and returned to claimant with reason for refusal, under Civ. Code, § 1170, on reapplication the claim will be deemed to have been filed as of date of first transmission to recorder.

11. Mechanics' liens ⊂⊃158—Claimant, having filed original and amended claims, not put on election as between them.

Where both the original and amended claims related to the same indebtedness, claimant need not be put to an election as between them, and there was no error in admitting the claims without requiring such election.

12. Mechanics' liens ⊂⊃157(1) — Lien notice failing to state that amount was due "after deducting all just credits and offsets" not defective.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1203, declaring that errors in the statement of demand shall not invalidate a claim, the omission of statement in a notice of claim of lien that the amount of the demand was due "after deducting all just credits and offsets," as provided by section 1187, did not make the notice defective.

13. Pleading ⊂⊃403(2)—Omission in complaint to enforce lien cured by answer.

In a proceeding to foreclose liens where there was a prayer that the owner pay into court money due the contractor, any omission in the complaint to allege that the owner had money in its possession due the contractor was cured by the owner's answer alleging it had a balance in its hands and asking that its liability be limited to that amount.

14. Principal and surety ⊂⊃163—Judgment of $10,000 not excessive as to surety bound for $13,000.

Where the net amount of a judgment against a principal and his sureties was approximately $10,000, it was not excessive as to sureties whose liability on their respective undertakings was in no case less than $13,000.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Consolidated actions by B. U. Heberling, doing business as the Visalia Planing Mill, and others, against D. B. Day and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert T. Linney, of Los Angeles, Karl A. Machetanz, of Exeter, and Lamberson & Lamberson, of Visalia, for appellants.

Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, Power & McFadzean, and Bradley & Bradley, all of Visalia, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiffs instituted actions in the superior court of Tulare county for the foreclosure of certain liens for materials furnished for and labor performed on the construction of a certain building in the city of Visalia, and also for recovery of judgments against the sureties upon the bond furnished by the contractor to the owner of the building for the faithful performance of the terms of the building contract to satisfy the several demands sued for. By order of the court the actions were consolidated. Section 1195, Code Civ. Proc.

On the 3d day of May, 1917, one D. B. Day, a building contractor, and the Visalia Elks Building Association, a corporation, entered into a written contract, by the terms of which the said contractor agreed to construct for said corporation, in the city of Visalia, and furnish therefor all necessary labor and material, a three-story building and basement, for the total sum of $53,287. Attached to the contract were the plans and specifications, and for the faithful performance of the terms of said contract the said Day, as principal, and the defendants, Ragle, Cole, J. P. Day, and Blair, as sureties, executed and delivered to said association a bond in the penal sum of $26,644, as follows: Ragle, in the sum of $14,000; Blair, in the sum of $15,000; Cole, in the sum of $14,000; Day, in the sum of $13,000. The condition of said bond was that said Day would faithfully perform said contract in accordance with the plans and specifications annexed thereto, pay all claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials used, "and to be used in said work," and to turn over said building to said association completed in conformity with the contract and plans and specifications, within the time limited in said contract, free and clear of all claims, demands, liens, etc. This bond, with the contract, was filed for record on the 3d day of May, 1917, in the office of the county recorder of Tulare county.

The complaint alleges that said building was completed and said contract between the Elks Building Association and said Day was fully performed on the 21st day of May, 1918, and that on the 22d day of May, 1918, said owner, building association, formally accepted said building, and caused to be prepared and to be filed in the office of the county recorder of Tulare county a notice of the completion of said building, which notice contained all the facts required to be set forth in such a notice and stated that the building had been completed on the 21st day of May, 1918. Then follows a statement in detail of the materials furnished and used in said building by plaintiff Heberling, doing business as Visalia Planing Mill, and the statement that on the 27th day of April, 1918, said Heberling, etc., filed for record in the office of the county recorder of Tulare county a claim of lien duly verified by his oath for the purpose of securing and perfecting a lien for the amounts due him for the materials furnished as alleged; that thereafter, and within 30 days from the date of the actual completion of said building, and for the purpose of curing certain defects in said lien, and for the further purpose of securing and perfecting his lien for the amount due him as explained, said Heberling, etc., filed for record in the office of the county recorder of the county of Tulare, on the 4th day of June, 1918, an amended claim of lien duly verified by his oath.

The claim of the plaintiff Clark doing business as Visalia Plumbing & Sheet Metal Company, is next set out in the complaint with particularity, it being based upon a subcontract between said Clark, etc., and the contractor, Day, for the furnishing of the necessary labor and materials, etc., for the installation of the plumbing, heating, ventilating, and vacum cleaning system of the building and also for the sheet metal work. In this paragraph of the complaint it is alleged that the owner of the building and its representatives and lessee entered into the use and occupation of said building on or shortly after the 1st day of April, 1918, and further alleged that said building was completed within the meaning of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure by reason of such entering into the use and occupation of said building. It is alleged that on the 29th day of April, 1918, said Clark, etc., filed in the office of the county recorder of Tulare county his claim of lien duly verified for the materials so furnished and the labor so performed. It is then alleged that within 30 days from the date of the actual completion of said building, to wit, on the 21st day of May, 1918, said Clark, for the purpose of curing certain defects in the lien theretofore filed, filed for record in the office of the county recorder an amended claim of lien duly certified, etc.

The claim of each of the other plaintiffs is set out in the complaint in the usual form, and as to each it is alleged that a claim of lien was properly prepared and filed within due time. As to the claim of the First National Bank of Visalia it is alleged that one J. B. Murphy, having under a subcontract performed all the cement work and the lathing and plastering in said building required by the plans and specifications for the same and filed his claim of lien for the balance due for said work in the sum of $2,524.32, subsequent to the filing of said claim of lien, sold and delivered said lien and the debt to secure which it was filed to the said bank.

The prayer is for a judgment against the contractor as principal and Ragle, Cole, Blair, and John P. Day, as sureties on the faithful performance bond in favor of each of the plaintiffs in the several amounts due them and for which claims of lien were filed: that the said building association be required to pay into court any money due and owing from it to the said contractor; and that said amount, whatever it may be, be apportioned pro rata among the various lien claimants and plaintiffs herein, etc.

The defendants demurred to each of the several counts of the complaint on general and special grounds, but the only point urged on the demurrer is that the complaint, in so far as are concerned the two several counts in which the Heberling and Clark claims are set out, is faulty in that therein there are two causes of action improperly joined and not separately stated. This point will later be considered.

The demurrer to each of the counts having been overruled, the defendant D. B. Day answered the complaint and each of the several counts setting up the claims of the plaintiffs as lien claimants, and the sureties on the faithful performance bond likewise answered the complaint.

The answers of the Elks Building Association to the complaint and each of the several counts thereof are not in the transcript, having been inadvertently omitted therefrom. They have, however, been certified to this court on a suggestion of a diminution of the record, and it is ordered that they be made and that they now do constitute and are a part of the record on this appeal. These answers are in all particulars substantially alike, and therein it is, among other things, alleged (after averments as to the making of the contract between D. B. Day and the association, as already explained, the execution and delivery to it of a faithful performance bond by said Day, in an amount not less than 50 per cent. of the contract price of said building, and the due recordation of said contract and bond) that said association made progress payments on said contract as required thereby, and retained for 35 days and still retains, of the contract price, the sum of $13,321.25, which sum is 25 per cent. of said price. Then, after allegations concerning the work of installing and putting in place upon one end and side of the building an "Anton Lateral Arm awning" by one E. C. Glunz under a contract with said contractor Day, said awning being called for by the contract between said Day and said association, and the payment by the latter to said Glunz of the sum of $717.75 for the materials and work required for that purpose, the said answers proceed:

"Alleges that it is and would be just and equitable to restrict the recovery under the liens filed against said building and property to the amount of $13,321.25, less the said sum of $717.75 to be paid said Glunz as aforesaid, and that judgment be rendered against said contractor and the sureties on his said bond for any deficiency or difference that there may remain between said amount due to said contractor, less said $717.75, and the whole amount found to be due to lien claimants for labor and materials furnished by them for use in and used in said building, in the construction thereof."

The answers referred to further allege that the building association is ready, able, and willing to pay into court, subject to any order made by the court with reference thereto, said sum of $13,321.25, minus the said sum of $717.75 so paid to said Glunz. It is then stated in said answers that certain persons (naming them) had filed claims of lien against the building and had brought suits to foreclose the same; that the contractor, Day, disputed the demands for which said liens were filed, claiming that there were certain offsets existing in his favor and against said demands for which he had not been credited, for which reason, so said answers aver, an accounting was necessary and should be had to the end that it may be ascertained and determined what the true amounts due to the several lien claimants are. The said answers pray that the building association be allowed to pay the said "hold-back" fund into court for the use and benefit of the lien claimants, in accordance with their several rights, as determined and adjudged by the court.

It is not essential to this decision to refer in detail or even recapitulate in substance the findings. It will be sufficient to consider, as will hereinafter be done, the findings which are attacked on one ground or another. We may, at this point, state that, as to the claim of E. C. Glunz, referred to in the answers of the building association, as above indicated, the court found that after the same was filed the said Glunz sold, assigned, and delivered the claim, together with the lien filed to secure the same, to the building association in consideration of the payment to said claimant by said association the full amount of said claim and that said association has ever since and now is entitled to participate in the hold-back fund "now in its hands to the extent of its proportionate part of such fund," etc.

The judgment decrees that the contractor and his bondsmen are liable for the several sums adjudged to be due the lien claimants; that the Visalia Elks Buildings Association has in its possession the sum of $13,066.45 for distribution among the plaintiffs; that the plaintiffs have liens upon the property and the building of the association amounting in the aggregate to the said last-mentioned sum; that each of the plaintiffs has a lien upon said building for that proportion of the amount adjudged to be due him which bears the same ratio to the total amount due him that the sum of $13,066.45 bears to the total of all the amounts adjudged to be due to the plaintiffs. It directs the building association to deposit in court said sum of $13,066.45 within 10 days from the entry of the judgment and orders the clerk forthwith to distribute that amount pro rata among the plaintiffs, and further provides that on the payment of said sum to the clerk the building and property of the building association shall be released and discharged from the plaintiffs' liens. It is further decreed that in the event of the failure of the building association to comply with the requirement of the judgment as to paying into court the "hold-back fund" or the said sum of $13,066.45, within 10 days from the date of the entry of the judgment, the real property of the association described in the pleadings shall be sold in accordance with the usual practice with reference to mortgage foreclosure sales, and that in the event that said property be sold for more than enough to satisfy said claims of lien to the extent and in the amount of said last-mentioned sum of money, together with the costs of sale, the surplus shall be paid over to said association. It is further decreed that the relief awarded to said plaintiffs and specified in paragraph 1 of the judgment to the effect that the builder and his bondsmen are liable for the several sums adjudged to be due the lien claimants, etc., "is entirely separate and distinct from, and independent of, the relief which said plaintiffs are entitled to have by participating in said sum now in the hands of said association and to be paid into court as hereinbefore provided, or, in the event that it is not so paid into court, as hereinbefore provided, of foreclosing and selling said property, but nothing in this judgment contained shall be construed as awarding said plaintiffs, or any of them, or entitling them, or any of them, to more than one recovery hereunder."

It was stipulated by counsel for the appellants that the Elks Building Association "did pay into the superior court of the county of Tulare, state of California, within the time limited in said action, said sum of $13,066.45, which was the 25 per cent. of the contract price, held back by said association." This stipulation does not appear in the printed record on appeal, but is here on suggestion of a diminution of the record, and it is ordered that the same be made a part of the record on this appeal. The points urged by the appellants are quite numerous and involve objections to the complaint in certain particulars and also the claim that certain findings are not supported and that others are inconsistent with each other. An examination of these points has readily convinced us that there is no substantial merit to any of them, and they therefore deserve and will receive but limited consideration herein.

[1] The objection to the complaint is directed against the counts setting forth, respectively, the claims of Heberling and Clark and is based upon the ground that two different causes of action are improperly united and not separately stated in each of said counts. In the Heberling count it is alleged, as will be noted, that on the 27th day of April, 1918, said Heberling filed a lien upon the property of the building association upon the hypothesis that there had been a statutory completion of the building (by occupation and use) on the 1st day of April, 1918, as alleged in the complaint, and it is also alleged in another paragraph of said count that the contract was fully performed on the 21st day of May, 1918, that the building association formally accepted said building on the 22d day of May, 1918, and that Heberling, for the purpose of curing certain defects in the lien so filed, filed a claim of lien on the 4th day of June, 1918. Similar allegations are contained in the Clark count. The argument is that these allegations involve the statement of and improperly join, without separately stating them, two different causes of action, and that the demurrer of the appellants to both counts should have been sustained on that ground. It is perfectly clear that both claims of lien relate to a single indebtedness and that one cause of action only is stated in each of said counts. The contention of the appellants involves a confusion of the relief asked and the remedy whereby it is sought to secure such relief. The lien is merely the remedy provided by the Constitution for the enforcement of the payment of a debt which is incurred against the contractor or the owner of the property by reason of the performance of labor on or the furnishing of materials used in the construction of work upon certain property by third parties, and, obviously, the mere statement in the complaint of two different sets of circumstances upon which that remedy may be invoked to secure a single relief does not involve the statement of two different causes of action.

[2,3] But, in this connection, it is further contended by appellants that there is no authority in law for the amendment of a claim of lien. While express authority is not to be found therefor in the Code, no sound reason against the right to file an amended lien within the 30 days within which an original claim may be filed is apparent. It must be borne in mind at all times that the right of laborers, mechanics, and materialmen to liens for the enforcement of their demands for labor bestowed upon and materials furnished for and used in buildings or other structures, comes directly from the Constitution, and that the rule now is, if justly it were ever otherwise, that the procedure adopted by the Legislature for invoking that right must be liberally viewed and construed. The contention of appellants as to the right to file an amended claim of lien within the time for filing the original claim is, in principle, determined adversely to said contention in Schwarz & Gottlieb, Inc., v. Marcuse, 175 Cal. 401, 165 Pac. 1015.

[4] As to the Murphy claim (assigned to the plaintiff First National Bank, etc.), it is contended that several causes of action are improperly united and not separately stated, to wit: (1) An action on a contract to furnish certain material; (2) an action for the reasonable value of extra work and material. Conceding, for the argument, that these causes of action should have been separately stated, and that the court erred in overruling the demurrer, such error was in no wise prejudicial to appellants. The facts constituting these several causes of action are separately stated, except that the pleader omitted to allege, as in the various other counts, "that the allegations contained in paragraph 1 to 5, both inclusive, are hereby expressly referred to herein, and made a part of this cause of action." Said allegations 1 to 5 are to the effect that the plaintiffs were partnerships or corporations as the case may be and that the Visalia Elks Building Association was a corporation; that the association was the owner of the lot on which the building was erected and caused the building to be constructed; the execution of the contract for the erection of the building; the execution of the faithful performance bond; and the completion of the building. It thus appears that the defendants were fully informed of every fact upon which plaintiffs relied for a recovery. The particular extra work and material, and the reasonable value of each thereof, constituting the several causes of action contained in the single count, are fully stated. The case is not like that of Bowman v. Wohlke, 166 Cal. 121, 135 Pac. 37, where the amended complaint alleged a series of acts, constituting separate causes of action, in one count and then alleged damages in the lump sum of $10,000. The court said (page 127 of 166 Cal., p. 37 of 135 Pac.):

"The complaint in all but two or three instances, where certain items of special injury were alleged, failed to set forth the amount of damages claimed on account of each cause of action. So much, at least, the defendants were entitled to know."

[5, 6] The findings which it is claimed are inconsistent with each other are Nos. 11 and 12. The asserted inconsistency is in the fact that finding 11 declares that the building was actually completed "on or before" the 21st day of May, 1918, while finding 12 states that the building association, its representatives and lessee, entered into the use and occupation of said building on the 1st of April, 1918, and that such entry, use, and occupation "on its part was the equivalent of the completion of said building within the meaning of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure." These findings follow the language of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, if they are inconsistent, so are the provisions of said section. It is manifest, though, that said section is not inconsistent merely because it provides that certain acts by the owner or of those engaged in constructing the building or structure shall, for the purpose of filing liens, be deemed the equivalent of completion; and findings that there have been a deemed completion and also an actual completion of the same building merely mean that there were two different starting points from which the time within which claims of lien may be filed began to run and that lien claimants were at liberty to file their claims with respect to either starting point. It is clear that there can be no inconsistency between findings so declaring. In this connection, it is to be said that there is no foundation for the claim that there is no evidence to support finding 12 to the effect that the building association entered into the use of the building between April 1 and April 27, 1918. The defendant (contractor) Day himself testified (Trans. p. 482) that, while he could not fix the exact date the Elks Lodge moved into the building, he did know that it was during the month of April; that he attended a lodge meeting in the month of April. He further stated (Trans. p. 483):

"The Elks Lodge accepted the building in the month of April. I attended a meeting of the lodge at that time."

[7, 8] It is insisted that the finding that plaintiff Spalding Lumber Company agreed to and did furnish material to the value of $8,885.41 is not supported. The witness Hughes, secretary of said plaintiff, gave a full and complete statement of the materials furnished for and used in the building and testified that the total reasonable value of the materials so furnished and used was the sum of $8,885.41, of which the sum of $5,864.88 had been paid, leaving an unpaid balance of $3,020.53 (Trans. pp. 378, 379). This testimony, of course, affords full support for the finding. Hughes testified that said plaintiff agreed to and did so furnish said materials, and this answers the objection that there is a fatal variance between the allegations and proof as to this claim, in that it is alleged that the materials were furnished under contract, whereas the proof shows that they were furnished on estimates. But the validity of the Spalding claim of lien is challenged on the further ground that "the notice of lien fails to state that all just credits and offsets have been made." The affidavit of Secretary Hughes atached to the notice of claim declares that said claim "contains a correct staement of said claimant's demand after deducting all just credits and offsets." This certainly sufficiently meets the requirement in that respect of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It is claimed that there is no evidence to support the finding that the plaintiff Visalia Water Company furnished water to the contractor for the purposes of the construction of the building to the value of $29.48. We have not been required to examine the record to ascertain whether there was evidence, by way of the testimony of witnesses, introduced in support of said claim for the reason that the answer of the contractor Day and that of the sureties admit that water to the value of $30 was so furnished.

[9] The finding (19) as to the Murphy claim for extras in the sum of $250.50 is attacked for want of evidence to support it, but the attack is groundless. Contractor Day approved and accepted the itemized bill for extras furnished by Murphy, the total amount thereof being the sum of $250.50. It is also contended that Murphy's lien is invalid because prior to filing the same he assigned his claim to the plaintiff bank. The president of plaintiff bank testified that Murphy assigned the claim as collateral security for a loan made to him by said bank. This testimony is corroborated by the fact that Murphy executed and delivered to the bank his note for said loan. Therefore, even if Murphy assigned the claim to the bank prior to the date of the filing of his claim of lien, he still had sufficient interest in the claim to entitle him to file a lien. 18 R. C. L. p. 561. The reference to the testimony as to this assignment is a sufficient reply to the contention that the finding that said assignment was made is without evidentiary support.

[10] The claim that there is no evidence to sustain finding 22 that the plaintiff Pacific St. Elec. Co. filed its claim of lien on June 20, 1918, is, in our opinion, without substantial merit. The objection grows out of the fact that the corporate seal of the said plaintiff (a corporation) was not affixed to the notice of claim of lien; the county recorder refusing to file the claim on that ground and returning the same to said corporation and notifying it of such refusal and the reason therefor. Upon receipt of said claim, said plaintiff remailed the same to the recorder and requested him to file the said claim as of the date the same was first received by said recorder. The specific contention is that the claim was not filed in contemplation of law until the day the claim was received back by the recorder. The recorder testified that the claim of lien was delivered to his office on June 20, 1918. The claim was verified by a duly authorized officer of the corporation, and this fact appeared in the affidavit attached to the claim. We do not think the absence of the plaintiff's corporate seal from the affidavit rendered the notice of claim of lien invalid. The rule is not now, as formerly, that a corporation cannot "express its will, or enter into a contract, except through an instrument under seal." Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) § 1920. The modern rule seems to be that the seal of a corporation performs no other or further function than to impart prima facie verity to the due execution of its written contracts or obligations, and that the execution of contracts by corporations may be shown by parol. Commercial S. Co. v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 178, 184 Pac. 964. Under section 1170 of the Civil Code, the claim of lien, being duly acknowledged by an officer of the corporation authorized to verify and cause it to be filed, was deemed to be filed on the day (19th day of June, 1918) when said officer deposited it with the county recorder, and, we may add that, since the claim was upon its face in all respects in legal form, it did not rest with the recorder to question the sufficiency of the form thereof and so refuse to record it. But, at all events, under section 1197 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the said plaintiff has a right of personal action against the contractor, and, on the authority of General Electric Co. v. Baltimore Bonding Co., 180 Cal. 675, 182 Pac. 444, said plaintiff was entitled to proceed in a direct personal action on the faithful performance bond.

The objection that the finding as to the Glunz claim, heretofore referred to, is not authorized by the evidence, cannot be sustained. On pages 460 and 467 of the transcript will be found testimony by Glunz to the effect that he agreed with the contractor to and did put up an awning on the building for the price of $717.75, and that that sum represented the reasonable value of said awning and the labor performed upon it.

[11] There is no legal force to the proposition maintained by appellants that Heberling and Clark should have been put to an election as between the original and amended claims filed by them, respectively, and that it was error to admit the claims without requiring such election. Both the original and amended notices of claim of lien in each instance, as already pointed out, related to the same indebtedness, and it was therefore not material which of the two was relied on, it appearing that each was filed within due legal time after the completion, statutory or actual, of the building.

[12] It is urged that the notice of claim of lien of the plaintiff Pioneer Brick Company was defective because it failed to state that the amount of the demand therein set forth was due "after deducting all just credits and offsets," the italicized words having been omitted from the notice. The notice states that "there now remains due, owing and unpaid from said D. B. Day to this claimant the sum of $636.35." Section 1187, supra, provides that a lien claimant "must file for record * * * a claim of lien containing a statement of his demand after deducting all just credits and offsets." Assuming that that language means that the claim must contain the statement that there are "no just credits or offsets" against the claim where there is none, the omission of a statement to that effect in the notice of claim of lien cannot have the effect of invalidating the claim or the act of recording it, since section 1203 of the Code of Civil Procedure expressly declares that errors or mistakes in the statement of the demand or of the amount of credits, etc., shall not have that effect. It is not claimed that there were any credits or offsets which should have been deducted from the demand set forth in said claim.

[13] It is contended that, while the prayer of the Heberling et al. complaint asks that the building association be required to pay into court any money due and owing from it to the contractor, D. B. Day, yet there is no allegation in said pleading that said association had in its possession or custody any moneys which were due the contractor under the contract. It is true that the complaint contains no allegations as to the so-called "hold-back" fund, but, as before shown, the answers of the building association allege that it has a balance (25 per cent. of the contract price) in its hands and prays that the liability of said association (the owner) be limited to the amount of such fund. This was, of course, sufficient to show that there was a fund in the hands of the owner subject to be applied to the payment of the debts arising by reason of the performance of the contract by the contractor.

[14] There have now been considered such of the points affecting the remedy by lien invoked herein as it has been conceived merited special attention, and, as must be obvious from the discussion, those points are wholly devoid of force. If, however, it were necessary to concede that any of the points so urged are well taken, the plaintiffs, as before suggested, have their right to a direct action against the contractor and his sureties on the faithful performance bond; and they have, as seen, exercised that right in this case. It follows that, even if any of the claims of liens or all of them were for any reason invalid, the plaintiffs and each of them are fully protected by the judgment against the sureties on said bond. And in this connection, we may consider the contention of the appellants that the judgment against the sureties is excessive. The aggregate amount of the judgment is $23,000. The defendant sureties obligated themselves in the sum of $14,000, $14,000, $15,000, and $13,000, respectively. The judgment is joint and several. The judgment directs the owner to pay the sum of $13,321.25 into court to be applied pro rata on the judgment. As seen, a stipulation is on file herein to the effect that the Visalia Elks Building Association did pay said sum into court and that on the stipulation of the parties it was paid to the various claimants. It thus appears that by such payments the judgment has been reduced to about $10,000, or $3,000 less than the amount of the obligation of any surety. Under such circumstances the appellants cannot complain.

The judgment is affirmed.

FORWARD et al. v. SAN DIEGO COUNTY et al. (L. A. 7133.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 10, 1922. Rehearing Denied Nov. 9, 1922.)

1. Officers ⟸100(1)—Appointment of advisory board held to increase compensation of assessor in violation of Constitution.

Where the Board of Supervisors of San Diego county, acting under Pol. Code, § 4041b, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1336, appointed an advisory board to co-operate with county assessor, whether members of the advisory board are officers or employees, their function is to aid the assessor in performing his duties, and hence the effect thereof was to increase the compensation of the assessor after his election and during his term of office, in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9.

2. Statutes ⟸102(2) — Statute for appointment of advisory board to co-operate with assessor held to violate requirement as to general and uniform laws as to compensation.

Pol. Code, § 4041b, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1336, providing for appointment of an advisory board to co-operate with the county assessor whenever, in the judgment of the board of supervisors of any county, it is deemed for the county's best interest, violates Const. art. 11, § 5, requiring general and uniform laws for appointment and compensation of officers, in that it delegates to the board of supervisors the right to determine when the advisory board shall be appointed, thus allowing the board to add to the assessor's compensation in its discretion, the allowance of additional deputies or assistants being an increase thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edgar A. Luce, Judge.

Action by John F. Forward, Jr., and others, against the County of San Diego and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. S. Utley, of San Diego, and E. S. Lovett, for appellants.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiffs, as citizens and taxpayers of the county of San Diego, brought this action against the said county, C. R. Hammond, as auditor of the said county, and George W. Heston, as treasurer of the said county, to have annulled and declared void an order of the board of supervisors of the said county appointing "an advisory board to co-operate with the county assessor of the said county of San Diego in making the annual appraisement of real property therein for taxation purposes," and appointing the three members thereof; to restrain, enjoin, and prohibit defendant C. R. Hammond, as auditor of the said county, from drawing warrants for claims presented to the board of supervisors in the month of September, 1921, and allowed by it, or any claims thereafter arising under the order, for compensation and expenses of members of the advisory board; to restrain, enjoin and prohibit defendant George W. Heston, as treasurer of the said county, from paying any such claim; for general relief and for costs. The order was passed by the board of supervisors on June 12, 1921, under the authority of section 4041b of the Political Code as amended by St. 1919, p. 1336, which provides:

"Whenever, in the judgment of the board of supervisors of any county, it is deemed to be for the best interest of the county, on account of changes in land values, that there be appointed an advisory board to co-operate with the county assessor in making the annual appraisement of real property therein for taxation purposes, the board of supervisors, by a four-fifths vote, may appoint such advisory board, which shall consist of three members. Before any person thus appointed shall enter upon the duties of his office, he shall take the oath of office and shall execute such bond as the supervisors may prescribe. The members of the advisory board shall be allowed their necessary expenses and each member shall receive a compensation of not to exceed ten dollars per day while actually engaged in the duties of his office. Competent persons may be employed to compile records necessary for determining the true value of land. All claims for compensation and expenses hereunder shall be paid out of the general fund of the county after approval by the board of supervisors."

In the order the three members were appointed to serve on the advisory board, and pursuant thereto they took the oath of office, furnished bond, and proceeded to exercise the powers and functions of such advisory board. The claims for compensation and expenses above referred to were presented and allowed.

In their complaint plaintiffs alleged there was no warrant of law for the appointment of the members of the advisory board or the creation of the board, that the order of the board of supervisors is in violation of certain sections of the Constitution of this state, and that the appointments of the members of the advisory board were ultra vires the board of supervisors. Defendants interposed a demurrer on the grounds that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or to entitle plaintiffs to relief by injunction or to any equitable relief whatsoever. The demurrer was overruled, and, defendants declining to answer, judgment was entered declaring the order of the board of supervisors void, and enjoining each of the defendants as prayed in the complaint. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

[1] Counsel for the respective parties have dealt chiefly in their briefs with the question whether or not the members of the boards provided for in section 4041b are county officers or employees, for respondent contends that, if they are public officers, the act violates section 4, art. 11, of the Constitution, providing for a uniform system of county governments, and section 5 of article 11, to the effect that the Legislature shall provide by general and uniform laws for the election or appointment of county officers. Respondents also insist that the allowance of their claims would, in effect, amount to an increase of the salary of the county assessor, in violation of section 9 of article 11, of the Constitution. We are of the opinion that this latter contention must be sustained, and that it is immaterial in this connection whether the members of the boards are officers or employees. Whichever they are, their function is to aid the county assessor in performing the duties which devolve upon him by law.

At the time of the adoption of section 4041b of the Political Code San Diego county belonged to the seventh class (Pol. Code, §§ 4005c, 4006, since amended, Stats. 1921, p. 2), in which county the assessor was paid a fixed amount for his own salary and allowed deputies at specified salaries (Pol. Code, § 4236), to be paid out of the county treasury (Pol. Code, § 4288).

In Newman v. Lester, 11 Cal. App. 577, 105 Pac. 785, it was held that—

"Where the statute provides a fixed salary for the officer and a separate allowance for expenses of his office (Kirkwood v. Soto, 87 Cal. 394, 25 Pac. 488); or a fixed salary for the officer and a fixed salary for a certain number of deputies or clerks, all payable out of the county treasury, an increase of such separate allowance for expenses or for deputies, whether in the number of deputies or the amount paid to each, is not a violation of the constitutional provision that 'the compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office' (Const. § 9, art. 11)."

This decision has been followed in the recent case of Foucht v. Hirni (Cal. App.) 208 Pac. 362, but in neither case was there a petition for a hearing in this court. The doctrine announced in Newman v. Lester, supra, was referred to in Elder v. Garey, 19 Cal. App. 775, 127 Pac. 826, and County of Calaveras v. Poe, 167 Cal. 519, 140 Pac. 23. This is the first time the precise question has been presented to this court.

In the case of Newman v. Lester, supra, the court apparently overlooked the fact that the Political Code (section 4290) expressly required that the officer should pay all deputies and assistants other than those there mentioned, and that this provision applied to all the counties in the state, regardless of whether or not in the Political Code a lump sum was allowed the officer or whether he was allowed a certain number of deputies at a salary fixed in the statute. At the time the case of Newman v. Lester, supra, was decided, section 4290 of the Political Code provided:

"The salaries and fees provided in this title shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers named in this title either as officers or ex officio officers their deputies and assistants, unless in this title otherwise provided, and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries provided in this title, unless in this title otherwise provided. * * *"

Under this section, which, so far as hereinabove quoted, remains the same, it is obvious that to relieve the officer of the obligation to pay extra deputies and assistants, is to increase his salary to that extent, irrespective of the question as to whether in that particular county he is given a lump sum from which he is to secure his own remuneration and pay all deputies or assistants, or whether he is given a fixed salary and a certain number of deputies and assistants, also at fixed salaries, and is also required to pay additional deputies and assistants from his own salary. The case of Newman v. Lester, supra, having overlooked this provision of the statute, cannot be regarded as authority, and this is equally true of Foucht v. Hirni, supra.

Section 5, art. 11, of the Constitution, requires that the Legislature shall provide by general and uniform laws for the appointment of county officers, and shall regulate their compensation. It was held in Tulare County v. May, 118 Cal. 303, 50 Pac. 427, that the compensation of officers by means of the two systems referred to in Newman v. Lester, supra, did not destroy the uniformity of county government required by this section. No matter which system is followed, the compensation in each case is for the performance of the duties of the particular office, whether they be performed by the officer or by his deputies or assistants. To hold that, where the officer pays his own deputies or assistants, he could not be allowed additional aid, and where the deputies or assistants are paid from the county treasury he could, would be to destroy the very uniformity of system which in Tulare County v. May, supra, was held to obtain.

As the increase in compensation consists in paying out additional money from the county treasury, whether paid directly to the deputy or assistant, or indirectly through the county officer, to secure the performance of the duties of the office, it makes no difference whether the duties are performed by a new county officer or by additional persons employed in such an office. The result is the same in each instance, and the county is required to pay more for the operation of the office. The appointment of the members of the board in the case at bar is a granting of additional aid to the county assessor, and therefore violates the constitutional inhibition in this respect. Newman v. Lester, supra, and the cases citing it to this point, are disapproved.

[2] The act is also violative of section 5 of article 11, in that it delegates to the supervisors the right to determine when the members of the board shall be appointed, thus allowing the board of supervisors to add to the compensation of a county officer at its discretion, for, as already pointed out, the allowance of additional deputies or assistants is an increase of compensation. It is true that the board of supervisors has a right to employ persons to assist in the performance of the duties that devolve upon the supervisors; for instance, to employ a superintendent of the county hospital and of the poor farm, and other persons, to enable them to discharge their many duties as supervisors, which it is not intended they should perform personally. In this sense only are they entitled to employ persons and fix their salaries as employees of the county. The persons contemplated by section 4041b being engaged to aid a county officer, the board of supervisors has no authority in the matter. Skidmore v. West, 186 Cal. 212, 199 Pac. 497.

Judgment affirmed.

PREWITT v. SUNNYMEAD ORCHARD CO. et al. (L. A. 6526.)

1. Limitation of actions ⟸100(12) — Facts held not to amount to notice of fraud starting statute running.

As respects right to rescind for fraud a purchase of capital stock, the fact that no dividends had been paid, that four assessments had been levied upon the stockholders, and that stockholders had discussed dividing the corporation's land among them to save it from being taken upon a mortgage foreclosure, held not to so put plaintiff on inquiry as to amount to discovery of the fraud sufficient to start the running of Code Civ. Proc. § 338.

2. Corporations ⟸80(9)—Purchaser of stock not charged with knowledge of facts contained in corporation's books.

Though, under Civ. Code, § 19, relating to constructive notice, where a purchaser of stock had no actual knowledge of circumstances which would lead her to examine the corporation's books, or of matters which appeared therein, and as there was no duty imposed upon her by law to examine them, she cannot be charged with constructive knowledge of the facts which an examination might have led her to discover.

3. Cancellation of instruments ⟸60—Not necessary for court to order contract rescinded where notice of rescission had been served by plaintiff.

Where, in an action to rescind a contract on the ground of fraud, it was found that plaintiff served notice of rescission on defendant, and the other findings showed that her repudiation was fully justified, it was not necessary for the court to order the contract rescinded.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Addie Lillian Prewitt against the Sunnymead Orchard Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Evans, Abbott & Pearce, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Fred N. Arnoldy, of Los Angeles, and John W. Lester, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This action was brought by plaintiff, Addie Lillian Prewitt, to have rescinded a contract which she had entered into with defendant Sunnymead Orchard Company for the purchase of 1,000 shares of its stock, and to recover damages, upon the ground that the purchase was induced by fraudulent representations made by the defendant company through defendants N. A. Ross and A. G. Stearns, who were respectively its president and secretary, plaintiff having previously served notice of rescission. The purchase was made on May 7, 1913, plaintiff taking the stock at the par value of $1 per share. Part of the purchase price was paid in cash, and for the balance notes were given, which plaintiff afterward paid. The business of the company was the improvement and subdivision of farm lands, and the alleged fraud consisted in falsely representing that it had actually paid more than $85,000 on account of the purchase of its lands, whereas in fact it had paid only about $18,000, and in further representing that the individual defendants thought so well of the stock that they had personally invested $50,000 therein in money, whereas they had in fact invested nothing.

The notice of rescission was not served until October 1, 1918, more than five years after the purchase of the stock, and the complaint was not filed until January 31, 1919. Plaintiff in her complaint alleged that she had no knowledge, notice or suspicion of the facts constituting the fraud complained of prior to September 15, 1918; that the circumstances under which she discovered the falsity of the representations were that on September 15, 1918, defendant N. A. Ross caused a special meeting of the stockholders to be held, at which he endeavored to force the consent of the stockholders to the granting of an option on the property of the company for $2,500; that in the discussion which thereupon ensued she was informed and learned for the first time that about 500 acres of land, which constituted a large part of the company's tract, had, on December 1, 1915, been deeded back by the company to the person from whom it had been purchased, for no other consideration than a release from its obligation to pay the unpaid balance due on it; that plaintiff expressed surprise that the land should be deeded back without consideration after more than one-half of the purchase price had been paid; that thereupon plaintiff learned and discovered for the first time that the company had not invested the sum of $85,207.50 in money in the land, and that, after diligent investigation, she learned that not over $18,207.50 had been so invested, whereupon she gave notice of her rescission. It was also alleged that the defendants, until September 15, 1918, concealed these facts from plaintiff, and contrived to and did keep her in ignorance of them.

The defendants denied all the allegations of fraud, and, in addition, pleaded the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 338), and further alleged that the action was barred by the plaintiff's laches under section 1691 of the Civil Code.

The trial court made detailed findings in favor of the plaintiff upon all the issues raised by the pleadings, and pursuant thereto judgment was rendered in her favor against defendants Sunnymead Orchard Company and N. A. Ross, defendant A. G. Stearns not having been served with summons, and not having appeared. From that judgment defendants Sunnymead Orchard Company and N. A. Ross take this appeal.

Appellants concede that there was at least some evidence to support the findings in favor of respondent upon all of the allegations necessary to constitute a cause of action for fraud, their single contention being "that this action was barred by the statute and by laches on the part of respondent," predicating their contention upon the provisions of the two Code sections already cited. It is not made clear whether their claim is that the findings do not support the judgment or that the evidence does not support the findings. They express their contention in five propositions: First, that respondent at the time she purchased the stock expected an income therefrom in the way of dividends to begin soon after investing, and that therefore, when such dividends were not forthcoming, she was put upon notice which should have caused her to investigate the reasons thereof; second, that, instead of dividends being forthcoming, four assessments were thereafter levied, one in January, one in June, and one in December, 1916, and one in May, 1918, and that these assessments should have given her further notice that the condition of the company was precarious; third, that she should have had notice of the condition of the company by reason of discussions which were had with stockholders, of which she was cognizant, with reference to a proposed plan of dividing the land of the company among the stockholders for the purpose of saving it from being taken upon a mortgage foreclosure; fourth, that she should have been put upon inquiry, as a stockholder interested in the affairs of the company, by the fact that the books of the company disclosed that the land was deeded back to the original owners for the purpose of satisfying the mortgage more than three years before she filed her action for rescission; fifth, that she should be held, as a stockholder, to know from the books of the company that 10,000 shares of stock, owned by various stockholders, had been sold at 5 cents per share to satisfy delinquent assessments, and that she should have been put upon inquiry by this fact.

Without disputing the soundness of the findings concerning the discovery of the fraud, appellants claim these matters should have caused respondent to investigate the affairs of the company long before she commenced her action, and that had she pursued such an inquiry she would have learned long before September 15, 1918, all she was found to have learned on that date.

The court found that—

"The defendants at all the times mentioned, and until the said 23d day of September, 1918, concealed from the plaintiff the fact that the defendant corporation, on or about December 1, 1915, deeded back approximately 500 acres of said tract as in paragraph VII of the complaint is alleged, and contrived to and did keep the plaintiff in ignorance of the said fact until the said 23d day of September, 1918, for the purpose and with the intent of concealing from the plaintiff, and preventing plaintiff from discovering, her said cause of action and the falsity of the representations and statements so made to her by the defendants as aforesaid; that defendants caused a number of the stockholders of defendant corporation to meet on or about November 1, 1915, for the purpose of assenting to the said conveyance; and that defendants contrived to and did keep the plaintiff in ignorance thereof, and failed to give the plaintiff any notice thereof, and contrived to and did conceal the said fact from the plaintiff, and that plaintiff did not have or receive, and had not had or received, any notice, knowledge or suspicion thereof until the said 23d day of September, 1918; that the said sum of $180 on account of assessments levied and declared by defendant corporation as aforesaid was paid by plaintiff to the defendants, * * * and that no part of said sums have been repaid to plaintiff; and that during the said period, and at the times of the payment of said assessments, plaintiff had a number of conversations with the defendants, and that the defendants in such conversations represented and stated that the purpose of said assessments was to raise funds to take care of interest installments accruing on the unpaid purchase price of said tract, and to defray expenses of the nursery operated by defendant corporation in connection therewith, and further that, by reason of the depressing effect of the World War upon the real estate market, defendants had been unable to make sales and to carry out their plans for subdividing, improving, and selling the said tract, and that therefore no proceeds or profits had theretofore accrued therefrom and said assessments had become necessary; that the plaintiff, believing that the World War and the conditions resulting therefrom had delayed and interfered with the said plans of defendants, and that by reason thereof no proceeds or profits had as yet accrued, and that therefore said assessments had become necessary, did not make any investigation as to the financial condition or affairs of defendant corporation prior to the 23d day of September, 1918; that plaintiff is a woman without any experience in or knowledge of the affairs of corporations or of the rights of stockholders, and without any experience in business enterprises or investments, and that plaintiff at all times until the 23d day of September, 1918, relied upon the said representations and statements so made to her by defendants as aforesaid, and believed them to be true, and had no reason to believe or to suppose or to suspect, the same to be false or untrue until the said 23d day of September, 1918, and that at no time prior thereto did the plaintiff have any notice, knowledge, information, or suspicion, as to the falsity of the said representations and statements, nor did any facts or circumstances come to the notice, knowledge or attention of the plaintiff which caused her, or which would have caused any person of ordinary prudence, to believe or to suspect that the said representations or statements were false or untrue in any respect, until the said 23d day of September, 1918."

Appellants' contention apparently is that in the particulars mentioned the evidence does not support the portion of this finding we have italicized, and that facts and circumstances did come to respondent's attention which should have put her upon inquiry as to the truth of the representations and statements before September, 1918. This position is untenable.

[1] With reference to the first point, that there was no income from respondent's investment, appellant Ross himself testified he "explained to her that our plan was to develop the land and sell it planted, and it would be some time before we could hope to get any quick returns out of it." V. M. Tresslar, a witness for appellants, stated that the condition of the real estate market between 1913 and 1918 was very poor; that, as a result of a freeze in 1912 and 1913, followed by the breaking out of war, there was practically no sale for land of the character of that which the company owned. Respondent testified she went to appellant Ross' office several times, and "I asked Mr. Ross how things were progressing, and he was always very optimistic; and always gave me a good report; that everything was all right." Respondent also testified that—

"I frequently asked him when I was in there, if everything was prosperous, and he always replied that it was.

"Q. Didn't you go further than that and ask him whether the company was not getting into a very bad condition? A. Oh, no sir; I never did.

"Q. Did you ever feel the company was getting into a bad condition until you had this conversation with Mr. Ross in September, 1918? A. No, sir. * * *

"Q. You had no suspicion that the company was failing? A. No, sir; none whatever. Mr. Stearns had told me that Mr. Ross was very deliberate in his transactions, and he had always made a success, and I had no reason to doubt the statement."

Silas Prewitt, respondent's husband, testified that—

"He [Ross] always told me that things looked all right; and of course he mentioned the fact that there was no land being sold, and that there had been a depression in real estate, and spoke of the different conditions; but he says 'We will come out all right, because we have got plenty of time on this proposition; and I am having prospective customers.' And several times he spoke that he thought he had deals in view whereby he would dispose of some or all of the land."

Touching the second point, concerning the assessments, respondent testified she knew nothing about the corporation business, and had not considered the matter of paying assessments; that she paid the assessments; that she paid them to appellant Ross, who always told her everything was prosperous. Appellant Ross stated that respondent said "she was disappointed that we had to have an assessment; that she didn't understand that we was going to have assessments. I told her we were all disappointed—I was, I was sure, because it hit me pretty heavy, and we hoped to get through without it, but, under the conditions, it was impossible to do it and we had to take care of our interest and other obligations, or lose out, that was all"; that "I explained to her each time that the necessity of the assessments was that we were in bad luck and couldn't make sales, and we had to dig up money to keep our interest paid up, to keep from selling our land; but we were hoping to pull through."

On the third point, regarding the matter of dividing up the land, respondent testified that appellant Ross had said the stockholders could always have the land; that it could be divided if any one wanted it; that they did not discuss about dividing it, but that he said it could be divided—that if any one wanted their land they could have it; and that at the time of these conversations she still believed the land was over half paid for.

It cannot be said, in view of this evidence, that the facts mentioned in appellant's first three points were sufficient to put respondent upon inquiry as to the company's interest in the land, which was the subject of the fraudulent representations. According to her testimony, she knew nothing about the company's business, and relied on Ross' statements as to its financial condition. He, as president of the company, told her there would be no immediate profits, that the assessments were to meet interest payments and make improvements, and that, as a protection the stockholders could take portions of the company's land in exchange for their stock if they wished to do so, notwithstanding he knew that only $18,000 instead of $85,000 had been paid on a total purchase price of $123,000 for the land. In the face of the findings we cannot say there is anything in this evidence which would lead respondent to suspect that the company owned but a small equity in its lands.

[2] With reference to appellant's last two points it remains to consider whether, assuming the matter shown by the company's books would have been sufficient to put respondent on inquiry, she must be deemed to have had knowledge of all such records solely because she was a stockholder. It was found, and is not disputed, that she did not know the land had been deeded back to the former owners, and she testified that she did not know any stock had been sold at 5 cents per share to satisfy delinquent assessments.

Section 19 of the Civil Code provides:

"Every person who has had actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, has constructive notice of the fact itself in all cases in which, by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact."

In Tarke v. Bingham, 123 Cal. 163, 166, 55 Pac. 759, 760, referring to this section, it was said:

"But the converse of the proposition is equally true. Where no duty is imposed by law upon a person to make inquiry, and where under the circumstances 'a prudent man' would not be put upon inquiry, the mere fact that means of knowledge are open to a plaintiff, and he has not availed himself of them, does not debar him from relief when thereafter he shall make actual discovery. The circumstances must be such that the inquiry becomes a duty, and the failure to make it a negligent omission."

It is said in Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) § 731, p. 2620, referring specifically to actions by a stockholder against a corporation, that—

"It is not incumbent upon the stockholder to keep himself informed as to the various acts of the corporation. He is not chargeable with knowledge merely because he might have ascertained the facts by an examination of the corporate books."

Appellants rely on the case of Lady Washington Consolidated Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 45 Pac. 809, wherein the plaintiff corporation sought to have set aside a release of a claim against an estate of which the defendant was executor, which release it was asserted was fraudulently executed by plaintiff's directors. In that case the court held:

"They [the stockholders] were chargeable with knowledge of all the acts of the directors which were spread upon the records of the corporation, and of all the facts connected therewith that the inquiry suggested thereby would have disclosed. * * * 'The shareholders of a corporation cannot avoid responsibility for the unauthorized acts of their agent, by abstaining from inquiry into the affairs of the company, or by absenting themselves from the company's meetings, and at the same time reap the benefit of their acts in case of success.' Underhill v. Santa Barbara, etc., Co., 93 Cal. 312."

That case is distinguishable from the one at bar upon two grounds. First, in that case it was "not averred that any of these facts, or of the transactions set forth as constituting the fraud, were done secretly, or were concealed from the plaintiff, or that any information which it sought was refused or that, indeed, it sought to obtain any information upon the subject." In the case at bar all such matters were alleged in the complaint and specifically found by the court in favor of respondent. In The Lady Washington Consolidated Co. v. Wood, supra, the action was brought by the company to recover property which it was alleged had been fraudulently disposed of by its agents, the directors of the company. The company and its stockholders in such a case clearly would be charged with knowledge of the acts of their agents, the directors, as they were recorded in the books. In this case respondent sued as an individual upon the rescission of the contract with the company; no rights of third persons or their dealings with the company are involved and no such question of estoppel is raised.

Inasmuch as respondent had no actual knowledge of circumstances which would lead her to examine the books or of the matters which appeared therein, and as there was no duty imposed upon her by law to examine them, she cannot be charged with constructive knowledge of the facts which an examination of the books might have led her to discover.

[3] Appellants ask that the judgment be reversed or set aside because it grants respondent her relief without adjudging that the contract be rescinded. It is said in Benjamin on Sales (5th Ed.) p. 461, that—

"It is not necessary that there should be a judgment of court in order to effect the avoidance of a contract, when the deceived party repudiates it. The rescission is the legal consequence of his election to reject it, and takes date from the time at which he announces this election to the opposite party."

In American Type Founders' Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 459, 62 Pac. 744, it was held that, where one contracting party, after the other's failure to perform his obligations under the contract, served notice of rescission on the latter, "the rescission was complete and perfect, and the court should have so found."

In the case at bar, it was found that respondent served notice of rescission, and the other findings show that her repudiation of the contract was fully justified. Under such circumstances it was not necessary that the court order it rescinded.

Judgment affirmed.

BLACKWELL v. AMERICAN FILM CO., Inc., et al. (L. A. 7008.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 10, 1922. Rehearing Denied Nov. 9, 1922.)

1. Death ⊜27—Recovery for death not barred by deceased's recovery for injury.

That a person injured by negligence recovered damages before his death from an operation to correct his crippled condition does not in itself prevent his widow from recovering the damages she has sustained by reason of his death.

2. Death ⊜76—Evidence held to show negligent injury caused death from shock of surgical operation.

In an action for death by shock from an operation performed to cure a crippled condition resulting from negligent injuries not of a fatal nature, evidence held to warrant the jury's finding that the accident was the proximate cause of death.

3. Death ⊜17—Surgical operation held not intervening cause of death of injured person.

Where one injured by defendant's negligence died from the shock of a proper surgical operation performed in an endeavor to cure a crippled condition due to injuries not of a fatal nature, and there was no evidence that the physicians were not competent, or that deceased was negligent in employing them, the operation was not an intervening cause relieving defendant from liability.

4. Death ⊜86(1)—Damages to surviving wife and children pecuniary loss.

That one negligently injured had recovered damages for permanent injuries before his death is immaterial in the widow's suit to recover for his death, the measure of damages being the pecuniary loss suffered by her and her children by reason of the loss of her husband in his crippled condition.

5. Highways ⊜184(2)—Evidence held to justify finding of negligence in driving on left side.

Evidence held to justify implied finding of negligence in driving colliding car on the left side of the highway.

6. Highways ⊜175(1)—Driving on left side negligence per se.

Driving an automobile on left side of highway when approaching another vehicle coming in the opposite direction is negligence per se (Stats. 1917, pp. 382, 401).

7. Appeal and error ⊜880(1)—Joint tort-feasor may not complain that jury exonerated other tort-feasor.

Where the negligence of both defendants, one the owner of an auto stage in which deceased was riding, and the other an owner of a colliding automobile, contributed to deceased's death, the colliding auto owner cannot complain that jury exonerated stage company.

8. Death ⊜58(1)—Finding of due care on part of injured person warranted by presumption.

In action for the death of an automobile stage passenger injured in a collision with an automobile operated by defendant, the presumption of due care on part of decedent, arising from the absence of evidence as to his conduct, warranted the implied finding, according to Code Civ. Proc. § 1961, that he exercised ordinary care, though there was no evidence that he protested to the driver of the stage or that he offered to leave it.

9. Appeal and error ⊜1051(1)—Conclusion of lay witness concerning fractured bone held not prejudicial where bone condition was otherwise made clear.

In an action by a wife for her husband's death, where it was otherwise clear that there was no union of decedent's fractured bone, defendant held not prejudiced by admission of wife's conclusion that there was no union.

10. Evidence ⊜314(1)—Wife's statement that deceased husband was told by physician to undergo operation held not hearsay.

In an action by a wife for her husband's death caused by shock from a surgical operation, the wife could testify that decedent's physician told him to undergo the operation, since this testimony went to the fact that decedent followed his physician's instructions, and was not proof of a fact related by the physician, and hence not obnoxious to the hearsay rule.

11. Appeal and error ⊜930(4)—Verdict for death presumed based on elements other than deceased's earning capacity not shown.

In a widow's action for the death of her crippled husband, where there was no evidence warranting an implied finding of the earning capacity alleged in the complaint, the jury in awarding damages cannot be held to have made such finding, since in assessing damages they were not limited to evidence of deceased's earning capacity and it will be presumed that other elements of damage were considered.

12. Death ⟹103(3)—Evidence of contributory negligence held insufficient for jury.

Where there was no evidence as to the conduct of deceased, it was proper to withdraw the issue of contributory negligence from the jury.

13. Trial ⟹243—Instructions concerning physician's unnecessary operation as independent intervening act held not to conflict with instruction upon injured person's due care in selecting physician.

An instruction that, if deceased used ordinary care in selecting his physician, defendant, who caused the injury resulting in death, could not defend that the physician failed to give proper treatment, held not to conflict with instruction that improper treatment would not relieve defendant, but, if the physician performed an unnecessary experiment, which alone resulted fatally, defendant would not be liable, since the latter instruction was, in effect, that an unnecessary operation would constitute an independent intervening act.

14. Appeal and error ⟹1066—In action for death, inapplicable instruction upon deceased's expectancy of life held not prejudicial.

In an action for death, an instruction that for a person 46 years old the probable expectancy of life is 23.81 years, where deceased was only 36 years old, was not prejudicial, even though inapplicable, as the instruction was upon this theory favorable to defendant.

15. Death ⟹104(4)—Instruction on damages to widow of deceased compensated by former judgment held proper.

In a widow's action for negligent death of her husband, compensated by a former judgment recovered before his death, it was proper to give an instruction informing the jury that, even if the deceased had been fully compensated for loss of earning power, the value of his society, comfort, protection, nurture, and education could be recovered; such losses being personal to the widow and her children.

16. Trial ⟹296(11)—Instruction as to comfort and nurture deceased father would have rendered his family in action by them proper in view of other instruction.

In an action for death to compensate wife and children instruction held proper as not taking from the jury the question whether deceased would probably have given comfort, nurture, etc., to his family, where another instruction in effect informed the jury they should consider what comfort, nurture, etc., deceased would have rendered.

17. Death ⟹104(6)—Executors and administrators ⟹51—Instruction that decedent's recovery for injury causing death constituted assets of his estate held correct.

In an action by a widow as administratrix for the negligent death of her husband, where defendant maintained that decedent's former recovery could be shown in mitigation of damages, an instruction that the money recovered by decedent was an asset of his estate to pay debts, the balance going to his widow and children, was correct.

18. Trial ⟹260(1)—No error can be based on refusal of instructions embodied in another instruction of similar import.

A third instruction of substantially similar import, given at appellant's request, precludes error as to two instructions of that import refused.

19. Death ⟹86(1)—Deceased's physical condition considered in estimating damages.

In an action by a widow for negligent death of her husband, crippled by injuries, compensated by a judgment recovered before his death, it was necessary for the jury, in estimating the pecuniary loss to the widow and her children, to consider the husband's crippled condition.

20. Death ⟹99(4)—$10,000 damages to wife and children held not excessive.

$10,000 damages held not grossly disproportionate to the loss sustained by the wife and children of deceased, who was 36 years old, and had been compensated for the same negligent injuries crippling him.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Rachel E. Blackwell, administratrix of the estate of Edward W. Blackwell, deceased, against the American Film Company, Incorporated, and the United Stages, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff and the United Stages, and defendant American Film Company appeals. Affirmed.

Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake and Duke Stone, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiff, Rachel E. Blackwell, administratrix of the estate of Edward W. Blackwell, deceased, brought this action against defendants American Film Company, Incorporated, a corporation, and United Stages, a corporation, to recover damages for the death of said Edward W. Blackwell, her husband. The action was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff and defendant United Stages, and against defendant American Film Company, awarding damages against the latter defendant in the sum of $10,000. Judgment was entered on the verdict, from which defendant American Film Company takes this appeal.

The admitted facts of the case are that on November 27, 1918, the decedent was a passenger in an automobile stage owned by respondent United Stages, and was traveling from Santa Barbara to Los Angeles. At a point between Santa Barbara and Ventura a collision occurred between the stage in which the decedent was riding and an automobile driven by one of appellant's employees, who was traveling from Los Angeles to Santa Barbara. In this collision the decedent was seriously injured. He was first taken to a hospital in Ventura, later removed to one in Los Angeles, and finally taken to his home. His leg was broken above the knee, and no union of the bone could be effected. An operation was performed in June, 1919, which was unsuccessful. Following this operation decedent was taken home, where he remained for five months, at the end of which time, by the use of a walking splint, he was able to get about on crutches. On January 22, 1920, a second operation was performed to effect a bone transplantation, and a short time after the operation he died. It was alleged in the complaint that the collision was due to the negligence of appellant and respondent United Stages in the operation of their respective automobiles, and that the decedent's death resulted from the injuries he received in the accident.

The decedent during his lifetime commenced an action against appellant and respondent United Stages for damages for his injuries, in which a verdict against appellant was returned in his favor for $13,762. Judgment on the verdict was affirmed on appeal ([Cal. App.] 192 Pac. 189), and the said amount, together with interest and costs, was paid to Rachel Blackwell, as administratrix of his estate, the decedent having died between the time judgment was rendered and when it became final.

[1] 1. The first contention of appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. It is insisted in this connection that there is no evidence showing that the death of decedent was proximately caused by injuries received in the collision. Appellant's theory is that the evidence shows that decedent was permanently injured in the collision, for which condition he was fully compensated by appellant; that, aside from the injury to his leg, he was apparently restored to health, and would have lived on indefinitely; that the second operation was not necessary, and was not performed to save his life, but in the hope of correcting his "stationary crippled condition," for which he had been compensated; that he died from the effects of shock attendant upon the operation, and that it would be unjust to say that the decedent would have a legal right to attempt to remedy such a permanent condition at appellant's risk. Respondent Rachel Blackwell's position is that the original fracture of the leg was responsible for decedent's death; that the operation was a necessary and scientific one; that it only contributed to the original injury to produce the decedent's death, and that the authorities justify a recovery where the original injury is either the mediate or immediate proximate cause of the death.

The fact that the decedent recovered damages for his injuries would not, in itself, prevent a recovery by respondent Rachel Blackwell, for this view overlooks the fact that she is suing, not to recover damages for the injuries and consequent suffering and loss to the decedent, but to recover as an heir or personal representative the damages she has sustained by reason of the decedent's death. Section 377, Code Civ. Proc.; Earley v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 176 Cal. 79, 167 Pac. 513, L. R. A. 1918A. 997; Redfield v. Oakland Consolidated, etc., Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 277, 42 Pac. 822, 1063; Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50; Pierce v. United Gas, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 Pac. 700. The only question presented in this connection is whether it can be said there was no evidence in this case from which the jury might have concluded the accident was the proximate cause of decedent's death.

The evidence clearly shows, and it is not disputed, that the injuries received by the decedent in the collision were not of a fatal nature. Dr. Ellis Jones, who performed the operation, the shock of which resulted in decedent's death, stated: That at the time of that operation decedent had gained 30 or 40 pounds, and was apparently in good health. That as far as he knew there was no infection of the injured member; that the operation was performed to correct decedent's crippled condition. That decedent was not in any danger of losing his life from the injury to the leg, and that the cause of his death was the shock resulting from the second operation. That decedent "had had a severe injury whereby that caused shock; he had several attempts to reduce that subcutaneously—they all lowered his resistance; he had infection, and then he had another operation, in the operating room, on the day of his death. Then he had shock, operative shock. But all these factors, it seems to me, had to be considered as to his ability to resist that operation." That the first operation was entirely proper. That the second operation was performed to secure a union of the bone, and was decided on because otherwise decedent would have been condemned to wear a walking splint, and not secure a union of the bone, and that the leg could have been amputated. Respondent Rachel Blackwell testified that decedent had been at home for five months before the second operation; that he had gained 30 or 40 pounds in weight, and was able to be about on crutches; that Dr. Jensen attended decedent until he was taken to Los Angeles, where Dr. Jones took charge of the case and attended him until his death, save for a time that Dr. W. W. Richardson attended him while Dr. Jones was on his vacation. The judgment roll in the action brought by decedent against appellant and respondent United Stages was admitted in evidence. In the complaint in that action it was alleged the injuries received by decedent were permanent.

[2, 3] It cannot be said, from this evidence as a whole, that the jury could not have found the accident was the proximate cause of decedent's death. According to the evidence we have set out, decedent was under the care of physicians and was receiving medical attention from the time of the accident until his death. The evidence also indicates that the second operation was a step in the continuous treatment administered in an endeavor to cure him of the effect of his injuries. The jury might have found from the evidence that the operation was a proper one under the circumstances; in fact, there are no indications to the contrary. Dr. Jones and Dr. George Piness both testified concerning their training and experience, and there was no evidence tending to show that they were not in every way competent, or that decedent was negligent in employing them. In such a case the treatment by a physician cannot be held to be a new or intervening cause which would relieve appellant from liability for the original injury. In Boa v. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys., 182 Cal. 93, 187 Pac. 2, the following instruction was held to contain a correct statement of the law on this subject:

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of the defendant, that she used ordinary care in the selection of a physician and surgeon for the purpose of treating her said injuries, it will be no defense to show that the physician or surgeon thus selected by her was unskillful or failed to give her the best or proper treatment, providing she complied with the directions and submitted to the treatment prescribed by such physician and surgeon."

In Variety Manufacturing Co. v. Minnie Landaker, 227 Ill. 22, 81 N. E. 47, a decedent had suffered a broken leg. Several months later his physicians cut the leg open and fastened the ends of the bones together with wire. The operation was unsuccessful and the patient died. In sustaining a verdict allowing damages to decedent's widow, the court said:

"It is next contended that the court erred in giving to the jury the appellee's second instruction. That instruction announced to the jury that a person who is suffering from an injury is only required to use reasonable diligence to employ a physician of ordinary skill and experience to treat him, and that the law regards the injury resulting from the mistakes of the physician, or from the failure of the means employed to effect a cure, as a part of the immediate and direct damages flowing from the original injury. The doctrine announced in said instruction is fully sustained by Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Bluhm, 109 Ill. 20, and Chicago City Railway Co. v. Saxby, 213 Ill. 274."

In Odeneal v. State, 128 Tenn. 60, 157 S. W. 419, it was said:

"One who unlawfully inflicts a dangerous wound upon another is held for the consequences flowing from such injury, whether the sequence be direct or through the operation of intermediate agencies dependent upon and arising out of the original cause. One of these dependent occurrences is the necessity of surgical aid, which may eventuate as the immediate cause of death. * * * Surgeons are not infallible. They are required to have and exercise only reasonable skill, measured by the rules of their art or profession. When the accused inflicts the injury that necessitates the operation, he is held to assume the risk attendant on it. Much is required before the surgeons can be substituted for the defendant."

In view of these authorities it must be held that the implied finding of the jury that the accident was the proximate cause of decedent's death finds ample support in the evidence.

[4] Appellant emphasizes the fact that decedent in his action alleged his injuries were permanent and recovered damages on that basis. Such an allegation is immaterial in the case at bar. The measure of damages in the suit brought by him was based upon his duty to use reasonable efforts to restore his health and earning capacity, and in so far as such reasonable efforts might restore his health and earning capacity they diminished the amount of his recovery in his action against appellant. The verdict and judgment in that action established the fact that he was damaged to the extent fixed by the verdict, and this represents his decreased earning capacity, injuries, pain, and suffering. The jury in this case had the advantage of the verdict of the jury in decedent's action, fixing the amount of his damages, and in determining the loss sustained by respondent by reason of the death of decedent had the opportunity to consider the extent of his incapacity in so far as it was determined by the preceding jury. The question in this case was what pecuniary loss was suffered by respondent and her children by reason of the loss of decedent in his crippled condition.

[5] 2. Appellant's second point is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the implied finding that appellant's automobile was so negligently operated that it collided with the stage in which decedent was riding. However, there was testimony, the weight of which it is not our province to consider, from which the jury could have inferred appellant was guilty of negligence.

Appellant's car "seemed to be coming toward our side of the road, toward the right-hand side of the road—that is, their lights. * * * From the lights it looked like it was coming towards our car, which was being driven on the right-hand side of the road at the time. * * * I felt the automobile that I was riding in get off the pavement; that is, I felt a bump or two as the machine got off the pavement. * * * It [the stage] was going about 35 or 40 miles an hour at the time of the accident; that is as near as I can estimate it."

On cross-examination he stated:

"The film car seemed to be coming to our side of the road. * * * My memory is that on this occasion our car did pull off the road; that is, the right wheels on the hard dirt."

Herman Eilers, also a passenger in the stage, testified that the stage was being driven to the right of the center of the road; that the right wheels were off the right-hand side of the highway at the time of the accident; that the stage had been driving about 30 or 35 miles an hour; that he did not know whether or not it had been going 40 miles an hour. In view of this evidence it cannot be said the jury could not have found appellant's machine was operated on the left side of the highway, which fact constituted negligence per se. Stats. 1917, pp. 382, 401.

[7] 3. The next contention of appellant is that the evidence does not justify the implied finding that the stage was not being operated at an excessive rate of speed, and that such rate of speed was not the proximate cause of decedent's injuries. This point cannot be raised by appellant. If both defendants were negligent, and their negligence contributed to decedent's death, appellant cannot complain that respondent United Stages was exonerated by the jury, for they are both jointly and severally liable. Horgan v. Jones, 131 Cal. 521, 63 Pac. 835; Benson v. Southern Pacific Co., 177 Cal. 777, 171 Pac. 948.

[8] It is also asserted that the implied finding of the jury that decedent exercised ordinary care for his own protection was not warranted, in that there was no evidence that he had protested to the driver concerning the manner in which he operated the machine or that he had offered to leave it. It was said in Carpenter v. Atchison, Topeka & S. F. Ry. Co. (Cal. App.) 195 Pac. 1073:

"In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that he did everything that a reasonably prudent man would have done under the same circumstances for the protection of his own safety. Code Civ. Proc. § 1961; Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. Min. Co., 168 Cal. 500; Baltimore and Potomac R. Co. v. Landrigan, 191 U. S. 461."

Here there was no evidence as to the conduct of decedent, and nothing tending to show that, even if his position was unsafe, he did not so consider it, and accordingly take steps for his own protection. In view of this fact, together with the presumption arising, such a finding would be proper.

[9, 10] 4. Appellant specifies as error the denial of the court of its motion to strike out an answer, given by respondent Rachel Blackwell while testifying in her own behalf, that there was no union of the bone in decedent's leg, on the ground the answer was a conclusion of the witness. Assuming the ruling to have been erroneous, appellant could not have been prejudiced by it, for it is clear from the evidence that such was the fact. Appellant also specifies as error the overruling of its objection interposed to testimony by respondent Rachel Blackwell that Dr. Jones told decedent to go to the hospital and have the last operation. This ruling was correct. Decedent had placed himself under the care of a physician, and it was proper to show that in receiving treatment he was following instructions given by the physician. In proving this fact, it was competent to admit testimony that certain orders were given. The testimony was not admitted to prove the existence of any fact related by the doctor, but to prove that he made the statement in question. The admission of the testimony under such circumstances is similar to proof that a notice was given, and is not obnoxious to the hearsay rule. See 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1770, and cases there cited.

[11] 5. An asserted implied finding of the jury to the effect that decedent at the time of the accident was able to earn and was earning $300 a month is claimed to be erroneous. But we are of the opinion that no such finding may be implied from the verdict. It was alleged in the complaint that decedent's earning capacity was $300 a month, and this allegation was denied by the answer. No evidence was introduced on this issue. The complaint in the judgment roll in Blackwell v. American Film Company, supra, contained an allegation to the effect that his earning capacity was the amount stated. This could not be regarded as evidence of the fact, for the effect of that judgment roll was expressly limited by an instruction to a consideration of any damages allowed in that action for decedent's loss of time from his business and impairment of his earning capacity. It is well settled that all facts necessary to support the judgment and supported by the evidence will be presumed to have been found to exist. There being no evidence on this point, a finding in favor of the allegation of the complaint would be unwarranted, and would tend to defeat the judgment. The jury cannot be held to have made any such finding. In assessing respondent's damages they were not limited to evidence of decedent's earning capacity, for, as was said in Skelton v. Pacific Lumber Co., 140 Cal. 507, 74 Pac. 13:

"The proof of the value of the deceased as a wage earner might not alone justify the amount awarded; but there were other elements of damage to be considered by the jury, which they alone were competent to consider."

[12] 6. Fourteen asserted errors are specified with reference to the instructions given to the jury and those refused. The first was one proposed by respondent Rachel Blackwell to the effect that there was no question of contributory negligence under the evidence. Inasmuch as there was no such evidence, as already pointed out, it was proper for the court to withdraw this issue from the jury's consideration.

[13] It is insisted an instruction to the effect that, if decedent used ordinary care in the selection of a physician, and submitted to the treatment prescribed by him, it would be no defense to show that such physician failed to give him the best or proper treatment, conflicted with one to the effect that an error of treatment would not relieve the defendant, but, if the physician made use of the opportunity to perform an unnecessary and dangerous experiment on decedent, and the experiment alone resulted fatally to decedent, defendant would not be liable. These instructions are not in conflict. The former properly told the jury that mere concurring negligence on the part of the physician would not be a bar to respondent's recovery. The latter told the jury that, if the physician stepped out of the proper field of treatment to perform an unnecessary and dangerous operation, as an experiment for his own benefit, it would constitute an independent, intervening act of the physician for which appellant would not be liable.

[14] The jury were instructed that "for a person of 46 years of age the probable expectancy of life is 23.81 years, under the mortality tables." This is a correct instruction for a person of that age, but it is pointed out that the evidence showed decedent was only 36 years old, and the instruction therefore inapplicable. However that may be, appellant could not have been prejudiced, for even upon this theory the instruction was wholly favorable to it.

[15] In another instruction the jury were informed that the only element in the case decedent brought against appellant and respondent the United Stages which could be connected with the case at bar "is damages, if any, that were allowed by the jury in the original case for value of his loss of time from his business up to the time of the original trial, which was in May, 1919, together with any probable future loss therefor, and the impairment of his ability to earn money in the future, and should the jury believe that the plaintiffs in this case have been fully paid upon that issue, yet it leaves the element of damages for pecuniary value for loss of comfort, society, protection, nurture, and education that the deceased would probably have given respectively to the widow and infant children had he lived." It is appellant's contention that decedent was fully compensated in the former action for his inability thereafter to give comfort, society, protection, nurture, and education to respondent and their children, and that, in omitting to instruct the jury to that effect, the court erred. This position cannot be maintained, for these losses are personal to respondent and her children, and they alone may claim damages for them. In view of the fact that the judgment recovered by him was a proximate result of the same accident which resulted in his death, it was proper for the jury to have before them the verdict in decedent's case and to be informed as to the nature and effect of the former judgment. This instruction did not purport to deal fully with the question of damages, but merely to inform the jury that, even if the plaintiff in that case had been fully compensated for his loss of earning power, nevertheless the pecuniary value of his society, comfort, protection, nurture, and education could be recovered by the respondent, and the value of such benefits was left to the jury to determine.

[16] The instruction is also claimed to be erroneous in stating that decedent would probably have given comfort, society, protection, nurture, and education to respondent Rachel Blackwell and her children. Whether or not he would have done so, it is asserted, was a question for the jury. But in another instruction the jury were told that it was left to their judgment to say, "from a consideration of all the facts and evidence of the case, what amount is a just compensation for the financial loss which will probably be directly and proximately caused to the plaintiff by the death of said Edward W. Blackwell, deceased. This pecuniary loss may be * * * a loss arising from a deprivation of benefits which, from all the circumstances of the case, it could be reasonably expected the plaintiff would have received from the deceased Edward W. Blackwell, had his life not been taken. * * * The damages, if any, which plaintiff may recover, are to be based by you solely on the reasonable expectation of pecuniary advantage to the plaintiffs from the continuance of the life of the deceased Edward W. Blackwell." This instruction in effect informed the jury that they should consider what comfort, society, protection, nurture, and education the decedent would probably have given respondent and their children had he lived. In view of this instruction, it is not likely that the jury understood the one under review to mean other than that respondent Rachel Blackwell was entitled to compensation for the loss of such comfort, society, protection, nurture, and education as the decedent would probably have given, and the evidence would justify the inference that he would probably have given them in so far as he was able.

[17] Appellant asserts the court erred in giving an instruction that the money recovered by decedent did not go directly to his widow and children upon his death, but was an asset of the estate, which had to go through administration and to pay the debts of the estate, the balance going to the widow and children. This is a correct statement of the law. Appellant maintained that the recovery in the action brought by decedent might be shown in mitigation of respondent Rachel Blackwell's damages in the case at bar, and with that evidence before the court it was proper to explain what benefit was derived by the widow and children therefrom.

[18, 19] The court refused to give two instructions requested by appellant, both to the effect that, if the jury found for the plaintiff, in estimating the amount of damages she was entitled to recover they could consider the physical condition of decedent immediately prior to his last operation in determining the probable amount of financial assistance he would have rendered to his widow and children. It is a sufficient answer to this specification of error that a third instruction of substantially similar import was given to the jury at appellant's request. Respondent disputes the soundness of these three instructions. But, as already pointed out, decedent was fully compensated for the injuries sustained by him, and for his resulting physical incapacity, and, in estimating the pecuniary loss resulting to respondent Rachel Blackwell by virtue of his death, it was necessary to take into consideration his crippled condition. The other instructions given by the court which appellant complains of were either correct in themselves or supplemented by others, or the errors were so unimportant that the jury could not have been misled thereby. The instructions which the court declined to give at appellant's request were properly refused, some being erroneous and the rest being substantially contained in those which were given. The errors assigned in this connection do not merit further consideration.

[20] 7. Appellant's last point is that the verdict of $10,000 is so excessive as to justify a reversal, and that the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial on that ground. But, as was declared in Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513:

"It is by this court said to be the correct rule, 'that it is only where the verdict is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts, as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong presumption that it is based on prejudice or passion rather than sober judgment, that the judge is at liberty to interpose his judgment as against that of the jury.' Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 74 Pac. 1019."

Considering all the circumstances of the case, we cannot hold that the sum of $10,000 is disproportionate to the loss sustained by decedent's widow and two minor children, or that the verdict was the result of passion or prejudice.

Judgment affirmed.

GRINBAUM v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.
(S. F. 10421.)

1. Judges ⊜51(4)—Judge may pass on his bias or prejudice.

A judge may pass on the question of his bias and prejudice raised by affidavit under Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 4, for change of judge for trial.

2. Judges ⊜51(4)—Late-filed counter affidavit as to bias and prejudice considered.

On the hearing of affidavits of bias and prejudice of judge, counter affidavits, though not filed in the time fixed by Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 4, may be considered, the statute in that regard being directory merely.

3. Prohibition ⊜17—Objections to trial court proceeding to be presented to it before seeking prohibition.

Objections to trial court proceeding must be presented to it before writ of prohibition against its proceeding may be sought.

4. Prohibition ⊜3(1)—Refused because claimed res judicata was available on return to order to show cause.

Prohibition, sought on the ground of allowance of fees being res judicata, will not lie to prevent the trial court proceeding on an order to show cause why the allowance should not be revoked; the question whether allowance was res judicata being a matter which can be determined on the return to the order to show cause.

In Bank.

Petition by Julie Grinbaum for writ of prohibition to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, to prevent Frank H. Dunne, as Judge thereof, from passing on the question of his disqualification. Writ denied.

John Francis Neylan, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Maurice E. Harrison, Alfred Sutro, and Warren Olney, Jr., all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] The application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the respondent from passing upon the question of his disqualification raised by affidavits filed in pursuance of subdivision 4, § 170, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and to prevent the court from considering counter affidavits upon that question, filed after the expiration of the time fixed by the statute, but before the beginning of the trial, is denied.

The court below has jurisdiction to pass upon the question of bias and prejudice. The counter affidavits may be considered, notwithstanding they were filed after the period fixed by statute. The statute in that regard is directory. See Estate of Sutro, 143 Cal. 487, 491, 77 Pac. 402.

[3, 4] Prohibition is also prayed for to prevent the judge from proceeding on an order to show cause why the allowance of certain fees specified in the order should not be revoked. It seems to be conceded that the court had power of its own motion to institute an inquiry concerning the expenditures made on behalf of the ward, but it is claimed that these fees were fixed, settled, and allowed at the time of the settlement of accounts and therefore that the orders are conclusive and must not be inquired into.

The respondent argues that although these items were included in orders settling accounts that they were intermediate and not final accounts and therefore can be inquired into. It is not necessary for us to determine this question, for it is the duty of the parties to present these objections in the first instance to the trial court before seeking a writ of prohibition in this court and this was not done (Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 402, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192), and for the further reason that the question whether or not the allowance of the fees specified in the order is res adjudicata is a matter which can be determined on the return to the order to show cause.

The writ is denied.

JACOBS v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(S. F. 10252.)

1. Physicians and surgeons ⟸11(1)—Under Dental Act, board may revoke license for unprofessional conduct.

Notwithstanding that Dental Act, § 14, provides specific proceedings for revocation of license for reasons assigned in the first two subdivisions of section 13, it must be held to also provide procedure by which the board of dental examiners may hear and determine accusations made under subdivision 3 providing for revocation of license for unprofessional conduct or gross ignorance or inefficiency.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⟸11(3)—Dental board may act on accusation filed by its agent.

Where the dental board acted on the information of one of its paid investigators and revoked a license for unprofessional conduct, the petitioner in action to annul the judgment of the board cannot urge that the board had no jurisdiction because the proceeding was not "taken upon the information of another," as provided by Dental Act, § 14.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⟸6(2)—Acts performed by unlicensed dentist not within permission of Dental Act; "operate"; "operation"; "practicing dentistry."

Dental Act, § 11, provides that any person is understood to be practicing dentistry who shall for remuneration perform an operation of any kind, or treat diseases of the human teeth, etc., and in view of "operate," meaning "to perform or to be at work," and "operation," meaning action, working, etc., it does not require the performance of a surgical operation to bring one within the act, and where an unlicensed dentist made a plaster cast of a patient's mouth to measure it for a plat, took a "wax bite," and put a wax plate set with teeth in a patient's mouth for a "try-in," he was practicing dentistry within the meaning of the act, and his work did not fall within a class of work permissible by an unlicensed person.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Operate; Operation; Practicing Dentistry.]

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action to annul judgment revoking license to practice dentistry by Saul R. Jacobs against the Board of Dental Examiners of California and others. From judgment for defendants, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Alfred S. Humphreys, of San Francisco, and Leon E. Gray and Markell C. Baer, both of Oakland, for appellant.

Oliver Dibble, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. A verified written accusation was filed with the state board of dental examiners, charging petitioner with unprofessional conduct. After a formal hearing the board found petitioner guilty of aiding and abetting an unlicensed person to practice dentistry unlawfully, and suspended his license for five years. Petitioner sought to test the legality of his trial and conviction upon a writ of review issued in the superior court. After a hearing on said writ, the judgment of the board was affirmed and the writ was dismissed. Petitioner now appeals from the judgment of the superior court. The salient facts are gathered from the return to the writ made in the court below.

Complaint being made to the board of dental examiners that one Finley, and others, were unlawfully practicing dentistry in the city of Oakland, A. Boyiarides, an investigator employed by the board and acting under the direction of its attorney, was sent to investigate the matter, and if possible, to secure evidence of such unlawful practice. Boyiarides went to a dental office in the city of Oakland and found Dr. Jacobs, the petitioner, in charge. He submitted himself to the petitioner for the purpose of having a plate made. Dr. Jacobs made an examination of his mouth and told him that it would cost $25 or $30 for the plate. The price of $15 was finally agreed upon, and Boyiarides paid Dr. Jacobs $5. Thereafter Boyiarides visited the dental office several times. On the first visit Finley made a plaster paris mold or cast of Boyiardies' mouth for the purpose of getting the measure for the plate. On the next day Finley took a "wax bite" of the mouth of Boyiarides by placing a piece of wax in his mouth and telling him to bite into it. On the third visit Finley put a wax plate set with teeth in Boyiarides' mouth for a "try-in," causing the patient to bite into the wax mold for a "try in." On the fourth visit the finished plate was delivered by Finley to Boyiarides, who paid Finley $10, taking his receipt for the money. On one of his visits to the office Boyiarides observed Finley taking a plaster cast of the mouth of another patient. On another occasion he saw Finley "working in another man's mouth." It was established by the testimony of a witness connected with the dental office that Finley was employed there for the purpose of taking impressions of plates.

[1] The petitioner on this appeal attacks the action of the board of dental examiners upon the ground that its action was without due process of law and in excess of its jurisdiction. The contention, in brief, is that the Dental Act (Stats. 1915, 698, 106) does not confer power upon the board to revoke or suspend the license of a dentist for unprofessional conduct. He bases his contention upon the fact that section 14 of the act provides that proceedings to revoke or suspend any license, under the first subdivision of section 13, for the conviction of a felony or misdemeanor, must be taken by the board on the receipt of a certified copy of the record of conviction, and that the proceeding under the second subdivision of section 13, based upon the unskillful or negligent dental practice, may be taken upon the information of another; the statute being silent as to how the board may proceed on a proceeding to revoke or suspend a license of a dentist for unprofessional conduct, as provided in the third subdivision of section 13. Petitioner therefore contends that there is no provision by which the board may proceed to the trial of one charged with unprofessional conduct. There is nothing in this point. To apply such a construction to the statute would leave the board powerless to proceed in those cases which, no doubt, call for the largest intervention of its powers. Having conferred the power upon the board to revoke or suspend licenses for the three general causes specified, and having directed how the proceedings may be had under two of the provisions for revocation, it is not to be thought that the Legislature intended to leave the board helpless to proceed against dentists accused of unprofessional conduct. The provisions of section 14, relating to proceedings to revoke and suspend licenses, providing as to the first cause that such proceedings must be taken by the board on the receipt of a certified copy of the record of conviction, and that proceedings for the second cause may be taken upon the information of another, are followed by the general provision that—

> "All accusations must be in writing, verified by some party familiar with the facts therein charged, and three copies thereof must be filed with the secretary of the board."

The remainder of the section relates to the procedure to be followed by the board upon receiving such accusation. There can be no doubt that section 13 of the act confers full jurisdiction upon the board to revoke or suspend the license of a dentist for any of the causes specified in the section. Neither can there be any doubt that section 14 was intended to, and does, provide for a complete procedure by which the board may hear and determine an accusation made under any one of the three subdivisions of the preceding section.

[2] Another contention advanced by the appellant is that, conceding that the board of dental examiners had power to hear a complaint to revoke a license for unprofessional conduct, in the instant case the accusation filed against him is not one which the board has jurisdiction to hear, for the reason that the proceeding was not "taken upon the information of another." His argument in support of the point is that as Boyiarides was a paid investigator employed by the board, and acting under the direction of its attorney for the purpose of securing evidence upon which to base a charge against him, the accusation was in fact one made by the agent of the board, or, in other words, is but an accusation by the board itself, and results in the board sitting in judgment upon its own complaint. Even if the contention were worthy of serious consideration, the provision of section 14, relied upon, is permissive in the first instance and, in the next, relates only to proceedings upon an accusation, charging the dentist with grossly unskillful or negligent practice.

[3] Appellant also contends that there was no showing that he aided and abetted an unlicensed person to practice dentistry. The petitioner was the manager of the office where Finley was employed, made the first examination of Boyiarides' mouth, and entered into the contract for the work to be done. That work was done by Finley. The only reasonable inference to be drawn from this is that the petitioner assigned Finley to do the work. It appears without contradiction that Finley was not licensed to practice dentistry. Section 11 of the Dental Act provides that any person shall be understood to be practicing dentistry within the meaning of the act who shall "* * * (2) for a fee, salary or reward, paid directly or indirectly either to himself or to some other person, perform an operation of any kind upon, or treat diseases or lesions of the human teeth or jaws, or correct malimposed positions thereof."

It does not require the performance of a surgical operation to bring one within the purview of the law. The words "operate" and "operation," technically used in connection with surgery, mean "to perform some manual act upon the body of the patient, usually with instruments, with a view to restore soundness or health, or otherwise improve the physical condition," and "the act or series of acts and manipulations performed upon a patient's body, as in setting a bone, amputating a limb, extracting a tooth, etc." Century Dictionary. They have also a plain ordinary meaning, in the light of which this act may and, we think, should be construed. According to the authority just quoted, "operate" means "to perform or to be at work"; "to produce an effect; act; work." And "operation" means "action," "working," "a specific act or activity," and "the course of action or series of acts by which some result is accomplished." The same dictionary defines "an operator" as "one who operates in any way, or on or against anything."

The ultimate purpose of the Dental Act is to bring about and insure skill and proficiency in the practice of the profession in this state. When all of it provisions are read together, and construed in the light of the plain ordinary meaning of the words and terms just noted, little difficulty is experienced in arriving at an understanding of what the Legislature intended by the enactment of section 11 of the act, defining what shall constitute "practicing dentistry."

The particular purpose to be accomplished by that portion of the section germane to this appeal is manifestly to prevent the doing of those things about or upon the human teeth, or jaws, which require skill, adequate training and understanding in their performance. The section provides that one who performs an operation of any kind upon those portions of the human anatomy shall be understood to be practicing dentistry, but that nothing within the act shall prohibit "an unlicensed person from performing merely mechanical work upon inert matter in a dental laboratory." The Legislature has very plainly indicated what work may be done by an unlicensed person in connection with the lawful practice of dentistry in this state. The acts done by the appellant in the present case do not fall within the permission of the statute.

WHITEHEAD v. DAVIE et al. (S. F. 10198.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸200—Charter providing retirement and pension for members of fire department retroactive as to period of service.

Oakland Charter, art. 15, § 102 (St. 1919, p. 1369), providing for retirement on pension of members of fire department after service aggregating 25 years, or 20 years if 55 years old, is retroactive, so that the required service period dates from the beginning of the service.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸200—Period member of fire department acted as chief considered as part of aggregate service, as affecting retirement and pension.

Where a member of the fire department city of Oakland was reappointed battalion chief after serving as chief of the department the period of service as chief, his appointment not being subject to civil service rules, should be taken into consideration in determining the period of his aggregate service, under Oakland Charter, art. 15, § 102 (St. 1919, p. 1369), as affecting his right to retirement and pension.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸142—Charter forbidding person holding two offices at same time does not affect eligibility of chief of fire department to appointment as battalion chief.

Oakland Charter, § 38, providing that no person holding any office, position or employment under the city government shall be eligible to hold any other elective or appointive office under the city government, does not affect the eligibility of the chief of the fire department to position as battalion chief.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸196—Chief of fire department may be appointed without reference to civil service rules and classifications.

Under Oakland Charter, art. 13, § 73, providing that the board of trustees of fireman's relief and pension fund shall make rules for examinations for appointments and promotions, and section 80 thereof, providing that provisions of article 13 shall apply to all affairs and employees of the city except as enumerated in section 30, which enumerates chief of fire department, such chief may be appointed without reference to the civil service rules and classifications.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸200—Fireman pension computed on basis of salary one year before retirement.

Under Oakland Charter, § 102 (St. 1919, p. 1369), the pension of a retired member of the fire department is computed on the basis of his salary one year before date of retirement.

In Bank.

Petition for writ of mandate by Elliott Whitehead against John L. Davie and others, as the Board of Trustees of the Fireman's Relief and Pension Fund of the city of Oakland, to enforce his application for retirement from the fire department and a pension. Writ granted.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondents.

WILBUR, Acting C. J. The petitioner, having served 25 years in the fire department of the city of Oakland, from and after May 12, 1896, applied on October 17, 1921, to the respondents for an order retiring him upon half the pay of the chief of the fire department, a position he held one year before the application for retirement. The respondents having refused the application, petitioner seeks a writ of mandate to compel the making of such order. The petitioner began his connection with such department as an extra man. On July 1, 1915, he was appointed chief of the fire department, and served until July 1, 1921, when he was appointed battalion chief, the position which he occupied at the time of his advancement to the position of chief of the fire department. He continued to serve as battalion chief, and while such chief made his application for retirement and pension. It is contended that the provisions of article 15, § 102, of the Oakland charter (Stats. 1919, p. 1364) are not retroactive, and therefore petitioner, not having served 25 years from and after the date of the adoption of the amendment to the charter, is not entitled to retirement under this section.

It is not disputed that the Legislature had power to make provision for retirement based in part upon service rendered before the adoption of the statute or charter, and it is clear that this must be true where service is rendered after the adoption of the provision for retirement, for such pension plan operates as an increase of compensation for services performed after the time of the enactment of the law authorizing pensions. In other words, if a man who has served 20 years is informed by statute that, if he serves 5 years more, he will receive a pension, in effect he is induced to perform such service by the fact that his compensation for 5 years' service is increased to that extent. Hammitt v. Gaynor (Sup.) 144 N. Y. Supp. 123; People v. Abbott, 274 Ill. 380, 113 N. E. 696, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 450; State v. Love, 89 Neb. 149, 131 N. W. 196, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 607, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 542. Whether such pension could be granted to one who had already completed the term of service, and who was thus entitled to immediate retirement without the performance of additional services, is a question not involved in this case, for the petitioner had not completed his 25 years' service at the time of the adoption of the amendment to the charter in 1919.

Soon after the petitioner became a member of the Oakland fire department a law was passed providing for a pension scheme for members of such department. Stats. 1901, pp. 101, 102. This statute reads:

"Sec. 3. Whenever any person at the taking effect of this act, or thereafter, shall have been duly appointed or selected and sworn, and shall have served for twenty years or more, in the aggregate, as a member in any capacity or any rank whatever of the regularly constituted fire department of any such county, city and county, city or town, * * * said board may, if it see fit, order and direct that such person be retired from further service in such fire department, and from the date of the making of such order the service of such person in such fire department shall cease, and such person so retired shall thereafter during his lifetime be paid from such fund a yearly pension. * * *" (Italics ours.)

Thus, by the terms of section 3, 20 years' service eitner before or after, or in part before and after the passage of the law, authorized the board to retire a member of the department if it saw fit so to do. In 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 412) a new law was enacted to take the place of the statute of 1901, authorizing the board to retire any person after such person became 60 years of age who at the time of the taking effect of the act or thereafter shall have served 20 years as a member of the department. It was provided in the Law of 1905 that relief and pension funds on hand should be paid into and constitute a part of the fund to be paid out under the Law of 1905.

The Oakland charter of 1911 provided for the continuance of the existing municipality (article 1, § 1), and for the assumption by it of "all the duties and obligations now pertaining to or incumbent on said city as a corporation, not inconsistent with the provisions of this charter" (article 1, § 2). It also provides for the retention in the fire department of all members appointed prior to September 1, 1910, in good standing at the time the charter goes into effect (article 15, § 97), and that new appointees shall not be less than 21 nor more than 35 years of age

(section 98). It is also provided that all lawful regulations in force at the time the charter takes effect, and not inconsistent with the provisions thereof, are continued in force. Article 24, § 198. It also provided (article 15, § 102, Stats. 1911, p. 1613) that the trustees of the pension fund might relieve any aged, infirm, or disabled member of the department who had arrived at the age of 55 years after an examination showing that they are unfit for the performance of duty, and further provides:

"Said board of trustees shall at the request of any member of the department who has arrived at the age of fifty-five years, retire and relieve such member making such application. * * * No such pension shall be paid unless such person has been an active member of the department for twenty years in the aggregate preceding his retirement, and the same shall cease at his death."

In 1919 the charter was amended in this respect, so that it now provides that the trustees shall, upon the request of any member of the fire department who has served 25 years in the aggregate, retire and relieve said member making such application. Stats. 1919, pp. 1369, 1370. The new provision authorizes retirement after 25 years of service, even if the member of the department has not attained the age of 55 years, but if he has attained such age he is then entitled to retirement after only 20 years of service in the department.

[1] In view of the fact that the charter provisions under consideration are but modifications of existing laws entitling the members of the fire department of Oakland to retirement after 20 or 25 years of service, as the case may be, it is clear that the charter provision as to service was intended to be retroactive. To hold otherwise would be to deprive the members of the department of compensation by way of pension given to them by the law under which they performed services. Such a construction should not be adopted unless the intent to commit such injustice is clear. It is true that the charter of 1911 did not permit retirement until the age of 55 was attained after 20 years of service, and that the amendment of 1919 permits retirement after 5 more years' service even if the age of 55 is not yet attained, and that the petitioner, who has not yet attained the age of 55, is thus entitled to a benefit not accorded to him under the charter of 1911, but this change does not justify the conclusion that in this specific case the period of service is to date from the adoption of the amendment and all others from the beginning of their actual service. The period of 25 years, therefore, dates from the beginning of service.

[2] It is claimed, however, that the reappointment of the petitioner to the position of battalion chief was not justified under the civil service rules, and that therefore the period he has occupied this position should not be taken into consideration in determining whether or not the petitioner has served 25 years in the fire department. Under the charter the position of chief of the fire department is not under the classified service, and the appointment may be made without reference to civil service rules. The practice under the rules adopted by the civil service commission has been to grant a leave of absence to a member of the fire department whom it was desired to appoint as chief of the department, and to continue such leave of absence from time to time by extension thereof, so that the chief should be deemed to hold his position of battalion chief so far as the civil service rules are concerned.

It is contended that the effect of this arrangement is to permit the chief of the fire department to hold two offices at the same time, that of chief of the fire department and that of battalion chief. This suggestion entirely overlooks the purpose of the so-called leave of absence, and the civil service rules with relation thereto. These rules mean nothing more or less than that, during the period while the battalion chief is acting as chief of the fire department, and thus continues as a member of the department, his position of battalion chief shall be deemed to be temporarily filled by his successor, and he retains the right to permanently occupy that place whenever his incumbency as chief of the fire department is terminated. The chief of the fire department did not hold two positions or draw two salaries or perform the duties of the two offices because of such leave of absence. The civil service rule in question is merely for the purpose of establishing that the chief of the fire department is continuously eligible to reappointment as permanent battalion chief, and also that his successor is appointed to fill a vacancy in that permanent employment existing by reason of the temporary transfer of the battalion chief to the higher office of chief of the fire department. So far as the charter provision concerning the retirement of officers of the fire department is concerned (article 15, § 102), the service of the petitioner was continuous in the fire department; his reinstatement in or reappointment to the position of battalion chief is authorized by civil service rules which permit the chief of the fire department to retain his civil service standing during his employment in a nonclassified position in the department.

[3] It is claimed that the provisions of section 38 of the charter make the chief of the fire department ineligible to appointment as a battalion chief. This provision reads as follows:

"No person holding any office, position or employment under the city government shall be eligible to or hold any other elective or appointive office under the government of the city of Oakland. * * *"

This section merely prohibits an officer from holding two offices at the same time. When he relinquishes one office he is eligible to any other office.

[4] It is claimed that the rules of the civil service board permitting the granting of leave of absence to a member of the fire department to accept the position of chief of the fire department is in excess of the jurisdiction and power of the civil service commission. This position cannot be maintained. Section 73 of article 13 of the charter provides as follows:

"The board shall make rules to carry out the purposes of this article, and for examinations, appointments and promotions. All rules and all changes therein shall be forthwith printed by the board for distribution." (Italics ours.)

Section 80 of the same article provides that the provisions of the article shall apply to all appointed officers and employees of the city in or under any of the departments enumerated in section 72 of this charter, except the following:

"The chief officials of the city enumerated in section thirty (30) of this charter. * * *"

Section 30 of the charter enumerates, among others, "a chief of the fire department."

It is clear, under these provisions of the charter, that the chief of the fire department may be appointed without reference to civil service rules and classification, and this is, no doubt, the purpose of the exception in section 80 above quoted. It is also true that the advance of any member of the fire department to the position of chief of the department is a promotion of such member of the fire department, and therefore, as such member is under the classified list, the civil service board have power to consider the effect of such promotion upon his standing as a member of the fire department, for to do so is to regulate the subject of promotion in the classified list of the fire department. In pursuance of these provisions of the charter the civil service commissioners have, in effect, provided by rule that the promotion of a member of the department to the position of chief of the department shall not be deemed to vacate permanently the office held by him under the classified civil service, but that, so far as that office is concerned, the period of such incumbency shall be deemed a mere temporary absence from the civil service position.

It follows that the transfer of the petitioner from the civil service position to that of chief of the fire department did not break the continuity of his service in the fire department, and did not operate to prevent his returning to his civil service position upon the termination of his incumbency as chief of the department.

[5] We are next required to consider the effect of the last sentence in section 102 of the charter as amended in 1919, found on page 1370 of the Statutes of 1919:

"Such retired member shall receive from the Firemen's Relief and Pension Fund a pension equal to one-half of the salary attached to the rank held by him one year prior to the date of said retirement, which pension shall be paid in equal monthly installments and shall cease at the death of such member."

The question is whether he is to be paid one-half of the salary of chief of the fire department, that being the rank held by him October 17, 1920, a date one year previous to his application for retirement, or whether he should be paid only upon the basis of a rank held continuously for one year previous to his retirement. On the whole it is clear that a day one year before the application for retirement is fixed by the charter as the basis of rank for retirement in order to prevent a retirement soon after a promotion.

The decision of the District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, in Rumetsch v. Davie, 190 Pac. 1075, holds that the pensioner is to be retired with the rank held one year before the date of retirement, and with one-half the pay attached to that rank at the time of retirement. That question is not involved here, for the pay of chief of the fire department was the same October 17, 1920, and October 17, 1921. That decision accords with our view that the rank held October 17, 1920, fixes the rank of petitioner for the purpose of retirement, although certain statements in the opinion would indicate that the rank must be held for the year immediately preceding the retirement; but this question was not involved in that case.

Let the writ issue as prayed.

BISHOP v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 3913.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 5, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 30, 1922.)

1. New trial ⟸163(2)—General order granting new trial opens case as to all parties.

Where an order granting a new trial is general in its terms, the effect is to open the case as to all the parties, though some of them have not moved for a new trial.

2. Judgment ⟸395—Order setting aside judgment against one defendant does not affect another defendant where interests are distinct.

An order setting aside a judgment against one defendant would not affect the judgment against a codefendant where the rights and interests of the defendants are distinct, as where a judgment is rendered against two or more defendants as joint tort-feasors; and the rule is not modified by Code Civ. Proc. § 579, providing that judgment may be entered against one party and action proceed as to the others.

3. New trial ⟸163(2) — As exoneration of agent exonerates principal where fraud committed without knowledge or consent of principal, grant of motion as to one opens case as to other.

Where an agent commits a fraud without the knowledge and consent of the principal, and in an action against both of them for the fraud the judgment against the agent is set aside and new trial granted, the judgment against the principal must be set aside, since the only wrong found to have been done by the principal was through the agent.

4. Execution ⟸12—Will not issue after motion for new trial has been granted.

An execution cannot issue upon a judgment after a motion for a new trial has been granted, as the order granting the motion for a new trial vacates the findings and judgment.

Petition for mandamus by James M. Bishop against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Albert Lee Stephens, Judge, and another. Writ denied.

Stuart M. Salisbury, S. A. McNeil, and Wm. B. Himrod, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. This proceeding is one in mandate to compel the superior court of Los Angeles county and L. E. Lampton, the clerk thereof, to issue an execution against the defendant David Evans and his property on a judgment obtained by petitioner against Evans and one Grant McCartney in an action in the above-named superior court. Thereafter McCartney moved for a new trial, which motion the court granted. Evans did not join in this motion, and made none on his own behalf, but subsequently, and more than 10 days after notice of the entry of the judgment, moved the court to vacate and set aside the judgment as against him. This motion the court also granted. Thereafter the petitioner applied to the defendants herein for the issuance of a writ of execution against the property of Evans, which Lampton, as clerk, and the court both refused.

The nature of the original action was one for damages for breach of contract. The court in rendering judgment found that McCartney had acted as the representative of Evans in the sale to the petitioner of certain lands, and that McCartney, as such agent, with intent to deceive and defraud the petitioner, had made certain false representations to him concerning the desire of tenants to remain, and that these representations were an inducing cause which influenced the petitioner, Bishop, to enter into a contract for the purchase of the property. The findings contain no statement to the effect that Evans made any of these false representations himself or otherwise authorized McCartney to make them than by employing McCartney to make a sale.

The single issue presented is: Did the order granting a new trial made upon motion of McCartney which directed that the judgment be vacated and set aside have the effect of vacating it as to Evans? The order was worded:

"It is ordered that motion for a new trial be granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings and judgment."

It was general in its terms.

[1, 2] The rule is that, where an order granting a new trial is general, the effect is to open up the case as to all the parties, even though some of them have not moved for a new trial. 1 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 167; Kent v. Williams, 146 Cal. 3, 79 Pac. 527; Murphy v. Bridge, 43 Cal. App. 87, 184 Pac. 497. The effect of such an order is measured by the character of the motion upon which it is predicated. Mercantile Trust Co. v. Superior Court, 178 Cal. 512, 174 Pac. 51. However, in the instant case the motion, like the order, was in general terms. It is true that there are many cases in which it has been held that the granting of a motion for a new trial made by one defendant does not operate to set aside a judgment against a codefendant. They come within the exception to the rule. That exception is that, where the rights and interests of the defendants are distinct, an order setting aside a judgment against one will not affect the judgment against a codefendant. The cases cited by petitioner are of this nature. Where the judgment rendered is against two or more defendants as joint tort-feasors, the case clearly comes within the exception. Preluzky v. Rittigstein (Cal. App.) 196 Pac. 917, Fearon v. Foddera, 169 Cal. 370, 148 Pac. 200, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 312, and others cited by petitioner are of this character. Lake v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 116, 200 Pac. 1041, and Mercantile Trust Co. v. Superior Court, 178 Cal. 512, 174 Pac. 51, although not cases sounding in tort, were instances of defendants having severable interests in which a judgment against one did not involve a similar conclusion against another. The common-law rule, as before stated, is fully recognized in this state, and section 579, Code of Civil Procedure, does not modify it where the rights and liabilities of the codefendants are interdependent or those of one entirely dependent on the other.

[3] In the instant case the trial court found that Evans owned a house which he employed McCartney to sell; that McCartney misrepresented certain material facts to Bishop; that by reason of the false representations made by McCartney, and solely because of them, Bishop refused to consummate the purchase of the property; and that said false representations were made without the knowledge, consent, or acquiescence of the defendant Evans. Beside rendering judgment against McCartney, the trial court gave judgment that Evans should recover from McCartney any sum which Evans might be required to pay Bishop on the judgment rendered. It is too plain to require extended discussion that the liability of the principal in this case is entirely dependent upon that of the agent. If it be held that such findings and judgment were not supported by the evidence, surely there can be no basis for liability upon the part of the principal. An exoneration of the agent must exonerate the principal, since the only wrong found to have been done by the principal was through the agent.

However, petitioner insists that the cases cited by respondent have no application except where the issue is presented on appeal after a motion for a new trial. It is pointed out that in the case at bar Evans made no attempt to set aside the judgment until long after the period allowed for a motion for a new trial had expired.

[4] The motion which he made does not affect his rights. If the original order granting a new trial in general terms operated to vacate the judgment against Evans, it was unnecessary for him to make any motion. An execution cannot issue upon a judgment after a motion for a new trial has been granted. The order granting the motion for a new trial vacated the findings and judgment. Etchas v. Orena, 121 Cal. 270, 53 Pac. 798. If authority were needed for so obvious a proposition as the one that a court has no jurisdiction to issue an execution on a judgment which has been vacated, it is supplied by Long v. Garnett, 45 Tex. 400.

The writ is denied and the petition dismissed.

PEOPLE v. MIT SINGH. (Cr. 899.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 6, 1922.)

1. Rape ⟸53(3)—Evidence held to show intent to commit.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, evidence held to show defendant's intent, where the struggles of prosecutrix with defendant, although she broke away, were seen by three witnesses.

2. Criminal law ⟸822(4) — Charge as to defendant's intent held not to assume proof of prosecutrix's seizure in assault with intent to commit rape.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, a charge, relating to defendant's intent, that to find guilt, "you must be satisfied that the accused, when he had hold of the prosecutrix," etc., was not an assumption of proof of prosecutrix's seizure by defendant, where the charge was otherwise plain that the jury must be satisfied defendant actually laid hands on prosecutrix.

3. Criminal law ⟸822(1) — Charge must be considered in its entirety.

The trial court's charge must be considered in its entirety, and if as a whole it contains a correct statement of law, it is free from criticism.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Mit Singh was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Sebille & Sebille, of Brawley, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape. He appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] From the evidence adduced at the trial it appears that the prosecuting witness and her husband lived in a small tank house on the ranch of a man named Brown, which was about a block from a family named Carrillo. According to the prosecutrix, Singh came to her door about noon on December

25, 1921, in the absence of her husband. When she met Singh at the door he forcibly seized her and attempted to "hug and kiss" and throw her to the ground. After a struggle of some minutes duration in front of her house during which the dress of the prosecutrix was torn, she broke away and ran to the Carrillo house. The defendant followed her, with a pistol in his hand, until he fell to the ground, and she escaped. The prosecutrix is corroborated by three other persons who were at the Carrillo house (which was so situated as to give any one there a view of the front of the house of prosecutrix), and saw defendant and the prosecutrix struggling together. They further testified that they saw the prosecutrix break away from the defendant and run toward the Carrillo home pursued by the defendant, who had something in his hand, and that about halfway to their house the defendant fell and came no nearer. The defendant denies both the assault and that he was present at the house of the prosecutrix at the time it was alleged to have taken place.

Appellant first urges as a ground for reversal that there is no evidence whatsoever to show assault with intent to commit rape. This contention is devoid of merit. In the face of the testimony of the prosecutrix, corroborated by three other witnesses, it cannot with reason be said that the jury was unwarranted in determining that the defendant's actions constituted an assault with intent to commit rape. The intent with which an assault is committed is exclusively for the jury to determine from all the circumstances and acts of the defendant. People v. Bowman, 6 Cal. App. 749, 93 Pac. 198. Where, as in the instant case, there is a sharp conflict in the evidence it is too well settled to require citation of authority that the verdict will not be set aside upon appeal.

[2] Appellant relies principally on the claim that the trial court erred in giving the following instruction:

"You are hereby instructed that in order to find the defendant guilty of an assault to commit rape you must be satisfied that the accused, when he had hold of the prosecutrix, not only desired to gratify his passions upon her person, but that he intended to do so at all events and notwithstanding any resistance on her part. The assault must have been made with intent to commit a rape notwithstanding all possible resistance that could be made. Intent must have been to perpetrate the crime at all events, regardless of what the prosecutrix might or could do to prevent it, and the question of intent is a question for the jury to determine."

The court instructed the jury that the presumption of innocence was with the defendant, and that the burden of proving him guilty beyond all reasonable doubt rested upon the prosecution, and that the jury must acquit unless the evidence established the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. This applied to the necessity of proof that defendant assaulted the prosecutrix, just as it did to other essentials of the offense charged. The court further informed the jury that—

"It is not enough for you to be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant laid violent hands upon the prosecutrix."

It predicated other instructions on the necessity that the jury first find that defendant assaulted the prosecutrix. Appellant argues that the effect of the instruction first quoted was to assume that an essential element of the crime had been proved, i. e., the seizure of the prosecutrix by the defendant, and that as such it constituted an instruction to the jury on a matter of fact.

[3] It is of course true that the trial court must confine itself in its instructions to matters of law, but we do not think the instruction under consideration, construed with the entire charge, conflicts with this rule. It is well established by numerous decisions that the charge of the trial court must be considered in its entirety, and that if as a whole it contains a correct statement of the law it is free from criticism. People v. Wong Hing, 28 Cal. App. 230, 151 Pac. 1159; People v. Mendenhall, 135 Cal. 346, 67 Pac. 325; People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 97 Pac. 871. In the case of People v. Wong Hing, supra, the court instructed the jury that—

"The law presumes that every one who deliberately and intentionally fires a gun at another, does such act willfully and with malice aforethought," etc.

It was there contended that the instruction told the jury that the defendant had actually fired at the deceased, and that because of his firing the natural consequence of his act, namely, the death of Gue Ton, was intended by him. In its decision the court used the following language:

"Considered alone, or without reference to other parts of the charge delivered by the court to the jury, the defendant's criticism would, of course, be sound and just, but it was the duty of the jury, as it is our duty in reviewing the instructions, to consider the entire charge of the court, 'and if, as a whole, it correctly states the law, it is free from error, notwithstanding selected passages may state a proposition without at the same time and in immediate connection stating the exceptions or qualifications to which it is subject in its application to the case in hand.' People v. Mendenhall, 135 Cal. 346, 67 Pac. 325. See, also, People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 85; People v. Flynn, 73 Cal. 511, 15 Pac. 102; People v. Worden, 113 Cal. 569, 45 Pac. 844; People v. Quimby, 6 Cal. App. 482, 92 Pac. 493; People v. Del Cerro, 9 Cal. App. 764, 769, 100 Pac. 887; People v. Bruggy, 93 Cal. 476, 29 Pac. 26; People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 370, 97 Pac. 871. The court, in its charge, repeatedly instructed the jury that the presumption of innocence was with the defendant, that consequently the burden of proving the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt was upon the prosecution and that unless the evidence established guilt beyond a reasonable doubt the defendant would be entitled to a verdict of acquittal. Viewed by the light of these instructions, the criticized instruction must be construed to mean, as no doubt the jury so understood it, that if the evidence showed beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant deliberately and intentionally fired a gun or pistol at the deceased, it was to be presumed that he did so willfully and with malice aforethought. As stated, the jury presumptively so understood the instruction and as so construed it was properly given in this case."

The situation in the case just discussed is singularly analogous to the one at bar. The trial court made it plain in its instructions to the jury that to convict the defendant they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant actually laid hands on the prosecutrix and, viewed by the light of these instructions, the instruction criticized must be construed to mean that if the evidence showed beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant violently laid hands on the prosecutrix, then and in that case they must be further satisfied that he intended to commit a rape, notwithstanding all possible resistance that could be made. People v. Wong Hing, supra.

Appellant cites several cases to sustain the proposition that an erroneous charge which is not withdrawn is not cured by a subsequent correct charge on the same point. These cases are not in point, for, without exception, they involve conflicting and contradictory instructions which contain erroneous statements of the law. As construed, the instruction under consideration contains a correct statement of the law, and neither conflicts with nor contradicts any part of the trial court's charge to the jury.

No error appearing, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BEYERLE v. CLIFT. (Civ. 3915.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 30, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 26, 1922.)

1. Trial ⊂=253(3)—Instruction in collision case disregarding defense of contributory negligence held erroneous.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's motortruck, struck by defendant's automobile, wherein defendant relied on contributory negligence, an instruction to find for plaintiff if defendant violated any of the provisions of the law defining the duties imposed on operators of vehicles at the time of the accident, and if such violation was the proximate cause of the accident, held erroneous as failing to embrace all conditions necessary, including the defense of contributory negligence.

2. Trial ⊂=253(6) — All things necessary to show legal liability of defendant to be embraced in instruction for plaintiff in the event of finding certain facts.

An instruction directing a verdict for plaintiff in the event that the jury finds certain facts true must embrace all the things necessary to show legal liability of defendant, and to warrant the direction or conclusion herein that plaintiff is entitled to a verdict.

3. Trial ⊂=296(3) — Instruction disregarding contributory negligence held not cured by other instructions given.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's truck struck by defendant's automobile, an instruction purporting to state the conditions necessary to a verdict, but overlooking the defense of contributory negligence, held not cured by other correct instructions on contributory negligence, as they simply produced a conflict and it is not possible to say which the jury followed.

4. Highways ⊂=184(3)—Submission of issue of contributory negligence in collision case held justified by evidence.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's truck struck by defendant's automobile, wherein the defense of contributory negligence was relied upon, evidence as to the speed at which defendant was traveling and as to conditions surrounding the accident held to justify presentation to the jury of the question of contributory negligence.

5. Evidence ⊂=17—Judicial notice taken of rising of moon and height at given time.

The courts will take judicial notice of the time of the rising of the moon and of its height at a given time.

6. Appeal and error ⊂=171(3)—Sufficiency of plea of contributory negligence will not be considered where case was tried on theory that such issue was properly pleaded.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff's truck struck by defendant's automobile, the sufficiency of a plea of contributory negligence will not be considered where the answer plainly relied upon contributory negligence, and the case was tried and evidence offered for and against on the theory that contributory negligence was in issue, both parties asking for instructions on that question, especially in the absence of any demurrer to the answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by K. F. Beyerle against R. D. Clift. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Rohe, Yakey & Devin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages for injuries to a truck owned by the plaintiff, such injuries being caused, so it is alleged, by negligence of the defendant in the operation of an automobile driven by him, by reason whereof it became necessary for the operator of plaintiff's truck to drive the truck entirely off the highway, in order to avoid a collision with the defendant's automobile. As a result of its being so driven off the highway into soft ground, the truck turned over and was thereby damaged to the extent described in the complaint. The defendant, in addition to denying the alleged acts of negligence on his part, alleged that the plaintiff "was guilty of negligence in the manner in which he operated his automobile truck at the time and place of the accident, in that he did not exercise ordinary care or any care in the operation of said truck, all of which directly and proximately contributed to the accident in question." Pursuant to the verdict of a jury, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant appeals therefrom.

The errors relied upon consist in the giving of two instructions to the jury. In each of these instructions the court stated certain provisions of law defining the duties imposed upon an operator of a vehicle, and then said:

"If, therefore, you believe that the defendant violated any of the provisions of the law above mentioned at the time of the accident complained of in this case, and that such violation was the proximate cause of the accident, you should find for the plaintiff."

[1-3] Assuming that the issue of contributory negligence was properly before the court, there is no doubt that these were erroneous instructions, because it is settled law that, if an instruction by its terms purports to state the conditions necessary to a verdict, it must state all those conditions and must not overlook pleaded defenses on which substantial evidence has been introduced.

"It is clear that an instruction directing a verdict for the plaintiff in the event that the jury finds certain facts to be true must embrace all the things necessary to show the legal liability of the defendant and to warrant the direction or conclusion contained therein that plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, and such is the rule in this state." Pierce v. United Gas & Elec. Co., 161 Cal. 176, 184, 118 Pac. 700, 704; Keena v. United Railroads (Cal. App.) 207 Pac. 35.

The court gave other instructions on the subject of contributory negligence, the correctness of which is not challenged. But this is not sufficient to overcome the prejudicial character of the erroneous instructions.

"It is true that other instructions were given at the request of defendant that stated the law in these respects as favorably to defendant as was warranted, if not more favorably. But the giving of these other instructions simply produced a clear conflict in the instructions given the jury by the court, and it is impossible for us to say which instruction the jury followed in arriving at a verdict in favor of plaintiff." Pierce v. United Gas & Elec. Co., supra, 161 Cal. at page 185, 118 Pac. at page 704.

Respondent suggest that the instructions here criticized did not ignore the defense of contributory negligence, because those instructions required that before finding for the plaintiff it must appear that defendant's violation, if any there was, of the stated provisions of law "was the proximate cause of the accident," and not merely that such violation proximately contributed to the accident. The contention is that, in order to be the cause of the accident, the defendant's wrongful act must have been the sole cause thereof, and that therefore the language used carried the implication that defendant's wrongful act alone, without any contributory negligence of the plaintiff, was in contemplation as the cause of the accident. We do not agree with this contention. The natural and ordinary meaning of the words used in this instruction was such as to draw the attention of the jury solely to the alleged negligence of the defendant, without taking into consideration any evidence from which contributory negligence of the plaintiff might have been inferred.

[4, 5] Respondent further replies that the evidence did not warrant the court in giving any instruction upon the question of contributory negligence, and that the fact of contributory negligence was not sufficiently pleaded by the defendant. The evidence was sufficient to present to the jury the question of contributory negligence of the plaintiff. The situation described was as follows: The plaintiff's truck was being driven in a northerly direction. Two automobiles, one immediately behind the other, had stopped on the westerly side of the road. The paved portion of the highway was 16 feet wide. The evidence is uncertain as to whether the standing machines were entirely off the paved road. At any rate, they were on the west side of the road. The plaintiff's driver admitted that there was an apron on the south side of the paved highway. As we interpret the evidence, he meant the southeast side. The context compels the inference that the road at that place ran in a northeasterly and southwesterly direction, so that the right hand side of the road, when traveling north, might be called either the south side or the east side. The defendant testified that this apron was 10 feet in width, consisting of solid, hard dirt road. If this be true, there would be 18 feet between the middle of the road and the edge of the apron, and probably at least 20 feet between the standing machines and the edge of the apron where the ditch begins. According to the plaintiff's testimony, in approaching the point where he must pass the standing machines, he traveled on a slightly down grade at the rate of 25 miles per hour. For the purposes of the present question, we may further assume in favor of the plaintiff that the defendant at the time when he attempted to pass the standing machines (defendant moving in a southerly direction) was traveling at the rate of 50 miles an hour, and therefore that the defendant was operating his machine in a negligent manner. The time of the accident is fixed by the plaintiff at 4:50 p. m., and by the defendant at 5:15 p. m. It is stipulated that the sun had set at 4:47. The date was November 20, 1920. The defendant testified that the lamps on the plaintiff's truck were not lit. Defendant further testified that there was moonlight such that he was able by that light to read the time as shown by his watch. Under the rule that courts take judicial notice of the laws of nature and the measure of time, we take it to be the fact that (and so we are reliably informed) the moon rose at 19 minutes after 1 that afternoon, and was up 40 degrees or more at the time of the accident. The operator of plaintiff's automobile testified that as the defendant approached defendant came over onto the east side of the paved road; that there is a two-inch drop from the paved road to the dirt; that the dirt road is on a slant; that there is a ditch at the edge of the dirt road; that for this reason, in order to keep his truck straight while trying to avoid a collision with the defendant, plaintiff's driver had to pull the truck into the field, or go straight on and turn over in the ditch, and for this reason he took his chance and went on into the field. On the evidence before stated, the jury might have been warranted in finding that the truck driver of the plaintiff had sufficient room to pass safely without turning into the field, and that his own acts under the circumstances constituted negligence which contributed proximately to the accident. So far as the evidence was concerned, it was a question of fact fairly presented to the jury.

[6] Respondent's contention that the defense of contributory negligence was not pleaded in such manner as to raise the issue is answered by the decision of the Supreme Court in Kelly v. Santa Barbara, etc., R. Co., 171 Cal. 415, 421, 153 Pac. 903, 905 (Ann. Cas. 1917C 67). Answering certain objections to instructions given in that case, the respondent had claimed that the error, if any, was immaterial because the question of contributory negligence, on account of its faulty pleading in the answer, was not before the court. To this the court replied:

"But however imperfect the answer may be in its failure to allege the facts constituting the asserted contributory negligence, nevertheless the answer plainly relied upon contributory negligence. The case was tried and evidence was offered pro and con upon the theory that contributory negligence was in issue; both parties asked for instructions to the jury upon the question, and we will not here, especially in the absence of any demurrer to the answer for such imperfection, consider the question."

The statement thus made answers precisely to the conditions of the case at bar. From all of the foregoing, we conclude that the errors in the instructions given to which we have referred require a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE ex rel. VAN VRANKEN, Dist. Atty., v. PIAZZA et al. (Civ. 2530.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 5, 1922.)

Appeal and error ⟸479(2)—Power of appellate court to grant writ where a building is adjudged to be a nuisance is discretionary.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 949, as amended by St. 1921, p. 95, providing that an appeal of a case where a building is adjudged to be a nuisance, under St. 1913, p. 20, and closed, shall not operate as a stay, the power of the Appellate Court to grant a writ of supersedeas in such cases is discretionary, and the writ should issue only in exceptional cases.

Action by the People of the State of California, on the relation of Edward Van Vranken, District Attorney, against G. Piazza and another, to abate a nuisance. Judgment for relator, and Piazza appeals. Application by defendant for writ of supersedeas. Writ denied.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for petitioner.

R. C. Pardoe and Edward Van Vranken, both of Stockton, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This action was instituted under the "Red Light Abatement Act" (Stats. 1913, p. 20). The judgment rendered in the action declares a certain two-story building owned by defendant Piazza "to be a building where lewdness, assignation, and prostitution was, at the time of the filing of the complaint herein, carried on, and was then and there a public nuisance," and, further, orders that the sheriff "be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed forthwith to remove all occupants from said building, and to remove all personal property therefrom, and to keep said building closed for a period of one (1) year, or until released as provided by law." From this judgment Piazza appealed. He thereupon filed his petition herein for a writ of supersedeas, alleging that the trial court "refused to stay execution on said judgment, upon the ground of want of jurisdiction so to do," and that, "unless a writ of supersedeas is granted staying execution on said judgment until the final determination of said appeal, petitioner will lose the sum of $200 per month in rental for said premises until the final determination of said appeal." It is not contended that the appeal operates as a stay, but that this court has inherent power to issue the writ prayed for. In the case of People v. Laine, 177 Cal. 742, 171 Pac. 941, decided March 19, 1918, it was held that, under the provisions of section 949 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the part of the judgment therein which was similar to that under consideration here was "stayed by operation of the appeal." In 1921 section 949 was amended, by adding the exception herein italicized, to read as follows:

"Stay of proceedings on perfecting appeal. Exception when building declared nuisance. In cases not provided for in sections nine hundred forty-two, nine hundred forty-three, nine hundred forty-four and nine hundred forty-five, the perfecting of an appeal by giving the undertaking or making the deposit mentioned in section nine hundred forty-one, stays proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, except where it directs the sale of perishable property; in which case the court below may order the property to be sold and the proceeds thereof to be deposited, to abide the judgment of the appellate court; and except, also, where it adjudges the defendant guilty of usurping, or intruding into, or unlawfully holding a public office, civil or military, within this state, and, except, also, where the order grants, or refuses to grant, a change of the place of trial of an action; and except also where it orders a corporation or its officers or agents, or any of them, to give to a person adjudged to be a director, stockholder or member of such corporation a reasonable opportunity to inspect or take copies of such books, papers or documents of the corporation as the court finds that such director, stockholder or member is entitled by law to inspect or copy; and except, also, where it adjudges a building or place to be a nuisance and as a part of the judgment in the case orders and directs the closing of the building or place against its use for any purpose for any period of time." St. 1921, p. 95.

This amendment was probably intended to, and in fact does, change the rule as announced in People v. Laine, supra. Notwithstanding the amendment, however, petitioner contends that this court has inherent power to grant the stay applied for, citing Rogers v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 467, 111 Pac. 357; Southern Pacific Co. v. Superior Court, 167 Cal. 250, 139 Pac. 69; Halsted v. First Sav. Bank, 173 Cal. 605, 160 Pac. 1075; and Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 Pac. 9, 18. It is not necessary to decide whether the court has such power. If petitioner's contention be conceded, the issuance or denial of the writ is discretionary. Since the Legislature has provided that the appeal shall not operate as a stay, the writ should issue, if at all, only in exceptional cases. The grounds on which the writ is prayed for here would exist in every case where a building is ordered to be closed, and, hence, to grant the writ would be to nullify the statute. Without passing on the merits of the appeal, it may be said that an examination of the record discloses nothing to influence the court's discretion in favor of the issuance of the writ.

The order to show cause is discharged, and the writ prayed for is denied.

ALTHOUSE et al. v. PROVIDENT MUT. BUILDING-LOAN ASS'N. (Civ. 3374.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 1, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 31, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1036(3) — Complaint not demurrable for failure to join a possible party plaintiff, where no prejudice appears.

A complaint is not demurrable for the omission of a party who might have been joined as plaintiff, merely because defendant may have been deprived of the benefit of equities arising out of transactions with such omitted party, particularly where no such equities are pleaded or any effort has been made to have the omitted party brought in, nor any allegations made which by consequence make it necessary to bring in such party.

2. Money received ⟸12—Action not barred by laches.

An action brought for money had and received two years after the cause of action accrues was not barred by laches, where no injury resulted.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit ⟸60(1)—Remedy for failure to prosecute.

The appropriate remedy for failure to prosecute with reasonable diligence is a motion to dismiss.

4. Mortgages ⟸151(2) — Future advances with knowledge of other mortgage held subsequent thereto.

Where vendor's agreement with vendee was that his trust deed for the price should be second and subject to a building loan of $3,000 by a building loan association and the trust deeds of vendor and the association were filed concurrently, loans made by the association under its trust deed in excess of $3,000, with actual notice of the terms and conditions of the vendor's trust deed, and without legal obligation to do so under its trust deed, were subsequent to the lien of vendor's trust deed, although the association's trust deed, given to secure vendee's $3,000 note, also purported to secure future advances not exceeding $6,000.

5. Mortgages ⟸151(2) — Further advances under mortgage securing future advances held not prior as involuntary.

Where mortgagor abandoned and failed to complete building on which building loan association had loaned $3,000 under trust deed securing that loan and further advances, subsequent expenditures by the association in excess of the $3,000, to complete the building, with knowledge of existence of another trust deed on the land, were not entitled to priority over such other trust deed, on the ground that they were further advances of an involuntary character, where the property as it stood when abandoned was of value sufficient to protect the original $3,000 loan.

6. Mortgages ⟸183—Second mortgagee not estopped to assert his lien in preference to the lien of a first mortgagee for subsequent advances.

A second mortgagee is not estopped to assert his lien in preference to voluntary advances for the improvement of the property, made by a first mortgagee under a clause as to future advances, and with notice of the second mortgage, where such advances were made without the second mortgagee's sanction, and with the knowledge that he claimed his second mortgage was a superior lien over such advances.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by John B. Althouse and others against the Provident Mutual Building-Loan Association. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Milton K. Young, Lyndol L. Young, and William K. Young, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. H. Jamison, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant has filed appeals from six judgments entered in favor of plaintiffs in six actions brought for the recovery of several sums of money alleged to be held in possession by the defendant, subject to equitable liens which entitle plaintiffs to payment thereof. The cases are alike in the statement of facts relied upon. They differ only in that they relate to separate, though similar, transactions. They were tried together in the superior court. The parties are the same in all of the actions. Pursuant to stipulation, the records are presented in one transcript, and have been argued in one set of briefs. The decision in one case will determine the others. For this reason, we will discuss that case (superior court No. B–18520) in which the complaint is printed in the supplement to appellant's brief, as if it were the only action before the court, and then decide all of the appeals in accordance with the conclusions reached in that case.

Except as may be otherwise noted herein, our statement of facts will be taken from the findings of fact contained in the transcript. On the 28th day of June, 1911, the plaintiffs, being the owners of the north half of lot 2, in block 15, of Ramona Park, in the city of Alhambra, county of Los Angeles, entered into an agreement with the Ramona Park Building Company to sell said property to the company for the sum of $601.40, payable on or before three years from date, with interest as specified; payment thereof to be secured by a deed of trust to be executed at such time as the company might be able to secure a building loan on the property in the sum of $2,500, the proceeds of which were to be used exclusively for the purpose of building a residence on said land; said trust deed to be second to and subject to the building loan. Later it was agreed that the amount of the building loan could be increased to $3,000. The building company agreed to construct on the land a residence along such plans as might be acceptable to and approved by the plaintiffs. Plans for such residence were submitted by the building company to the plaintiffs, and were approved by them. An agreement was made between the defendant and the building company for a building loan of $3,000.

On July 11, 1911, plaintiffs conveyed the land to the building company. On the same day and for the purpose of securing the payment of a promissory note to the defendant in the sum of $3,000, with interest as specified therein, the building company, as party of the first part, executed a deed of trust to Title Guarantee & Trust Company as party of the second part, and the defendant as party of the third part. In said trust deed (this appears from the copy thereof annexed to the amended answer of the defendant), it was stated that the property was thereby conveyed to the trustee for the purpose of securing the payment of the note "and all costs and expenses incurred under the provisions of this instrument, and also of such additional sums as may hereafter be borrowed and received by the said party of the first part from the party of the third part, not exceeding the sum of six thousand and no/100 dollars, with interest thereon at the rate provided in the original note." It was further provided:

"In case said premises are neglected or abandoned, the party of the second part may, at its discretion, enter upon and take possession without notice and employ help to care for the same, using all available means to make productive the premises; and these trusts shall be and continue as security to the party of the second and third parts, or their successors or assigns, for the repayment of the money so borrowed by the party of the first part, and the interest thereon, and of all amounts so paid out and of costs and expenses incurred as aforesaid, whether paid by the party of the second or of the third part, which shall be repaid on demand, and if not so paid, shall bear interest at the rate of one per cent. per month thereafter until paid."

The trust deed contains the usual power of sale in case of default—the particular terms whereof are not now in question. It was provided that the trustee, "out of the proceeds of sale shall pay, first, the expenses of making such sale; next, shall pay said third party the entire sum due it at the time of such sale, if said proceeds be sufficient, and lastly, any surplus remaining shall be paid to said first party, its successors or assigns."

On July 21, 1911, the Building Company, being indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $601.40 on account of the purchase price of said land, made its note therefor with interest payable to the plaintiffs on or before three years after date. At the same time, for the purpose of securing said note, the building company as party of the first part executed a deed of trust to Los Angeles Abstract & Trust Company as party of the second part, and the plaintiffs as parties of the third part; said trust deed being upon the same real property described in the first trust deed. At all times from and after July 21, 1911, the defendant had actual notice of the existence of said second trust deed and promissory note in favor of the plaintiffs, and of all the terms and conditions and stipulations contained therein. No part of said indebtedness to the plaintiffs has been paid.

There was no agreement or understanding between the plaintiff and the defendant that said land was to be improved by the construction of a residence building thereon by the building company, or that the money for such purpose was to be furnished by the defendant. There was no agreement or understanding between said parties that the trust deed of the plaintiffs and the indebtedness secured thereby was to be subject and subordinate in all respects to the repayment of any and all moneys borrowed from the defendant for the erection and completion of said building, or for moneys advanced or paid out by said association for the completion of said building under any of the provisions of the trust deed of said association other than this, that the plaintiffs' trust deed was made "subject to a trust deed for $3000 in favor of the Provident Mutual Building-Loan Association, filed for record concurrently herewith." The respective trust deeds were concurrently filed for record on August 19, 1911, at 9 a. m., at the request of the defendant, in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county.

The building company defaulted in payment of the sums due to the defendant, and the defendant on October 15, 1912, declared the whole of the indebtedness secured by its deed of trust to be immediately due and payable, and directed the trustee to sell the property under the terms and conditions of the trust deed. Due notice having been given, the property was offered at public sale on November 16, 1912, and was sold to the defendant, who was the only bidder at the sale, for the sum of $5,000. The deed was duly executed and delivered by the trustee to the defendant pursuant to said sale. No portion of the sum of $5,000 was paid in money, but the defendant accepted as a credit upon the note of the company to it the said sum of $5,000. On the 16th day of November, 1912, there was due from the building company to the defendant on account of the principal and interest of the note secured by defendant's trust deed the sum of $3,155.10, together with $75 charges and expenses of the sale, said aggregate sum being $1,769.90 less than the amount for which the property was sold by the trustee to the defendant.

In June, 1912, the plaintiffs had caused said premises to be advertised for sale under the trust deed made by the building company for their benefit, and had thereafter abandoned those proceedings; but such abandonment was not made with any understanding or agreement between plaintiffs and the defendant. The sale made under the trust deed of the defendant and said abandonment of proceedings by the plaintiffs under their trust deed was not made with any understanding or agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant in relation thereto, nor with any understanding or agreement between said parties that defendant would sell said premises under said deed of trust, and that thereafter the plaintiffs would, if they so elected, have opportunity to sell said premises through the agency of Jonathan S. Dodge, one of their number. Said property was subsequently sold by defendant at its instance and request through the agency of Dodge to H. C. Cassidy, who was an innocent and bona fide purchaser, for the sum of $8,000. The said Dodge made said sale as a real estate broker, and entirely independent of his associates, the other plaintiffs, and he was not acting for or in behalf of said associates, or of any of them. At the time of said sale and long prior thereto plaintiffs demanded of the defendant that their claim against said property be paid from the funds or indebtedness arising by reason of said trustee's sale, and defendant made said sale to Cassidy with full knowledge of such claim.

On February 10, 1912, the building company borrowed and received from the defendant the additional sum of $1,000, giving its note therefor of that date. It was optional with the defendant as to whether or not it would make said additional loan of $1,000, and said additional loan was made by the defendant to the building company without the actual knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs, or either of them. Said loan was not sanctioned or approved by the plaintiffs, or either of them. The amount due to defendant on said $1,000 note on November 16, 1912, was the sum of $1,060.30.

On or about April 20, 1912, the building company ceased construction work upon said residence before the final completion thereof, and said residence remained in that condition until on or about July 1, 1912, at which time defendant entered into an arrangement with the building company to supervise the completion of the building according to its original plans therefor. Between July 1 and November 16, 1912, defendant paid out to various persons other than the building company, on account of labor and material used and furnished by such persons in and about said building for the final completion of the same, the sum of $2,321.18. It was optional with the defendant as to whether or not it would make such payments. At all times between said two last-mentioned dates said premises were not abandoned by the building company, and during said time the same remained in its possession. Said sum of $2,321.18 was not borrowed or received by the building company from the defendant, and said sum was not expended by the defendant with the consent of the plaintiffs.

Plaintiffs are not guilty of laches, and are not estopped to claim anything against the defendant, or to prosecute this action.

All of the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint are true except as in the findings specifically found to be otherwise, and all of the allegations of the defendant's amended answer are untrue except as in the findings specifically found to be otherwise.

This action was commenced on the 14th day of November, 1914. On November 6, 1915, the defendant demurred to the complaint on the grounds that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the plaintiffs have been guilty of such laches in the commencement of the action as to bar a recovery therein; that there is a defect of parties plaintiff in that the Ramona Park Building Company was not made a party plaintiff thereto; and upon certain grounds of uncertainty, etc.

Appellant claims (a) that the demurrer should have been sustained, and that the court erred in not requiring that the building company be made a party defendant; (b) that the trust deeds made the property a first security for the payment of the sums expended by appellant for the completion of the building after work ceased thereon, and after it had been neglected and abandoned; (c) that the optional loan of $1,000 is a superior and preferred claim to respondent's "second mortgage," and that the same should be allowed in the particular action B-17599, where it becomes an important item; (d) that appellant's claims are superior to those of respondent as a matter of equity; (e) that the defenses of estoppel and laches should be sustained.

[1] The demurrer was properly overruled. No sufficient reason is suggested which would have made the building company a necessary party plaintiff. Counsel suggest that by the omission of such party appellant was deprived of any benefit which it might have received from any offset which the building company might have been able to assert against appellant's claim or any equity arising in favor of appellant by reason of the transactions occurring between plaintiff and the building company. It is not asserted that any such equity in fact existed. The answer of the defendant reveals no fact indicating the existence of any such equity. It does not appear that the defendant applied to the court to have the building company brought in as a party, or alleged any fact which by consequence made it necessary to bring in such party in order that there might be a complete settlement of the controversy between the parties to this action.

[2, 3] Neither is any reason suggested or argument made to support the claim that plaintiffs' right of action was barred by laches through delay in commencing the action. As well might this claim be made in any action brought, as for money had and received, after the lapse of a period of nearly two years after the cause of action accrued. The defendant was not injured by the fact that it remained in undisturbed possession of the fund from and after the time of the sale. It is true that one of the defendant's officers, Mr. Hunter, who had much to do with the transactions in question, died before the trial of this case, but that unfortunate event occurred nearly two years after the summons herein was served upon the defendant. The record does not show why the action was not brought on for trial until after his death. Laches of the plaintiff, by reason of such delay as there was in commencing the action, was not established. If the action was not prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the appropriate remedy of the defendant would have been by motion to dismiss for want of prosecution. Watterson v. Hillside Water Co., 42 Cal. App. 364, 183 Pac. 592. It does not appear that any such motion was made.

[4] It may be conceded that as between the parties to the defendant's trust deed the loan of $1,000 made by defendant to the building company, and also the expenditures made by the defendant for completion of the building after July 1, 1912, were secured by that trust deed. But here we are dealing with the rights of the plaintiff, which are defined and limited by another instrument. The agreement between the plaintiff and the building company was that the plaintiff's trust deed should be second and subject to the building loan of $3,000. The plaintiff's trust deed did not state that it was made subject to any and all indebtedness which might be secured by the defendant's trust deed. The only proviso with reference to this matter contained in the plaintiff's trust deed was that it was to be "subject to a trust deed for $3,000 in favor of the Provident Mutual Building-Loan Association filed for record concurrently herewith." In making its loans or advances over and above said sum of $3,000, the defendant had actual notice of the terms and conditions of the plaintiff's trust deed.

The facts being as above stated, any loans or advances voluntarily made by the defendant without legal obligation so to do under the terms of its trust deed, were subject and subsequent to the lien of the plaintiff for the amount secured by the plaintiff's trust deed. This is the rule established by decision in this state. Sav. & Loan Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 533, 39 Pac. 922; Valley Lumber Co. v. Wright, 2 Cal. App. 288, 291, 84 Pac. 58; The Seattle, 170 Fed. 284, 288, 95 C. C. A. 480.

[5] It cannot successfully be disputed that the item of $1,000 was a voluntary addition to the original loan made by the defendant. Appellant claims, however, that by reason of the fact that the owner ceased construction work about April 20, 1912, the premises were neglected and abandoned within the meaning of the provisions of appellant's trust deed, which gave to appellant in case of such abandonment the right at its discretion to enter upon and take possession of the premises and to use all available means to make the same productive; and which provided further that all expenses incurred for that purpose should be secured by appellant's trust deed. Appellant claims that the expenditures thus made by it for the completion of the building were not optional loans in any sense; that, while the mortgagee might make such expenditures or not, as it elected, the mortgagor was obligated to accept such expenditures as a loan for the protection of the mortgagee, "and the mortgagee makes the loan not altogether as a voluntary act, but as a necessity to protect the security." But we think that under the stated facts the making of these expenditures was the voluntary act of the defendant. Its refusal to advance money for the completion of the building would not have been the violation of any obligation imposed upon it by its trust deed. We fail to see how the advancements became obligatory in any sense, except that for its own interest appellant may have felt obliged to complete the building, so that the property might be sold to better advantage. But so far as the evidence shows, the property as it stood at the time when the work of construction was abandoned by the building company was sufficient in value to protect the $3,000 loan theretofore made by appellant.

[6] Neither do we think that respondent is estopped to claim priority for its lien, as against such advancements made by appellant with actual notice of the trust deed existing in favor of respondents. The court found that these moneys paid out by appellant for completion of the building were not so paid out or expended with the consent of respondents. There is evidence sufficient to support this finding. From the testimony of one of the respondents, Mr. Dodge, it appears that in his conversations with Mr. Hunter, who represented appellants, it was well understood that appellant claimed that it had the right to complete the building, and that its lien for the moneys expended would have preference over that of respondents; and that, on the other hand, Mr. Dodge claimed that respondents would be entitled to have their lien satisfied next after the payment to appellant of its $3,000 loan under its trust deed. With this open question between them, appellant made the advancements necessary to complete the building. These are not those circumstances of silence concerning an adverse claim which, by misleading the other party, or by leading him to do what otherwise he would not have done, should estop the claimant from asserting his right.

The judgments are affirmed.

COCKERILL v. TOBIN et al. (Civ. 2499.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 14, 1922.)

Landlord and tenant ⟸80(4)—Sublease "subject to" original lease held not to bind original lessees to furnish water for irrigation.

Where a lease of rice land, binding lessors to furnish water for irrigation, was assigned to sublessees, the assignment being made subject to the terms of the original lease, the sublessees had no right of action against the original lessees for their failure to furnish water; to be "subject to" being subservient or subordinate to, and the original lease not binding lessees to furnish water.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Subject to.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by C. W. Cockerill against E. J. Tobin and others. From an order granting a change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. D. McComish, of Colusa, and R. C. McComish, of San Jose, for appellant.

Tobin & Tobin, of San Francisco, and Seth Millington, of Colusa, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff has appealed from the order of the court granting defendant E. J. Tobin's motion for a change of the place of trial to San Mateo county. It is not disputed that the place of residence of defendants E. J. Tobin and Abby Parrott Tobin is in San Mateo county, and that of defendants Takata and Matsushige in Colusa county. The only question presented by the appeal is whether the complaint states a cause of action against the last-named defendants.

The complaint alleges that the Tobins leased certain lands to Takata and Matsushige for the purpose of growing rice thereon, and by the terms of the lease agreed "to furnish water in sufficient quantities to properly irrigate a crop of rice to be planted and grown upon said lands at all times when needed"; that Takata and Matsushige, with the written consent of the lessors, "assigned said lease and sublet said premises in so far as the westerly 390 acres thereof were concerned to the plaintiff C. W. Cockerill and one Dean M. Cockerill, and said assignment and sublease were expressly made subject to all the terms and conditions of said original lease except as to the rental to be paid thereunder"; that the Cockerills planted a crop of rice on the 390 acres, and that they and the original lessees "duly performed all the conditions of said original lease on their part," and that the sublesses "performed all the conditions of said assignment and sublease on their part"; and that "the defendants herein have wholly failed, neglected, and refused to furnish water in sufficient quantities to properly irrigate a crop of rice on the land leased by said assignment and subleased to the damage of the plaintiff and said Dean M. Cockerill in the sum of $59,300."

There is no allegation that the original lessees agreed to furnish any water to the Cockerills, but appellant contends that the allegation that "said assignment and sublease were expressly made subject to all the terms and conditions of said original lease" amounts to an allegation that the lessees agreed to furnish water. It is clear that this contention cannot be sustained. "To be 'subject to' is 'to become subservient to' or 'subordinate to.'" Coffey v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 535, 82 Pac. 79. The original lease did not bind the lessees to furnish water, and it is not perceived by what course of reasoning it can be said that the provision of the sublease making it subject to the terms of the original lease could impose an obligation on the lessees not assumed by them in the original lease. Since there is no allegation in the complaint from which an inference can be drawn that the lessees agreed to furnish the Cockerills with water, the complaint fails to state a cause of action against Takata and Matsushige, and the motion for a change of venue was properly granted.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SHERMAN. (Cr. 638.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 12, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1130(4)—In absence of argument or brief, court not required to examine record with same care as where appeal is supported by argument.

Where an appeal is submitted upon the record without argument or brief, the appellate court is not required to examine the record with the care and circumspection requisite in cases where the appeals are supported by oral or written argument.

2. Insurrection and sedition ⟸2—Evidence held to sustain conviction for criminal syndicalism.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism under St. 1919, p. 281, evidence held to sustain conviction.

3. Criminal law ⟸1144(12)—Appellate court may assume from defendant's failure to attempt to sustain appeal that record is free from prejudicial error.

In the absence of a brief or argument on the part of appellant, the appellate court is not required to search the record to ascertain whether errors were made in rulings upon the evidence of sufficient magnitude to require a reversal, but may assume that the record is free from prejudicial errors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Frank Sherman was convicted of criminal syndicalism, and from the judgment of conviction and from order denying a motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

William B. Cleary and William F. Cleary, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted under an indictment presented to and filed in the superior court of Yolo county, charging him with the crime of "criminal syndicalism," as said crime is defined by an act of the Legislature of 1919, entitled "An act defining criminal syndicalism and sabotage, proscribing certain acts and methods in connection therewith * * * and providing certain penalties * * * therefor." Stats. 1919, p. 281. He appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The transcript on appeal was filed May 25, 1922, the cause was placed on the calendar of the term of this court commencing on September 5, 1922, and the parties and their attorneys were previously and in due time notified thereof.

On the day last named the cause was regularly called for hearing and argument, but there was no appearance in behalf of the defendant. Nor was there then, or has there since been, a brief filed in this court in support of the appeal, and, the legal time for filing a brief having long since expired, the cause, upon the motion of the Attorney General, was submitted upon the record.

[1] The record is voluminous, and, while we have not, as we are not required to do where the state of the appeal is such as it is herein, examined the record with the care or circumspection requisite in cases where the appeals are supported by argument, oral or written, we are justified in saying from such examination of the case as we have given it, that we have not discovered any violation of the fundamental rights of the accused, and that he seems to have been accorded a fair trial.

The indictment, following, substantially, the language of the statute, charges the defendant with the commission of acts declared by subdivisions 3 and 4 of section 1 of said statute as constituting criminal syndicalism; there being two counts in the indictment, the one charging the acts specified in subdivision 3 and the other the acts specified in subdivision 4. The verdict was based entirely on subdivision 3.

[2] The evidence, of which a large amount was brought into the record, is of the same general character as that presented in the case of People v. Roe (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 381, and, as there, consisted largely of books, pamphlets, booklets, magazines, and other publications, containing statements of the general principles of the I. W. W. organization, of which the defendant was shown to be a member, and arguments supporting those principles and advocating, in the most vigorous fashion the practical application thereof with a view of overthrowing our present system of government. There was also, as was so in the Roe Case, introduced as witnesses certain ex-members of the I. W. W. organization, and they testified at length as to the violent methods advocated by said organization, or the members thereof, as the means for accomplishing the avowed ultimate purpose and end of said organization. These methods, according to those witnesses, involved acts of sabotage as the same are defined in the statute. But further reference to the testimony in this case is not necessary. It is sufficient to say that, from our examination of the evidence, the verdict is amply fortified evidentially. The charge of the court was full and fair, and involved, generally speaking, a correct statement of the principles of law pertinent to the charge and the case as it was made by the proofs.

[3] As to the rulings of the court upon the evidence, it is to be said that, if there was or is ground for complaint on that score, it has not, of course, been pointed out, and, under such circumstances, it does not rest upon this court to search the record for the purpose of ascertaining whether any such errors were made, and, if so, whether they are of sufficient magnitude to require a reversal. In fact, we may assume that the record is free from such errors, or for that matter all errors of a prejudicial character, from the fact that counsel for the accused have not attempted to sustain the appeal, which may well be taken as a concession that no errors damaging to the substantial rights of the accused were committed by the trial court. People v. Sanchez (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 760.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PACIFIC ACCEPTANCE CORPORATION v. BANK OF ITALY, FRESNO BRANCH, et al. (Civ. 4078.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 8, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 6, 1922.)

1. Payment ⇐47(1)—Pledgor not entitled to have payments on contracts held as collateral applied otherwise than on the contracts on which made.

Where a dealer in automobile trucks borrowed money from a bank on his note with conditional sale contracts as collateral security, and earnings of the trucks covered by the contracts were paid over to the bank, the bank was bound to credit each of the contracts with such amounts only as represented the earnings contributed by the respective obligors, and the dealer's right under Civ. Code, § 1479, to prescribe how payments should be applied, did not entitle it to require that the earnings be credited on one of such contracts so as to discharge and release it, as the bank would then have been forced to give credit twice for the same amount.

2. Pledges ⇐22—Pledgee entitled in absence of agreement to hold all collateral until full payment.

Where a borrower deposited as collateral security a number of conditional sale contracts, the pledgee, in the absence of an agreement for release of a part of the collateral upon a partial payment of the indebtedness, had a right to hold all the collateral and make collections thereon until the borrower's note was paid.

3. Estoppel ⟹75—Power of disposition essential to right of possessor to give better title than he has.

Civ. Code, § 1142, providing that when possession of personal property with a power to dispose thereof is transferred by the owner to another person, his executed sale while in possession to a buyer in good faith transfers title, is inapplicable, unless power to dispose of the property is given the possessor.

4. Estoppel ⟹75—Bank held not estopped as against subsequent purchaser to assert title under conditional sale contract held as collateral.

Where a dealer in automobile trucks deposited a number of conditional sale contracts with a bank as collateral security for the payment of his own note and thereafter one of the obligors of the contracts became delinquent, and by direction of the bank the dealer took possession of the truck, and without the bank's knowledge made another conditional sale contract, which he assigned to plaintiff, the bank was not estopped to assert its title, and it is immaterial that plaintiff's judgment against the dealer was valueless.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Acceptance Corporation against the Bank of Italy, Fresno Branch, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, and Elmore Winkler, of Fresno, for appellant.

Jos. P. Bernhard, of Fresno, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is taken by the plaintiff from a judgment against it in an action to recover the value of an automobile truck, alleged to have been converted by the defendant, Bank of Italy.

The facts are, substantially, as follows: T. H. Peniston was an automobile dealer engaged in the business of selling automobile trucks in Fresno during the period between the months of June and November, 1919. The course of his business was such that in lieu of cash upon the sale of an automobile truck, he would enter into a conditional sale contract of the ordinary kind with the purchaser, whereby he reserved title in himself until the partial payments provided by the contract were completed. In June, 1919, Peniston borrowed from the defendant, Bank of Italy, the sum of $17,203 and executed and delivered to the bank his note for the said sum. As collateral security for the payment of this note, he deposited with the bank a number of automobile conditional sale contracts which he had executed as seller in the course of his business. The total of the balances due from the vendees in all of these contracts was the same amount as the amount of the note.

All of the trucks described in these contracts were being operated by the vendees named in the contracts under what was known as the "Goodfellow Hauling Contract." The payments due for the hauling were paid over to the bank, by virtue of an assignment of said contract, and a certain amount was allowed to the vendees of the trucks for the operating expenses thereof. The balance was applied by the bank on the Peniston note. The bank credited these various sums as they were received upon the Peniston note.

Among the contracts deposited as collateral security for the Peniston note was one dated June 4, 1919, made between Peniston as seller and one Collins as purchaser, covering a giant truck. At the time this contract was deposited with the bank as collateral security the balance due upon it was $2,800. This contract was pledged with the bank some time in June, 1919. During the month of July, 1919, Collins became delinquent in his payments on the contract and this fact was called to the attention of the bank by Peniston. Mr. Birge, manager of the bank, directed Peniston to take possession of the truck. Peniston did so, and placed another driver on it, and continued it at work upon the Goodfellow Hauling Contract. On September 23, 1919, Peniston made a conditional sale contract covering this truck with a man named Hopper. Hopper was in the employ of Peniston as a truck driver. He had no property, and paid nothing upon the truck, but entered into a contract with Peniston by which Peniston acknowledged the receipt of $2,100 paid upon the truck, and Hopper promised to pay an additional $2,200 for the same in monthly installments. On or about September 23, 1919, Peniston assigned and transferred this contract to the plaintiff for $2,134, and plaintiff notified Hopper that all payments thereunder were to be made to it. Hopper never made any payments. In November, 1919, the bank seized the truck, which was in the possession of Hopper, and sold it for $2,250, which amount was credited on the Peniston note. Plaintiff demanded the truck from the bank, and upon a refusal to surrender same brought this action for conversion.

[1, 2] The trial court has found that plaintiff acquired no title to the truck. The record on appeal presents but two questions. The first question is: Was the bank paid in full for its claim to the Collins contract held by it, and therefore no longer had any claim to the automobile truck at the time the plaintiff purchased the Hopper contract? The appellant answers this question in the affirmative, and urges in support of its position the fact, appearing in the record, that when the bank had received about $6,000 or $7,000 as the proceeds of the Goodfellow Hauling Contract, and had credited said amount upon Peniston's note, Peniston went to the bank and undertook to assist its note teller in distributing this amount in proper credits upon the contracts held as collateral security. Peniston states in his deposition that he told the note teller to credit $2,800 of the amount received from the hauling contract to the Collins contract, and that he was thereafter under the impression that the Collins contract was satisfied so far as the bank was concerned. It is not claimed, and cannot be, on the record, that $2,800 had been paid by Collins, or that Collins had in fact paid his contract up by the earnings of his truck, and owed nothing more thereon. On the contrary, it is admitted that Collins was delinquent in his payments, or in other words, that his truck did not earn enough upon the Goodfellow Hauling Contract, over and above expenses, to keep up his payments on the truck, and it is apparent, therefore, that his obligation as a vendee, under his contract, was a subsisting one, and of substantial value to the bank as collateral for the payment of Peniston's note. It is also perfectly apparent that had the bank been compelled to comply with Peniston's request and credit the $2,800 on the Collins contract (which amount had not been earned by Collins' truck, but represented, in large part, the proceeds of the work of the other trucks), and had it been compelled, in consequence, to discharge and release the Collins contract, then the vendees, under some of the other sales contracts whose earnings had been diverted to pay the Collins contract, would have had a right to insist upon the proper credits on their contracts. Thus the bank would have been forced to allow credit twice for the same amount received by it, and would have found itself, in consequence, with inadequate collateral to protect Peniston's note. Clearly, such a situation could not be forced by Peniston or plaintiff either as a matter of justice or reason and is not brought about by the application of any principles of which we are aware.

Appellant seeks to apply to the situation presented by the above facts the well-settled principle that one who is indebted to the same person on several obligations may, in making a payment, require that it be applied toward the extinction of one of the obligations in preference to the others. Civil Code, § 1479. It is contended that this is what was done by Peniston in the present case, and therefore the liability on the Collins contract was extinguished so far as the bank was concerned. The principle contended for is established by the Code section above cited, but it has no application to the facts here. This is for the reason that Peniston was indebted to the bank on but one obligation, the obligation of his note, and not upon several obligations. He had assigned the five conditional sale contracts as collateral security, but he was not the principal debtor under these contracts. He had no legal right to impair in any way the value of this collateral, nor to insist upon a release thereof until the contracts were actually paid up by the obligors. Assuredly, he might have paid off his own obligation in full and demanded a release of the collateral, but in the absence of an agreement for a release of a part of the collateral upon a partial payment of the note, the bank had the right to hold all the collateral and make collections thereof until Peniston's note was paid. As the collateral consisted of five different contracts for the sale of trucks, and as the amount received by the bank was the aggregate earnings of all the trucks, it necessarily followed that the bank was under obligation to credit the contracts, respectively, with such amounts only as would represent the earnings contributed by their respective obligors.

Appellant's contention amounts to this: That where a debtor has deposited with his creditor as collateral for the payment of his debt a number of contracts of third persons, upon which payments are being made from time to time, said debtor may insist that the payments made by one of the third persons be credited upon the obligation of another one. Obviously, the person making the payment has an absolute right to have his payment credited upon his own obligation, and if appellant's contention is correct, the creditor would be forced to make credit twice for the same payment.

[3] The second point urged is that the bank is estopped from asserting its title to the truck as against appellant, because it intrusted the possession of the truck to Peniston, and appellant is an innocent purchaser for value. Section 1142 of the Civil Code is relied upon to sustain this contention. That section reads as follows:

"When buyer acquires better title than seller has. Where the possession of personal property, together with a power to dispose thereof, is transferred by its owner to another person, an executed sale by the latter, while in possession, to a buyer in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, for value, transfers to such buyer the title of the former owner, though he may be entitled to rescind, and does rescind the transfer made by him."

Conceding that the bank transferred the possession of the truck to Peniston, there is no evidence that it gave him power to dispose of this truck, which is also a condition to make the statute above quoted applicable.

In the case of Greene v. Carmichael, 24 Cal. App. 27, 140 Pac. 45, following the case of Wright v. Solomon, 19 Cal. 64, 79 Am. Dec. 196, it is held that possession of personal property is only prima facie evidence of ownership, and never prevails over the true owner except in cases of negotiable instruments or a case warranting the application of the doctrine of estoppel. A number of cases on the subject are collected in the note to Davis v. First Natl. Bank, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 760, and the conclusion there reached, after a consideration of the cases, is that—

"Nothing is better settled than that possession of personal property is prima facie, not conclusive, evidence of title and that the maxim caveat emptor applies."

[4] Nor do we think that the present case presents the features requisite to create an estoppel. The bank did nothing which could have misled the appellant, save and except that it allowed its truck to be used in the hauling work, together with the trucks which were in the possession of other vendees. It knew nothing of appellant's contemplated entrance into the situation. This general question is also discussed in the note above cited, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) at page 770. Numerous cases are collected there upon the general proposition. Two of them appear to be particularly in point because of the fact that in the present case Peniston was in the business of selling trucks, and this circumstance is made much of by appellant. In the case of Forrestal v. McDonald, 9 Can. S. C. 12, it was said:

"No case has ever decided that the owner of goods is estopped merely because he has intrusted with the possession of his property a person who, being engaged in a business in the course of which he sells goods of the same kind, as those which have been delivered to him as a bailee, in breach of his duty has wrongfully sold the goods of his bailor as his own. If this were so, no man could safely leave his watch with a watchmaker who sells watches, or his carriage with a carriage maker who sells carriages, to be repaired."

In the case of Levi v. Booth, 58 Md. 305, 42 Am. Rep. 332, the court said that it was very clear that the bare possession of goods by one, though he may happen to be a dealer in that class of goods, does not clothe him with power to dispose of the goods as though he were the owner, or as having authority as agent to sell or pledge the goods, to the preclusion of the right of the real owner. If he sells as owner, there must be some other indicia of property than mere possession; there must be some act or conduct on the part of the real owner, whereby the party selling is clothed with the apparent ownership or authority to sell, and which the real owner will not be heard to deny or question to the prejudice of the innocent third person, dealing on the faith of such appearances.

It is apparent that the appellant has mistakenly trusted to Peniston's good faith. It had its remedy against him, and the record shows that it pursued this remedy and secured judgment for the amount paid him for the Hopper contract upon the ground of fraud and misrepresentation. The fact that this judgment may be valueless, for any reason, is but an incident in the particular case, and cannot enlarge the substantive rights of the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SANDER. (Cr. 1046.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 8, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 6, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⊜372(9), 1169(11)—Theory of prosecution of common plan permitted evidence of similar transactions, and admission of such evidence was harmless.

Where prosecution for passing a fictitious check was on the theory that defendant had entered on a common plan or scheme to defraud dealers in bonds by issuing fictitious checks either signed with a fictitious name or drawn on banks in which insufficient funds were deposited, the crime of uttering a check upon a bank with insufficient funds was not so dissimilar to the crime charged as to render evidence of the uttering inadmissible, even though the acts are defined in the Penal Code as constituting distinct offenses; but evidence of the uttering was without prejudice, where evidence of three similar transactions had been received without objection.

2. Criminal law ⊜941(1)—Newly discovered evidence merely cumulative not ground for new trial.

No error arises from the refusal of a new trial for newly discovered evidence which was merely cumulative.

3. Criminal law ⊜1144(17)—Presumed on appeal that judgment of conviction speaks the truth and variance between it and reporter's notes immaterial.

Where appeal was from judgment of conviction of passing a fictitious check, a violation of Pen. Code, § 476, it must be presumed that the judgment speaks the truth, and that the verdict of the jury recited in the judgment is the true verdict returned by the jury, and any error in the reporter's notes showing that defendant was convicted of drawing a bank check with intent to defraud, a violation of section 476a, did not prejudice defendant's rights.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

A. A. Sander, true name Robert L. Bradford, was convicted of passing a fictitious check, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. L. Christianson, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime denounced by section 476 of the Penal Code—the making, passing, and uttering a fictitious check with intent to defraud. The facts are that on April 8, 1921, he appeared in the office of certain bond dealers in the city of Oakland and arranged for the purchase of $10,000 worth of Victory bonds, and delivered to the dealers his check, made payable to their order, in the sum of $9,912.91, signed "A. A. Sander." In return he received from the dealers Victory bonds of the par value of $10,000. In this transaction he gave a fictitious name and address. In June of the same year he obtained from certain bond dealers in the city of Los Angeles $3,000 worth of Liberty bonds by delivering a check bearing the name of C. H. Fisher, drawn upon a Los Angeles bank. The check purported to be certified, but the certification was forged, and Fisher, if not a fictitious person, at least, had no account in the bank upon which the check was drawn. About the same time he obtained from another bond dealer $5,000 worth of bonds by the same method. He then presented a similar check for $5,000 drawn on the same bank in the name of the same person and containing a forged certification, whereby he obtained $3,000 worth of bonds from another dealer. In October, 1921, he appeared at the Central National Bank in Oakland and made a deposit therein of $5,000. On November 1st he made an additional deposit of $1,000. These two deposits were both made in the name of Gray. After making these deposits the defendant purchased $5,000 worth of Liberty bonds and arranged for the purchase of $10,000 worth additional. On November 2d he offered for deposit to his account a check drawn on the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles in the sum of $10,000, payable to the order of Gray, and purporting to be signed by one Platt. At the same time he made and uttered to the Central National Bank his check in the sum of $10,009.96, to which he signed the name of Gray. Before honoring the check the bank ascertained through inquiry at the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles that the check drawn upon that bank was worthless and the defendant was immediately taken into custody. He was tried on the transaction of April 8, 1921.

[1] Upon this appeal two assignments of error were originally made. First, that the testimony relating to the so-called Central National Bank transaction occurring on October 31 to November 2, 1921, was improperly admitted; second, that the trial court erred in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

As to the first, the prosecution was conducted upon the theory that the defendant had entered upon a common plan or scheme of defrauding dealers in bonds and securities by the issuing of fictitious checks either signed by him with a fictitious name or drawn by him upon banks in which insufficient funds were deposited. Under this theory the crime committed in the Central Bank transaction—the uttering of a check upon a bank with insufficient funds—is not so dissimilar to the crime charged in the information as to render evidence of the former inadmissible, even though such acts are specially defined in different sections of the Penal Code as constituting distinct offenses. In each case the plan to defraud was the same, and the same method of using a fictitious name as the drawer of the check was used. In any event, the appellant suffered no prejudice from the admission of this evidence. Testimony had been given of the three transactions in Los Angeles without objection.

[2] The motion for a new trial was based upon newly discovered evidence which would have been merely cumulative to that already presented. The trial court was called upon to determine whether the testimony was such as would justify the granting of the motion. We find no error in the court's determination of the question.

[3] At the oral argument the objection was made for the first time that the verdict returned was not in harmony with the information. The point is that the appellant was charged with a violation of section 476 of the Penal Code while the reporter's notes of what occurred when the jury returned into the court with its verdict showed that the appellant was convicted of a violation of section 476a. When the case was first presented these notes were not certified. A rehearing was granted at appellant's request to enable him to perfect the record. With these notes before us we see no reason for changing the judgment of affirmance originally entered. The clerk's transcript contains the judgment and a copy of the verdict. This judgment recites that a verdict was returned finding the appellant guilty of a violation of section 476 of the Penal Code as charged in the information. The written verdict from which the foreman of the jury read states a conviction of a violation of section 476 as charged in the information. This verdict was filed with the clerk, and is a part of the record. The verdict entered and recorded by the clerk in the minutes is the same. The appeal is from the judgment. The motion for a new trial did not suggest the point. We must presume that the judgment speaks the truth, and that the verdict of the jury recited in the judgment is the true verdict returned by the jury. It is apparent that the error was one of the reporter only, and that it has not prejudiced the appellant's rights. If in truth and fact the jury returned a verdict on section 476a, instead of 476, then the judgment should have been modified on motion to the trial court.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BANNON. (Cr. 881.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. Sept. 6, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 30, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⟹1159(3)—Verdict supported by substantial evidence will not be disturbed in absence of erroneous rulings.

Where defendant's story, if believed, would exculpate him, and the story of the witnesses for the prosecution, if true, would justify a conviction, the verdict of the jury, having substantial evidence to support it, would not be disturbed on appeal, unless vitiated by some erroneous ruling of the court.

2. Criminal law ⟹404(2) — Physical objects which serve to explain transaction generally admissible.

In criminal prosecutions, as a general rule, physical objects which constitute a part of the transaction, or which serve to unfold or explain it, may be accepted in evidence, if properly identified, whenever the transaction is under judicial investigation.

3. Criminal law ⟹404(2) — Deceased's passbook perforated by bullet held admissible.

In a prosecution for murder, where accused and his wife were both charged with shooting deceased, a passbook, showing a bullet hole, taken from the pocket of deceased, was admissible as tending to show the direction of the bullet that had pierced it.

4. Criminal law ⟹438 — Photograph of deceased inadmissible to show deceased's character.

In a prosecution for murder, a photograph of deceased, offered in evidence to show deceased's appearance in his lifetime and to allow the jury to see his character from the picture, held properly excluded.

5. Criminal law ⟹1169(5)—Rejected offer of deceased's photograph in evidence held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for murder, where deceased's photograph was offered to show his appearance in his lifetime and to allow the jury to see his character from the picture, but was excluded on objection, defendant was not prejudiced.

6. Criminal law ⟹438—Photograph of deceased admissible to show identity of purchaser of pistol found after shooting.

In a prosecution for murder, a photograph of deceased was properly admitted to show that deceased was not the man who had purchased a pistol found near him after the shooting.

7. Homicide ⟹166(9)—Evidence as to defendant's jealousy and motive held admissible.

In a prosecution for murder, wherein defendant claimed that deceased had debauched his wife, evidence as to a contemplated separation between defendant and his wife and as to statements by defendant that he would no longer live with his wife, since another man had been seen coming out of defendant's house, which defendant's wife denied, held admissible to show defendant's jealousy and motive.

8. Homicide ⟹159—Evidence as to movements of defendant prior to homicide admissible.

In a prosecution for murder, wherein defendant claimed that deceased had debauched his wife, evidence that, shortly before the shooting, a man and a woman were seen scuffling in the street, and that the man grabbed something from the woman and then ran towards the scene of the shooting, held properly admitted in connection with other facts justifying the inference that the man and woman were defendant and his wife and that defendant ran to the place where deceased had been seen shortly before intending to shoot him.

9. Witnesses ⟹240(5)—Question as to statements by witness to defendant held not objectionable as leading.

In a prosecution for murder, wherein defendant claimed that deceased had been intimate with his wife, a question put to a witness as to whether he had ever told defendant that he saw deceased coming from defendant's house held not erroneous as leading; the form of the question being within the discretion of the trial court.

10. Criminal law ⟹448(12)—Question in laying predicate for evidence of confession held not objectionable as calling for conclusion.

In laying a predicate for the introduction of evidence of confessions made by one accused of murder, the question as to whether there were any promises, threats, or inducements made to defendant before the statements were made by him was not objectionable as calling for a conclusion.

11. Criminal law ⟹472—Expert evidence that signature of purchaser of pistol found near deceased was not that of deceased held admissible.

In a prosecution for murder, wherein it was claimed that the pistol found near deceased's body had been placed there by defendant, evidence by a handwriting expert that deceased's signature was not in the same handwriting as the fictitious signature of the purchaser of the pistol held admissible.

12. Witnesses ⟹337(2)—Defendant, testifying as witness, may be impeached by showing of bad general reputation for veracity.

When defendant in a criminal case testifies for himself, and gives testimony to exonerate him from the crime with which he is charged, he becomes a witness, and may be impeached by testimony that his general reputation in the community for truth, honesty, and integrity is bad.

13. Criminal law ⊂=829(9)—Refusal of correct instructions proper where covered by other instructions given.

In a prosecution for murder, it was not reversible error to refuse an instruction correctly stating the law as to presumption of innocence and burden of proof; such subjects having been fully covered in other instructions given.

14. Criminal law ⊂=805(1)—Defendant not entitled to instructions in any set form of words.

A defendant is not entitled to an instruction in any set form of words, and any form of instruction which fully and fairly presents the point at issue meets the requirements of the statute.

15. Criminal law ⊂=829(1)—Instructions, emphasizing propositions already covered in charge, properly refused.

Proffered instructions, intended simply to emphasize propositions which are covered by the court in his charge to the jury, are properly refused.

16. Homicide ⊂=151(1)—Statute as to burden of proof construed.

Pen. Code, § 1105, as to burden of proof in murder cases, means that, if the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the homicide amounts only to manslaughter, or that it was justifiable or excusable, then no burden is placed on defendant to prove any circumstances of mitigation or that justify or excuse it.

17. Homicide ⊂=300(8)—Instruction that plea of self-defense was unavailable held justified by evidence.

Where, in a murder trial, defendant claimed that deceased had debauched his wife, an instruction that the plea of self-defense was not available to a defendant, who had sought a quarrel with design to force a deadly issue, held justified by the evidence.

18. Criminal law ⊂=763, 764(9)—Instruction to acquit of murder in first or second degrees properly refused.

In a prosecution for murder, it was not error to refuse to instruct to find defendants not guilty of murder in either the first or second degree; testimony of the prosecution, if believed, showing that the killing was unlawful and with malice aforethought, and such question being for the jury.

19. Criminal law ⊂=825(4), 829(14)—Instruction to disregard evidence stricken held unnecessary in view of instructions given and failure to ask more specific charge.

In a prosecution for murder, where defendant's motion to strike all testimony that deceased was unarmed at times other than that of the homicide was granted, it was not error to refuse to specifically instruct the jury to disregard the evidence so stricken, in view of a general charge that the jury should not be influenced by evidence admitted, but afterwards stricken, and where defendant failed to ask for a more specific instruction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Edward Bannon was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

O. N. Hilton, of San Francisco, Dan M. Critchley, of Los Angeles, Caesar A. Roberts, of Denver, Colo., and L. M. Roberts, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. The appellant, Edward Bannon, and his wife, Elizabeth Bannon, were charged with the murder of James H. Brigham, alleged to have been committed on September 10, 1921, at Sawtelle, in Los Angeles county. The two defendants were tried jointly. Elizabeth Bannon was acquitted, but her husband was convicted of murder in the second degree. He appeals from the judgment of conviction, and likewise from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

That Edward Bannon shot and killed Brigham is an undisputed fact; but it is claimed that he shot in self-defense. The record here is very voluminous. We shall not attempt to give more than a bare outline of the case, sufficient, however, to make understandable the points to be discussed. It seems that appellant, a young man about 27 years of age, was employed as a motorman on the Pacific Electric Railway. The deceased, who was about 40 years old and employed as a terminal foreman for the same company, was Bannon's superior. Bannon claims that shortly prior to the tragedy his wife confessed to him that she had been debauched by Brigham, who, it was claimed, had forced his way into the Bannon home during the husband's absence. On the day preceding the homicide Bannon and his wife called on Brigham at the freight office of the company, and there Bannon taxed Brigham with having forced Mrs. Bannon to submit to his unlawful embraces. Brigham ordered the Bannons out of his office. Bannon then told the superintendent and assistant superintendent that Brigham had compelled Mrs. Bannon to have intercourse with him at the latter's home. The superintendent, with a view to investigating the charge, sent word to Brigham to call at his office on the following Saturday, September 10th. Brigham did not call. He was killed on the evening of that day. The homicide took place at 10 o'clock at night, in Sawtelle, at or near the intersection of Santa Monica boulevard with Tenth street, which was about two blocks from the home of the Bannons, who lived on Ohio street near Ninth.

According to the testimony of J. M. Parker, a witness for the people, Brigham, about noon of September 10th, had made an appointment to call that evening on Mr. and Mrs. Parker and bring Mrs. Brigham with him. Parker lived about seven blocks from the scene of the tragedy. Mrs. Brigham, who lived with her husband in Santa Monica on Santa Monica boulevard, testified that she and her husband started to call on the Parkers on the evening of September 10th; that they got off the car at First street, intending to make the call, but that they were late, and for that reason, as well as because it was a beautiful moonlight evening, they concluded not to call on the Parkers, and instead, walked back to where Santa Monica boulevard intersects Ninth street, and there sat on a bench to rest; and that while she and her husband were sitting on the bench, Mr. and Mrs. Bannon drove by in their automobile. It seems that after passing the spot where the Brighams were seated, Bannon and his wife drove to their garage in the rear of their home, a block distant from where Mr. and Mrs. Brigham had been sitting. After putting the automobile in the garage, the Bannons, it would seem, returned to the spot where, a few minutes previously, they had seen the Brighams sitting on the bench. Meanwhile Mr. and Mrs. Brigham had walked one block along Santa Monica boulevard to where that thoroughfare is intersected by Tenth street, the scene of the homicide. Presently the Bannons appeared. What then took place is described variously by the witnesses. Mr. and Mrs. Bannon testified that when they arrived at the intersection of Santa Monica boulevard with Tenth street Brigham stepped out, said "Bannon," and immediately commenced shooting, and that then Bannon, in self-defense, drew his Colt's automatic revolver and returned the fire, killing Brigham.

Mrs. Brigham, testifying as a witness for the people, described the circumstances of the killing of her husband substantially as follows:

> My husband and I got up from the bench on the corner of Ninth and Santa Monica boulevard and walked down the boulevard as far as Tenth street, when the Bannons came up from behind; Bannon calling to Mr. Brigham. As Mr. Brigham turned around in response to the call, Bannon "grabbed a firearm or something from Mrs. Bannon's coat and commenced firing at Mr. Brigham." Before Bannon commenced shooting I heard him say to some one, "Give me them," or, "Give me those." Mr. Bannon was on one side of me, and Mrs. Bannon was on the other. Shots were fired on each side of me. Many shots were fired. I know Bannon fired. Mr. Brigham was unarmed. He was shot in four places, and fell to the ground —"crumpled right down in a heap."

Three revolvers figure in the case, one a Colt's automatic. Bannon admitted using this pistol, and that he fired a number of shots from it. Shortly after the slaying, a 32 caliber, long-barrel, short-cartridge revolver made by the American Revolver Company, was picked up. It was found on the ground on the left side of Brigham's body a foot or 18 inches distant from where the body lay. Later another revolver, a 32 caliber Iver Johnson pistol, was found. It seems that shortly after her arrest, which followed on the heels of the tragedy, Mrs. Bannon, according to witnesses for the prosecution said to an officer at the police station "I am sure Mr. Brigham had a gun, and you will find a gun over the fence, or around the fence where he fell." The officer then went to the place described by Mrs. Bannon, and there found the Iver Johnson revolver, lying aginst the fence near the scene of the killing. It was a five-cylinder pistol, from which three shots had recently been fired, as shown by the empty shells and the smell of recently burned gunpowder. When the officer returned to the police station Mrs. Bannon, according to the testimony of the people's witnesses, exclaimed, in the presence of her husband, "You are safe now, Ed; they found the revolver." Bannon testified that the pistol which was found a foot or 18 inches from Brigham's body—the pistol made by the American Revolver Company—was a weapon which Mrs. Brigham had in her left hand at the time of the shooting and claims that Mrs. Brigham dropped it as she leaned over to pick up her husband's head after the firing had ceased. Appellant also claims that the Iver Johnson pistol—the weapon which was found lying against the fence—was used by the deceased, and that from it Brigham had fired three shots at appellant. Mrs. Brigham, on the other hand, testified positively that her husband was not armed that night, and that he did not fire a shot. It seems to have been the theory of the prosecution that the Iver Johnson pistol and likewise the long-barreled revolver which lay near where Brigham's body fell were "planted" by either Mr. or Mrs. Bannon in order to lay the foundation for the claim that the killing was done in self-defense.

[1] As is usual in such cases there is a sharp conflict in the evidence. And though we have not deemed it necessary to narrate the defendants' description of the circumstances attending this fatal occurrence, appellant's own story undoubtedly exculpates him. It was for the jury, however, to say whether his story should be believed. The testimony of Mrs. Brigham, together with that of other witnesses for the prosecution was sufficient, if true, to justify the verdict. The facts testified to by the witnesses and their significance were for the jury to weigh and determine; and their verdict, having substantial evidence to support it, cannot be disturbed, unless it is vitiated by some erroneous ruling of the court.

It is not contended that the facts related by Mrs. Brigham, if true, would not warrant appellant's conviction, but that her testimony is not to be believed. The truth or falsity of her testimony, however, was exclusively for the determination of the jury and the trial court. The office of a reviewing court in a case such as this is very clearly stated in People v. Emerson, 130 Cal. 562–563, 62 Pac. 1069:

"The principal ground of the appeal is that the verdict is contrary to law and the evidence, and upon this point counsel contend that all the evidence—that introduced by the prosecution no less than the evidence of the defendant himself—shows clearly and without conflict that the killing (which is admitted) was done in necessary self-defense, or at least under circumstances which negative the existence of any deliberate purpose on the part of the defendant to take the life of the person slain. Necessarily, this contention as to the absence of any conflict in the evidence must be made good in order to sustain the appeal upon the ground stated; for if the evidence which bears against the defendant, considered by itself, and without regard to conflicting evidence, is sufficient to support the verdict, the question ceases to be one of law—of which alone this court has jurisdiction—and becomes one of fact upon which the decision of the jury and the trial court is final and conclusive." (Italics ours.)

There was sufficient evidence to justify the verdict, and it, therefore, may not be disturbed by us unless the rulings of the trial court, presently to be considered, disclose prejudicial error.

[2, 3] Appellant complains of the admission in evidence of a passbook taken from the body of the deceased, and which had been perforated by one of the bullets entering the body. Because the killing was not denied, it is claimed that this evidence was not material, and could only serve to prejudice the jury against the defendants. The people rested under the necessity of establishing a tragedy involving the violent death of a human being from mortal wounds, unlawfully inflicted with malice aforethought. Any of the details of such a horrifying affair must necessarily have a tendency to cause a normal person to recoil with repugnance. But, as was said by the Supreme Court of Kansas in State v. Moore, 80 Kan. 232, 102 Pac. 475:

"A court cannot arrange for lively music to keep the jury cheerful while the state's case in a murder trial is being presented, and gruesome evidence cannot be suppressed merely because it may strongly tend to agitate the jury's feelings."

As a general rule, physical objects which constitute a part of the transaction, or which serve to unfold or explain it, may be exhibited in evidence, if properly identified, whenever the transaction is under judicial investigation. Thus, clothing worn by the deceased at the time of the homicide is admissible in evidence as a part of the res gestæ. People v. O'Brien, 78 Cal. 44, 20 Pac. 359. According to the testimony of Mrs. Brigham, she and her husband were flanked by the Bannons—Mrs. Bannon firing from one side and her husband from the other. Mrs. Bannon, who was on trial for the murder, denied having fired a shot. The passbook, therefore, was important as tending to show the course and direction of the bullet that had pierced it. It was not error to admit the book in evidence.

[4-6] Appellant claims to have been prejudiced by the conduct of the district attorney, who offered a photograph of the deceased for the purpose of showing, as he stated, "Brigham's appearance in his lifetime, * * * to allow the jury to see his character from the picture." Defendants' counsel objected to the introduction of the photograph for any such purpose. The objection was very properly, and, we may add, very promptly, sustained. We fail to see how this incident could possibly have prejudiced appellant's case. Subsequently the photograph was admitted in evidence for a legitimate and proper purpose—for the purpose of showing that Brigham was not the man who had purchased the Iver Johnson pistol.

[7] The justice of the peace at Sawtelle, William G. Bryce, a witness for the people, was permitted to testify that Mr. and Mrs. Bannon had called on him at his office two days prior to the homicide; that Bannon, who was very nervous, said that he and his wife had been having trouble, and that he wanted the witness to draw up an agreement of separation or divorce; that there was considerable argument between them as to what grounds they had for divorce, and as to the disposition of their property; that Mrs. Bannon commenced to cry, and said that if her husband left her she would kill herself; that Bannon said he would not live with her any longer; that she had once left him in a hospital in the East and had gone away with another man; that she could not have any children, and that some one had said he had seen another man coming out of his (Bannon's) house early one morning; and that Mrs. Bannon said, "Judge, there is no such person; it is only his imagination." This testimony went in over defendants' strenuous objection. Its admission was not error. It doubtless was received to show the state of mind of the Bannons at the time of the shooting. It tended to bear out the prosecution's contention that Edward Bannon, the husband was enraged by his wife's supposed adultery with Brigham, and, further, that his dominant personality overpowered her volition, and thus prevailed upon her, first to admit her intimacy with Brigham, and then to participate in the homicide two days later. The testimony not only tended to show Bannon's all-consuming jealousy, and thus disclosed a motive on his part for taking the life of Brigham, whom he had charged with having debauched his wife, but, by disclosing Mrs. Bannon's extreme repugnance to being cast off by her husband, it likewise had some tendency to show that she might do her husband's bidding, even to the point of assisting him in the slaying of Brigham. For these reasons, the testimony was both relevant and material.

[8] Appellant next complains of the admission in evidence of the testimony of Sadie Smith, a witness for the prosecution, who testified that her home is a few doors from that of the Bannons; that on the night of September 10th, at about 10 o'clock, she heard an automobile pass by her house and stop; that a few minutes later she heard scuffling in the street about two houses from her home; that she went to her bedroom window, looked out, and saw a man and a woman scuffling in the street, in Ohio street, right across the way; that she saw the man grab something and start to run; that the woman followed him, screaming; that they ran down Ohio street; that she could not identify the man or the woman; and that a few minutes later she heard the shooting. On motion of defendants, the court struck out all of the testimony of this witness on the ground that there was no evidence which identified the man and woman whom she saw scuffling and running in the street. The ruling, however, was immediately reversed, the court being assured by the prosecutor that he later would supply the necessary identification. Subsequently Officer Mahoney was called, and testified that after the shooting he followed the tracks made by defendants' machine, and found that they had stopped nearly in front of Mrs. Smith's house. At the conclusion of the case defendants again moved to strike out the testimony of Sadie Smith. The motion was denied. It was for the jury to consider and weigh all of the circumstances testified to by Sadie Smith and Officer Mahoney. Those circumstances, in conjunction with other facts brought out by the testimony of other witnesses, were sufficient to justify the inference that the man and woman seen by Mrs. Smith were Mr. and Mrs. Bannon, and that Bannon, repelling his wife's vehement objections, with malignancy in his heart and bent on murdering the man whom he supposed had been intimate with his wife, ran to the place where he had seen Mr. and Mrs. Brigham but a few moments previously, intending to shoot down the victim of his jealous rage.

[9] Bannon claimed that about three days prior to the tragedy a workman of the name of Border, a resident of Sawtelle, who seems to have been somewhat of a scandalmonger, related to him certain information from which he (Bannon) suspected that Brigham might have been at his home with Mrs. Bannon during the husband's absence. The prosecution put Border on the witness stand and propounded to him this question:

"Now, did you ever tell Bannon at any time that you saw Brigham coming from Bannon's house? A. No, sir."

Defendant's counsel objected to the question on the ground that it was leading. There was no error here. The matter of the form of the question was within the discretion of the trial court. People v. Fong Ah Sing, 70 Cal. 12, 11 Pac. 323; People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 349, 19 Pac. 161; People v. Nunley, 142 Cal. 445, 76 Pac. 45.

[10] There was no error in the admission of the declarations made by the defendants at the police station while under arrest and shortly after the homicide. The evidence shows that the statements were freely and voluntarily given. There may be some question as to whether they were so far inculpatory as to amount to confessions of guilt. But, be this as it may, the prosecutor, who assumed that the declarations might possibly be construed as confessions, and that therefore it would be necessary to lay a foundation for their admission by proving their voluntary character, asked one of the witnesses if any threats were made against either Mr. or Mrs. Bannon at the time when they made the statements, or if any force or violence was used against either, or if any promises of reward or hopes of immunity were held out to them. To this form of question counsel for defendants objected, upon the ground that it called for the conclusion of the witness. The court overruled the objection, and told counsel for the defendants that they would be accorded the privilege of cross-examining the witness with respect to the voluntary character of the statements. There was no error in the ruling. People v. Rodundo, 44 Cal. 538, 540; People v. Goldenson, supra, 76 Cal. 350, 19 Pac. 161; Crain v. State, 166 Ala. 1, 52 South. 31. In Crain v. State the court said:

"In the laying of a predicate for the introduction of evidence of confessions made by the defendant, the question, 'Were there any promises, threats or inducements made to the defendant before the statements were made by him?' is not open to the objection that it called for a conclusion of the witness, and was properly allowed by the court."

[11] Mrs. Brigham, it will be recalled, testified that her husband had no weapon upon his person on the evening of the slaying. Whether, therefore, the Iver Johnson revolver—the pistol which was found leaning against the fence—was the property of the deceased or of one of the defendants was a material fact in the case. As we have had occasion to say, it evidently was the theory of the prosecution that the defendants, or one of them, for the purpose of fabricating a counterfeit setting for a plea of self-defense, "planted" the Iver Johnson pistol and likewise the 32 caliber long-barreled revolver which was picked up near the spot where Brigham fell. The man who sold the Iver Johnson revolver testified that it was sold about 20 months prior to the homicide. An employee who was present when the pistol was sold testified that it was purchased by a man who stated his address and gave his name as "C. M. Johnson." Another witness testified that he had gone to the address given by "C. M. Johnson" and had found it to be fictitious. To show that the slain man had not purchased the revolver under the false name of "C. M. Johnson," the prosecutor, over defendants' objection, called a handwriting expert, who testified that he had compared the signature of James H. Brigham with the signature "C. M. Johnson," signed to the record of the sale of the revolver, and that in his opinion the two signatures were not made by the same person. Appellant contends that this evidence of the handwriting expert was immaterial, and tended to confuse the issues. There is no merit in the objection. When the Iver Johnson pistol was found three shots appeared to have been recently fired from it. It was essential to the people's case, therefore, to show, if possible, that Brigham was not the owner of this revolver. To do that it was proper to show that Brigham had not signed the name "C. M. Johnson," given by the purchaser when the revolver was sold.

[12] Appellant took the witness stand in the court below and gave testimony in his own behalf. On rebuttal the prosecutor called witnesses who were permitted to testify, over defendants' objection, that they knew appellant's general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community in which he lived, and that it was bad. Appellant, contending that this ruling was erroneous, has cited us to 16 Corpus Juris, p. 580, § 1122, but he evidently has confounded the rule respecting the impeachment of an accused, as an accused, with the rule respecting the impeachment of an accused as a witness. From a very early date it has been held, time and again, that when the defendant in a criminal case testifies for himself and gives testimony to exonerate him from the crime for which he is on trial, he, for the time being, removes from himself the character of a defendant, and takes on that of a witness. He becomes "subject to the same rules for testing his credibility before the jury, by impeachment or otherwise, as any other witness," and may be impeached by testimony that his general reputation in the community for truth, honesty, and integrity is bad. People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 80, 45 Pac. 175; People v. Arnold, 116 Cal. 687, 48 Pac. 803,

[13] Finally, it is claimed that the court erred in giving, and likewise in refusing, certain instructions. It is strenuously insisted that the court erred in refusing a proffered instruction on the presumption of innocence and the burden of proof. The instruction correctly states the law, and might well have been given; but this is far from saying that the refusal to give it constitutes reversible error. The court fully and fairly instructed the jury in general terms on these subjects, and to more than that appellant is not entitled. Among other charges, the court gave the following:

"A defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved. This presumption of innocence attaches at every state of the case and to every fact essential to conviction, and goes with you in all your deliberations as jurors, in arriving at your verdict. And in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal. * * * The defendants have pleaded that they are not guilty, and you are instructed that such plea puts in issue every material allegation of the information, and casts on the state the burden of proving every essential fact constituting the crime charged, to your satisfaction, and to the satisfaction of each juror, beyond a reasonable doubt."

[14, 15] A defendant is not entitled to an instruction in any set form of words. Any form of instruction which fully and fairly presents the point at issue meets the requirements of the statute. Proffered instructions, intended simply to emphasize propositions which are covered by the court in its charge to the jury, are properly refused.

[16] Defendants proposed, and the court refused, an instruction charging the jury that if they should find from the evidence on the part of the people that the crime amounts only to manslaughter, or was "justifiable or excusable," then "no burden is placed on the defendant to prove to you, by testimony on his part, any of the circumstances that excuse him." Though refusing to give an instruction in this particular form, the court did, nevertheless, charge the jury upon this subject in an instruction which fully and fairly presented the law. This the court did by charging the jury, in the language of section 1105 of the Penal Code, that—

"Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it [as defined by instructions heretofore given] devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." (Italics ours.)

It is clear that the meaning of section 1105 is this: If the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the homicide amounts only to manslaughter, or that it was justifiable or excusable, then no burden is placed on the defendant to prove any circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it. That, therefore, is what the court, in effect, told the jury when it gave an instruction substantially in the language of this Code section. The instruction presented by the defendants but stated the same rule of law in a somewhat different form. It could not have thrown any more light upon the question than that which was furnished by the instruction which was given.

[17] The court charged the jury that the plea of self-defense is not available to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with the design to force a deadly issue, and thus, through contrivance or fault, has created a real or apparent necessity for the killing. Counsel concede the unimpeachableness of the instruction as an abstract statement of the law, but claim that it is not pertinent to any theory based upon the evidence. In this they are in error. Facts testified to by Mrs. Brigham, if true—and the jury evidently accepted her version—justified the jury in inferring a situation which warranted the court in giving this instruction.

[18] There is no merit in the claim that the court erred in refusing to advise the jury to find the defendants not guilty of murder in either the first or second degree. Counsel's argument in support of this claim, like much of the argument advanced in support of other points made in appellant's behalf, is based upon the untenable assumption that truth, and only truth, came from the lips of the witnesses for the defense, and that the testimony given by Mrs. Brigham and other witnesses for the prosecution is "false as dicers' oaths." That the truth or falsity of the testimony of any witness rests exclusively with the jury, and with the trial court on motion for a new trial, is a proposition too firmly founded in our jurisprudence to necessitate the citation of authority. The jurors, as was their right, regarded Mrs. Brigham's testimony as credible. They evidently accepted her account of the circumstances attending the killing of her husband. The facts as testified to by her show, without doubt, that the killing was unlawful and with malice aforethought.

[19] Witnesses for the prosecution testified that Brigham never had a "gun" prior to the killing. At the conclusion of the evidence defendant's counsel moved to strike out all testimony that the deceased was unarmed at times other than at the time of the homicide. The motion was granted. Notwithstanding the motion was granted in the presence of the jury, appellant now insists that there should have been a specific instruction to disregard the evidence so stricken from the record. The court did charge the jury in general terms that it "should not consider nor be influenced * * * by evidence admitted but afterwards upon further consideration by the court stricken out." By this general instruction the jury was charged, in unmistakable language, that it was not to consider any evidence which, after being admitted, was stricken out. There was nothing ambiguous about the instruction. If counsel for defendants desired a more specific charge upon the point they should have asked it; failing to do so, the responsibility rests with them.

There are no other points worthy of mention. A careful consideration of the record satisfies us that the trial of appellant was in all respects fair and free from any substantial error, and that the verdict was fully justified by the evidence.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: WORKS, J.; CRAIG, J.

59 Cal. App. 69

PEOPLE v. MERCADO. (Cr. No. 890.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 7, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1159(2) — Appellate court will not weigh testimony where sufficient for jury.

The appellate court will not weigh testimony of witnesses where there is sufficient evidence, if believed by the jury, to justify a verdict.

2. Receiving stolen goods ⟸8(3) — Evidence held to support conviction.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, evidence held to support conviction.

3. Receiving stolen goods ⟸3, 9(1)—Guilty knowledge that goods were stolen need not be actual and is a jury question.

While guilty knowledge of the larceny is an essential fact to be proved in a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, such knowledge need not be that actual and positive knowledge which is acquired from personal observation of the fact and is a question for the jury.

4. Criminal law ⟸878(2)—Verdict of guilty as charged in second count sufficient though not describing offense; "stated."

Pen. Code, § 954, declares that if an information charges two or more offenses, under separate counts, defendant may be convicted of any number of offenses charged, and each offense on which defendant is convicted must be "stated" in the verdict, and where a verdict found defendant not guilty on a first count and "guilty as charged in the second count," it was not objectionable in that it only referred to the count without describing the offense and as failing to meet the definition of "stated" as used in the Code, "state" meaning "to aver; allege; declare as a matter of fact."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Stated.]

5. Criminal law ⊜875(1)—Form of verdict immaterial if intention to convict of crime charged is expressed.

The form of a verdict is to be regarded as immaterial, provided the intention to convict of the crime charged is unmistakably expressed.

6. Witnesses ⊜242—Permitting state to refresh witness' memory from transcript of his testimony not error.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, where, to refresh the memory of a state witness, the state was permitted to read from a transcript of testimony previously given by the witness, there was no error.

7. Criminal law ⊜1144(12)—All intendments in favor of regularity of proceedings in lower court.

All intendments are in favor of the regularity of proceedings in the lower court, and in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it is the duty to assume on appeal that a transcript of testimony previously given by a witness, used to refresh the witness' memory at a subsequent trial, was an official transcript of the witness' previous testimony, as is contemplated by Pen. Code, § 869.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Joe Mercado was convicted of receiving stolen goods, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. The appellant, Joe Mercado, and his codefendants Gillermo Juardo and Ed Fifer were charged, in an information filed by the district attorney of San Diego county, with the crime of burglary (charged in the first count), and likewise with the crime of receiving stolen goods (charged in the second count). The record does not show whether Juardo ever was tried. Fifer and appellant were tried jointly. At the conclusion of the trial of these two the charges against Fifer were dismissed upon motion of the district attorney, on the ground that, as to him, the evidence was insufficient. The jury acquitted appellant of the charge of burglary, but found him guilty of receiving stolen goods. Judgment was entered accordingly, and Mercado now appeals therefrom and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. He contends: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to support that part of the verdict which finds him guilty of receiving stolen goods; (2) that, in the form in which it was returned by the jury, the verdict is contrary to law; and (3) that the court erred in permitting the district attorney to refresh the memory of one of the people's witnesses by reading from a transcript of testimony previously given by him.

[1] It is conceded that the evidence is sufficient to sustain a finding that the goods were stolen, that appellant received them, and that he disposed of a part of them for his personal gain; but it is claimed that it is insufficient to show that appellant knew, at the time when he received them, that the goods had been stolen. This court, as we often have said, will not weigh the testimony of witnesses where there is sufficient evidence, if believed by the jury, to justify the verdict. We will reverse a judgment on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence only when, giving full credence to all the inculpatory evidence, it falls short of that which the law requires. In view of this well-settled rule, we think there was ample evidence to justify the conviction.

[2, 3] The testimony leaves absolutely no doubt that on November 23, 1921, the dwelling of one Frank B. Stillson, in the city of San Diego, was burglarized and there was stolen therefrom a number of articles, including a suit of clothes, a pair of shoes, a pair of clippers such as are used by barbers, a razor, a pair of opera glasses, cuff links, and a fountain pen.

Upon the question of appellant's guilty knowledge, we have the following: Theodoro Martinez, a barber, testified that in the latter part of November, 1921—he could not remember the precise date—appellant came into his barber shop and sold him a pair of clippers, a pair of opera glasses and a fountain pen—all for the sum of $2.75. The articles were identified as those which previously had been stolen from the Stillson home. This witness further testified that, at a previous trial of appellant for this same offense, the latter told the witness that the man who actually stole the articles (presumably the defendant Juardo) had already been sent to state's prison and requested the witness, when he should be placed upon the stand by the prosecution, to deny that he knew appellant. Another witness, H. Kahn, the keeper of a secondhand clothing store, testified that on November 23, 1921, at 11:20 o'clock a. m., appellant came into his store and sold him a pair of shoes for $3.50. The shoes were identified as a part of the stolen goods. Stillson had left his home that morning at about 10 or 10:30 o'clock, which was prior to the burglary. Appellant, therefore, must have sold the shoes to Kahn within less than a hour and a half after they were stolen. Kahn further testified that, pursuant to the requirements of an ordinance of the city of San Diego, he had caused appellant, as the vendor of secondhand goods, to sign a receipt for the price which the witness paid him for the shoes, and that appellant signed the fictitious name "Antonio Moreno," and gave as his address the "Santa Rosa Hotel." In justice to appellant it should be stated that at the trial he claimed that he had sold the shoes for a man of the name of Antonio Moreno. The jury, however, evidently did not believe his story.

J. L. Berg, a detective on the San Diego police force, testified that on November 24, 1921, appellant told him that he had obtained the shoes from a Mexican who had slept with him at the Frey Hotel the night before the sale of the shoes and that this Mexican had asked him to sell them. But appellant, according to this witness, did not know the name of the Mexican who, he claimed, had asked him to sell the shoes. Berg further testified that when he made the arrest on November 24th he took from appellant's pocket a pass-key, and that appellant told him that he (appellant) had loaned the key to Juardo. Berg also testified that appellant told him that Juardo had borrowed the key for the purpose of entering the Stillson dwelling. The witness further stated that he found in appellant's room at the Frey Hotel some clothing, a heavy overcoat and the very razor which was identified by Stillson as that which had been stolen from his home; also that appellant claimed not to know anything about the razor. It also is in evidence that shortly after appellant's arrest he told Berg that the clippers which he had sold to Martinez were received by him from Juardo, who, it seems, was an ex-convict, and that, though he had not participated in the burglary, he (appellant) was of the opinion "that Juardo had committed the burglary—got the stuff out of the house." It also appears from the testimony of witnesses for the prosecution that appellant, with Juardo and Fifer, was noticed near the scene of the burglary shortly prior thereto.

While guilty knowledge of the larceny is an essential fact to be proved in a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, such knowledge need not be that actual and positive knowledge which is acquired from personal observation of the fact. In People v. Clausen, 120 Cal. 381, 52 Pac. 658, our Supreme Court quoted approvingly from Wharton's Criminal Law as follows:

"Whether the defendant knew that the goods were stolen is to be determined by all the facts of the case. It is not necessary that he should have heard the facts from eyewitnesses. He is required to use the circumspection usual with persons taking goods by private purchase; and this is eminently the case with dealers buying at greatly depreciated rates. That which a man in the defendant's position ought to have suspected he must be regarded as having suspected, as far as was necessary to put him on guard and on his inquiries. * * * The proof in any case is to be inferential, and among the inferences prominent are inadequacy of price, irresponsibility of vendor or depositor."

To the same effect see Cobb v. State, 76 Ga. 664, in which the court says:

"Knowledge may well be deduced from conduct and behavior, the character of the person from whom received, and the kind of goods, and the hour when received."

See, also, Huggins v. People, 135 Ill. 243, 25 N. E. 1002, 25 Am. St. Rep. 357; Frank v. State, 67 Miss. 125, 6 South. 842; Hester v. State, 103 Ala, 83, 15 South. 857; People v. Schooley, 149 N. Y. 99, 43 N. E. 536; Commonwealth v. Finn, 108 Mass. 466; and State v. Richmond, 186 Mo. 71, 84 S. W. 880.

In view of this array of authority as to the quantum of evidence sufficient to support a verdict on a charge of receiving stolen goods knowing them to be stolen, we think the jury was justified in finding appellant guilty. The fact that he gave a fictitious name and an incorrect address when he sold the shoes to the secondhand clothing dealer; that he told the arresting officer, not long after the burglary, that it was his opinion that Juardo (an ex-convict) had stolen the goods, and that he had loaned the pass key to Juardo, who, he said, had obtained it for the purpose of entering the house; that he, together with Juardo and Fifer, was observed near the scene of the burglary; that the stolen goods not disposed of were found in appellant's room; and that appellant had asked Martinez, the barber, not to identify him—all these are concurring circumstances which furnish evidence to support the inference that appellant had knowledge that the goods had been stolen. It was a question of fact for the jury, whose province it was to draw the inference of guilty knowledge from the incriminating circumstances.

[4] The next point is based upon a supposed defect in the form of the verdict, which was as follows:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant, Joe Mercado, not guilty of burglary in the second degree as charged in the first count of the information, and guilty as charged in the second count of the information."

Appellant's argument against the sufficiency of this verdict, as a conviction of the crime of receiving stolen goods, is made to turn upon the meaning of the word "stated" as used in section 954 of the Penal Code, wherein it is declared that if the information charges two or more different offenses, under separate counts, the defendant may be convicted of any number of the offenses charged, and that "each offense upon which the defendant is convicted must be stated in the verdict." Because the verb "state" is defined by Webster as meaning "to represent fully in words; to set down in detail," it is claimed that a verdict which merely refers to a count in the information, without further description of the offense, fails to meet the definition of the word "stated" as used by the Legislature. The argument lacks force. Even according to Webster's definition, the verb "state" does not always mean detail. It may mean to set down in gross. See City of Utica v. Richardson, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 300, where it was held that an act which makes it lawful for a pleader to "state" the section of an ordinance means that it shall be lawful merely to "refer" to the section by its number. As used in legal phraseology, the verb "state," according to the Standard Dictionary, means "to aver; allege; declare as a matter of fact."

[5] The form of a verdict is to be regarded as immaterial, provided the intention to convict of the crime charged is unmistakably expressed. People v. McCarty, 48 Cal. 559; People v. Swenson, 49 Cal. 390, 391; People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 448, 50 Pac. 675; Pen. Code, § 1404. It should be construed in connection with the information and the plea of the defendant. People v. Tilley, 135 Cal. 62, 67 Pac. 42. If this verdict be construed in connection with the information and appellant's plea thereto, it is clear that the offense upon which he was convicted is "stated" in the verdict. By finding him guilty "as charged in the second count of the information," the verdict, in effect, finds appellant guilty of the crime of receiving stolen goods—the only crime that is alleged in the second count.

[6] There is no merit in the claim that the court erred in permitting the district attorney to refresh the memory of one of the people's witnesses by reading from a transcript of his testimony. When Berg, the detective, was on the witness stand, he testified that he had been told by appellant that Juardo had asked him for the pass-key and that he (appellant) had given it to Juardo. The witness then was asked by the prosecutor if appellant had stated where he and Juardo were when the latter asked for the pass-key. The witness replied that as to that he was not sure. Thereupon the prosecutor, for the purpose, as he said, of refreshing the witness' recollection. was permitted to read from a transcript of testimony previously given by the witness. Defendant objected to such use of the transcript on the ground that it was not a proper method of refreshing the memory of a witness. The objection was overruled. There was no error in the ruling. As was said in the Durrant Case, 116 Cal. 213, 48 Pac. 84:

"The witness would have had the undoubted right to read his testimony given upon the examination for the purpose of refreshing his memory. Code Civ. Proc. § 2047. Such a transcript may at least be regarded as a private memorandum. Reid v. Reid, 73 Cal. 206. When a witness called by a party fails to testify to matters previously within his recollection, or gives evidence in apparent variance with that formerly given, it is not incumbent upon the party producing the witness to wait for the assaults of the cross-examination to expose seeming inconsistencies and discrepancies. While he may not impeach his witness (saving under certain exceptional circumstances), he may with propriety refresh his recollection, to the end that the witness and his present evidence may both be put fairly and in their proper light before the jury."

To the same effect are People v. McFarlane, 138 Cal. 487, 71 Pac. 568, 72 Pac. 48, 61 L. R. A. 245, and People v. Izlar, 8 Cal. App. 602, 97 Pac. 685.

[7] There is no force in the suggestion that the document from which the district attorney read may not have been an official transcript of the testimony that had been given by the witness at the preliminary examination. In making his objection to the use of the transcript for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the witness, defendants' counsel did not suggest that the document was not an official transcript. Nor is there anything in the record here tending to show that it was not such a duly authenticated transcript as is contemplated by section 869 of the Penal Code. All intendments are in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of the lower court. Error is never presumed; and in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it is our duty to assume, what is altogether probable, that the transcript used to refresh the memory of the witness was a duly authenticated official transcript of the witness' previous testimony.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

DIAMOND v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 10046.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 16, 1922. Rehearing Denied Nov. 14, 1922.)

1. New trial ⟸1—Grantable only on statutory grounds and not for death of shorthand reporter; "irregularity in proceedings of the court."

New trial is grantable only for a ground enumerated in Code Civ. Proc. § 657, and so not for death of the shorthand reporter, preventing the obtaining of a transcript of his notes for appeal; this not being an "irregularity in the proceedings of the court," which relates to matters occurring during the trial, and not after it.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Irregularity.]

2. New trial ⟸5—In view of other method than by transcript of preparing record on appeal, new trial for death of official stenographer not justified.

Even if new trial, because of death of the official stenographer preventing the obtaining of a transcript for appeal, could be granted, though it is not a statutory ground, it would not be justified, there being other method than by such transcript of preparing record on appeal.

3. Certiorari ⟸5(1)—No remedy by appeal to review granting of new trial in court case.

Since amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 963, by St. 1915, p. 209, appeal is not allowable from order granting new trial in an action tried by the court, so that certiorari to review the order may not be refused on the ground of remedy by appeal.

On Petition for Rehearing.

4. Certiorari ⊜28(2)—Lies to review granting of new trial for nonstatutory ground.

The court, in granting new trial solely for a cause not designated in the statute as shown by its order, acts without and in excess of its jurisdiction and beyond the scope of its power, so that certiorari lies.

In Bank.

Original certiorari proceedings by E. F. Diamond, administrator of John H. Diamond, deceased, against the Superior Court of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, James M. Trout, Judge, to annul an order. Order annulled.

Charles J. Heggerty, Knight & Heggerty, and Wm. M. Madden, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

E. T. Cooper, and H. K. Eells, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Petitioner applies for a writ of certiorari to annul an order of the superior court granting a new trial, or, in the alternative, for a writ of mandate requiring the trial court to vacate such order. In an action wherein E. F. Diamond, as administrator, the petitioner here, was plaintiff, and Edward H. Geib was the defendant, the court sitting without a jury, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. Thereafter defendant filed his notice of appeal under the alternative method, and duly demanded a transcript of the evidence and proceedings. He also served and filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial, the notice setting forth all the statutory grounds, specifying many particulars wherein the decision was against law, many alleged errors of law occurring at the trial, and, in addition thereto, as ground for such new trial, the death of the court reporter and the defendant's inability to secure any record of the evidence or proceedings. In support of the last ground, affidavits were filed, showing that the reporter had died about 18 months previously, without transcribing the testimony, and that no one else could read his notes. These facts were known to the defendant before he took any steps toward a new trial or appeal, and it seems that he made no effort to prepare or have settled a bill of exceptions. In due time the court granted the motion. The order for a new trial, which is the matter here under review, is in the following language:

"In the above cause, the motion of the defendant Geib for a new trial, upon the following grounds, to wit: that he was prevented from having a fair trial because of irregularity in the proceedings of the court, irregularity in the proceedings of the adverse party, orders of the court, abuse of discretion by the court, and upon the grounds of accident, surprise, newly discovered evidence, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, that the decision is against law, and errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by defendant, is hereby denied; and that the said motion for a new trial is hereby granted solely and only upon the ground that the court stenographer, who took the testimony, died before the judgment and decision, and it is impossible to have the testimony transcribed, and that his notes cannot be read or transcribed."

[1] In seeking to have the order annulled, petitioner contends that the jurisdiction of the court to grant a new trial is limited strictly to the grounds therefor, specified in the statute, and as the respondent denied the motion as to all those grounds, and granted it solely upon a ground not so specified, its action in so doing was in excess of its jurisdiction.

The question presented by the application has never before been considered by this court. Respondent relies on a decision of the District Court of Appeal, holding that where a party desiring to appeal was unable to procure a transcript of the evidence, owing to the loss of the reporter's notes, a motion for a new trial should be granted. Snell v. Neilson, 194 Pac. 530. The court in that case advanced no statutory authority for its opinion, and relied solely upon decisions from other jurisdictions, to the effect that, under such circumstances, not to grant a new trial would work an injustice to a party through no fault of his own. A hearing in this court was not petitioned for after the decision in the district court, and the ruling has stood unchallenged until the present time. We have carefully considered the opinion referred to, and have examined many of the cases cited by the court. From such consideration and examination, in the light of the enactments of the Legislature of this state, as construed by this court, we are satisfied that Snell v. Neilson, supra, should not be considered an authority on this point. It is a distinct departure from the general understanding of appellate procedure which prevails in this state, to the effect that when a party has failed to preserve his exceptions by a bill of exceptions, transcript of the evidence, or other statutory method, the motion for a new trial will be denied or the appeal dismissed.

The authorities are not agreed on the question. From the cases cited in Snell v. Neilson, many of which are considered in Richardson v. State, 15 Wyo. 465, 89 Pac. 1027, and in the note to that case found in 12 Ann. Cas. 1056, all from other jurisdictions, there seems to be a divergence of opinion on the question. According to many of the decisions, the rule, as announced in the above case, is that where a party has lost the benefit of his exceptions from causes beyond his control, a new trial is properly awarded. We have not examined all of the decisions which appear to support that rule. Some of them appear to be based upon the fact that in the instance there considered, the complaining party was absolutely precluded from presenting the merits of his contention to the appellate tribunal otherwise than through the medium of the particular record he alleged himself unable to furnish. Others rest upon the circumstance that the statutes in those jurisdictions do not define the causes for which a new trial may be granted, thereby permitting a freedom of interpretation as to what is cause for a new trial. Still others depend upon the fact that the appellate courts in such jurisdictions have independent powers to grant new trials. The Supreme Court of Connecticut, which had occasion to examine this question, upon the appeal of a party deprived of the opportunity to present a bill of exceptions because of the death of the judge who tried the case, refused to follow the rule announced in these decisions, and concisely expressed our own view as to their weight, saying:

"Rulings in other jurisdictions, to which our attention has been called as applicable to the case before us, are so generally based upon statutory regulations or rules of court in regard to appeals and new trials different from our own, as to be of little weight as authorities under our laws and practice." Etchells v. Wainwright, 76 Conn. 534, 541, 57 Atl. 121, 124.

The doctrine announced in Snell v. Neilson, supra, and followed by respondent has never prevailed in this state. The rule has always been that the right to move for a new trial is statutory and must be pursued in the method pointed out by the statute. California Imp. Co. v. Baroteau, 116 Cal. 136, 138, 47 Pac. 1018; Simpson v. Budd, 91 Cal. 488, 491, 27 Pac. 758; Burton v. Todd, 68 Cal. 485, 9 Pac. 663. Soon after this court was created it held that the loss of instructions given by the court to the jury was not a ground for a new trial. Visher v. Webster, 13 Cal. 58, 61. In another early case it said that the power to grant a new trial, and the mode of its exercise, are dependent mainly, if not entirely, upon the statute, in both civil and criminal actions, and that the grounds upon which it may be obtained, and the manner of applying for and procuring it, are therein prescribed. Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449, 455. It has frequently pointed out that certain causes relied upon by appellants are not statutory grounds for a new trial. Kepfler v. Kepfler, 134 Cal. 205, 206, 66 Pac. 208; McGuire v. Drew, 83 Cal. 225, 228, 23 Pac. 312; Benjamin v. Stewart, 61 Cal. 605, 608. In another case it is held:

"That the provisions of the Code do define the powers of the court in granting a new trial, and limit the exercise of those powers, we entertain no doubt." Townley v. Adams, 118 Cal. 382, 383, 50 Pac. 550, 551.

In considering appeals from orders granting or denying motions for a new trial, when such appeals were permissible, this court held that it would consider only such matters as were made grounds upon which the superior court is authorized to grant or deny the motion. Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 384, 80 Pac. 234; Crescent, etc., Co. v. United Upholsterers, 153 Cal. 433, 434, 95 Pac. 871.

The Legislature has recognized and passed laws in accord with this construction of the law. Realizing that new trials could only be granted in this state on statutory grounds, and that a serious situation was thereby presented in many cases pending in court at the time of the fire in San Francisco in 1906, it enacted a statute providing that when any proposed bill of exceptions, or statement of the case on motion for a new trial, was "lost or destroyed by reason of conflagration or other public calamity," and no other record of the proceedings upon the trial could be obtained, the court might grant a new trial if at the time of such loss or destruction the motion was pending. Stats. 1907, p. 998. The statute was held by this court to operate retroactively, and to be applicable only to conditions existing at the time of its passage. Bassford v. Earl, 172 Cal. 653, 657, 158 Pac. 124.

The causes for which a new trial may be granted, in this state, are enumerated in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The inability of a party to present a bill of exceptions, or a transcript of the evidence, by reason of the death of the shorthand reporter, or for any cause, is not one of them. The grounds of "irregularity in the proceedings of the court," upon which the court is authorized to grant the motion clearly relate to matters occurring during the trial, and not after it. It is intended to refer to matters which an appellant cannot fully present by exceptions taken during the trial. Woods v. Jensen, 130 Cal. 200, 205, 62 Pac. 473; Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 150, 78 Pac. 540. That an aggrieved party has, by the death of the stenographer who reported the case, been prevented from obtaining a transcript of the proceedings, and testimony taken, perparatory for a motion or for an appeal, is not a matter occurring during the trial. The causes for which new trials may be granted, described in the section, are only such as show that the parties did not have a fair and full hearing at the first trial.

[2] For another reason the order of the trial court was without justification. All of the cases we have examined which support the rule relied on by respondent rest fundamentally upon the ground that the appealing party has lost the benefit of regularly taken or allowed exceptions through no fault or negligence of his own. In this case the aggrieved party was not deprived of his remedy looking to an appeal by the death of the shorthand reporter, and the inability to secure a transcript of his notes. He did not thereby lose the right to present his case to the appellate court. There are two methods of taking an appeal in this state, either one of which was available. The defendant, not being able to secure the reporter's transcript, could have prepared from memory, and such notes and data as he had, a proposed bill of exceptions to be used on the motion for a new trial or on the appeal. It would then have been incumbent upon the plaintiff to present such amendments as he saw fit. The proposed bill and the amendments having been presented to the court within due time, it would have become the duty of the court to settle the bill. In view of the long delay between the trial and decision this procedure might have been vexatious and inexpedient, but the fact remains that such course was open to the defendant. The only result of the inability to obtain a transcript of the stenographer was to give the parties a little more trouble in preparing the case for the motion or for an appeal. To set aside a judgment on such grounds would be an act of great injustice to the petitioner. Lidgerwood Manufacturing Co. v. Rogers (Super. Ct.) 4 N. Y. Supp. 716, 717. While the law contemplates that either party may have the stenographer transcribe his shorthand notes, it does not contemplate that such is the only method of preparing a record on appeal. Butts v. Anderson, 19 Okl. 367, 372, 91 Pac. 906.

There may be an occasional hardship in denying a new trial in cases such as this. An injustice might easily be worked if the rule were otherwise. Every presumption is in favor of the fairness, impartiality, and regularity of the proceedings of the trial court, which led to the judgment and in denying the motion for a new trial on the grounds enumerated in the statute. The party in whose favor the judgment was rendered, and who successfully resisted the motion for a new trial would, on an appeal, be entitled to the benefit of those presumptions. To permit the application of the rule contended for by the respondent would be to deprive such party of his judgment, and the intendments in its support, and to force him to reestablish his claim, because, it is asserted his adversary has been, without his own fault, deprived of the means of pointing out errors which are said to have been committed on the former trial. Alley v. McCabe, 147 Ill. 410, 415, 35 N. E. 615. The precise question was presented to the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. It was asked to remand certain cases for a new trial for the reason that the death of the official court stenographer, before he had transcribed his notes of the evidence, prevented a presentation of the record. The court said:

"If we set aside these verdicts as urged, what do we decide? Not that they were wrong, but that they were possibly wrong, and that we can never know certainly whether they were wrong or right. The statute has not vested us with authority to make such a decision. The presumption that a verdict is right until shown to be wrong should protect it at least, until the defeated party brings himself within the statute. That he cannot bring himself within the statute is the party's misfortune, and it may be to his injury. But, however grievous it may seem to him, we think the statute has not confided to us the power to relieve him from his misfortune, any more than it has in other instances to relieve litigants of their many other misfortunes. The statute might have done so. The statutes do provide expressly in many cases for relief when parties have lost their rights by accident or mistake. In other instances parties are left to suffer the chances of litigious war, and the hardships, if any, must be borne by those upon whom they accidentally fall." Stenographer Cases (Morin v. Claflin, and other cases) 100 Me. 271, 276, 61 Atl. 782, 784.

[3] Respondent resists this application upon the ground that jurisdiction to entertain and dispose of motions for new trials is vested in the superior court, and that therefore certiorari will not lie, the remedy of the aggrieved party being by an appeal from the order. It relies upon a number of cases so holding, but those decisions are no longer authority on the precise point which arises here. Since the amendment to section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1915, p. 209) an appeal is no longer allowed from an order granting a new trial in an action tried by the court. The respondent had jurisdiction to determine the motion for a new trial, but the exercise of its power to grant the motion was limited to the grounds specified in the statute. When it granted the new trial for a cause not so designated it acted without and in excess of its jurisdiction, and beyond the scope of its power. Under such circumstances certiorari will lie. Estate of Paulsen, 179 Cal. 528, 529, 178 Pac. 143.

The order granting a new trial is annulled.

We concur:

WILBUR, Acting C. J.; LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.; RICHARDS, Justice pro tem.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] It is ordered that the following passage be added to the opinion:

If the order granting the new trial had not shown on its face that it was denied on all the grounds mentioned in the notice of intention, and that it was granted solely on the ground that the court stenographer who took the testimony had died before the judgment and decision, the court would have had jurisdiction to grant the new trial. But since it did show that it was granted solely on a ground not covered by the statute, the court was acting beyond its jurisdiction. It is only for this reason that certiorari will lie.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

LEVY v. KAHN. (Civ. 4298.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 20, 1922.)

Sales ⇐340—On buyer refusing tender, seller may resell and recover difference between market value and contract price.

Though title passed to buyer on his refusal of tender of the property by seller, who had fully performed his contract, so that Civ. Code, § 3310, fixing contract price as the measure of damages, applied if the seller chose to sue for the contract price, yet where the seller resold the property without notice to buyer, he could recover the contract price less the market value at time and place for delivery, either on the theory of the contract's being executory, under sections 3311 and 3353, or on the theory of seller's liability for conversion, that is, for the market price, set off against buyer's liability for the contract price under section 3310.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Louis L. Levy against Carrie L. Kahn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward Myers, Frank E. Powers, and Frank J. Hennessy, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment upon several causes of action for damages for the breach of several executory contracts for the purchase of personal property. Prior to the time when delivery was had under the contracts the defendant repudiated each and all of the contracts. Within due time plaintiff made a valid tender of all the property sold, and the defendant refused to accept delivery, denying all liability under the contract. Thereafter, and without notice to the defendant, the plaintiff resold the property at private sale. In each cause of action the plaintiff pleaded the execution of the contract, performance on the part of plaintiff, the tender and defendant's refusal to accept delivery thereof, the market value of the property at the time and place when and where delivery should have been made, and the difference between its market value and the contract price, for which sum plaintiff prayed and recovered judgment.

On this appeal the defendant urges that because of the tender made by the vendor title actually passed to the vendee. From this it is argued that plaintiff's measure of damages is the contract price in accordance with the provisions of section 3310, Civil Code.

A similar case was presented in Phillips v. Stark, 186 Cal. 369, 199 Pac. 509, and what was said there controls the decision in the case at bar. In the Phillips Case, as here, the defendants, after tender and part payment, repudiated an executory contract of sale. The plaintiff sold the property at public auction without notice to the defendants. Thereafter plaintiff sued to recover the difference between the contract price and the amount realized on the auction sale. It was held that the title had passed to the defendants, and that section 3310, Civil Code, applied for the purpose of fixing the measure of damages, but that it had no application for the purpose of fixing plaintiff's remedy. It was also held that section 3310, Civil Code, in fixing the measure of damages as the full contract price where title had vested in the vendee, did so on the assumption that because the title had passed the vendor had nothing but his claim against the vendee without any offsets.

"But where, as here, although the title has passed, the vendor still retains the property, the value of the property must be offset against the purchase price. The vendor may not have both the full purchase price and the property. It is quite immaterial in the present case upon what theory this is worked out, whether upon that suggested by us, that, by repudiating the contract and thrusting the property back on the plaintiff, the defendants put him in the situation of a vendor under an executory contract, in which case the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the property (Civ. Code, §§ 3311, 3353), or upon that suggested by Bennett v. Potter, that the vendee is responsible for the full purchase price under section 3310 of the Civil Code, but the vendor is liable to the vendee in damages for a conversion. The result is the same in either case, since the measure of damages for a conversion is the market value of the property. Civ. Code, § 3337." 186 Cal. 374, 375, 199 Pac. 512.

Judgment affirmed.

ALLEN v. SAN FRANCISCO WHOLESALE DAIRY PRODUCE EXCH. (Civ. 4066.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 12, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 9, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1011(1)—Findings of court on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where although conflicting inferences might be drawn from some of the testimony, where such conflict has been resolved by findings of the trial court, such findings are conclusive on appeal.

2. Principal and agent ⊂⊃101(1) — Employer held not bound by employee's subscription for reports, where complaining party did not know conditions of employment and was not misled by them.

Under Civ. Code, § 2317, defining ostensible authority, the fact that an employee was permitted to open the mail of his employer and intrusted with the duty of bringing to the attention of proper officers correspondence addressed to employer was insufficient to bind the employer by a letter subscribing for reports, written by employee without authority, in the absence of evidence that complaining party knew such facts or was misled by them.

3. Principal and agent ⊂⊃99—Third person's belief that agent had authority must be generated by some act or neglect of principal.

Under Civ. Code, § 2334, as to principal's liability for acts of agent with only ostensible authority, there are two essential features of ostensible authority; the third person must believe that the agent had authority, and such belief must be generated by some act or neglect of the principal.

4. Principal and agent ⊂⊃99—One cannot by acts make himself agent of another without knowledge and consent of latter.

One cannot make himself the agent of another simply by writing letters and acting as agent without the knowledge and consent of the latter.

5. Principal and agent ⊂⊃166(2)—Acts of employer held not to ratify unauthorized contract of clerk.

Where a clerk by an unauthorized letter and without the knowledge or consent of his employer subscribed to official reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which were mailed in the name of and to the office of the employer from time to time over a period of several months, and received by the employee, who piled them unopened around his desk or in a corner of the room, and when the attention of the employer was called to the reports he promptly disavowed the contract, and sought to return the reports unopened, which were refused, there was no ratification of the contract by the employer, as the element of actual knowledge was lacking.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Franklin W. Allen, an individual doing business under the name and style of Hulse & Allen, against the San Francisco Wholesale Dairy Produce Exchange. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arnold C. Lackenbach, of San Francisco (Paul A. McCarthy, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

I. I. Brown and Vogelsang & Brown, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,218 for a transcript of the official stenographic report of proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission on the perishable freight investigation.

The plaintiff is the official reporter of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and is engaged in the business of reporting and selling transcripts of the reports of said commission to persons interested therein, at prices fixed by said commission for such services. On June 20, 1919, plaintiff sent to defendant a circular letter, stating that proposed changes in tariff applicable to perishable products of all kinds would be investigated by the Interstate Commerce Commission at hearings to be held in several cities from July 7 to September 18, or later. The letter then offered to supply copies of the official reports of the commission at 12½ cents a page, the charge authorized and approved by the commission. In response to this communication the plaintiff received the following letter:

"San Francisco, Cal., June 27/19.

"Messrs. Hulse & Allen, Official Reporters of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Federal Trade Commission, 244 Madison Ave., New York City, N. Y.—Gentlemen: Answering yours of June 20, 1919, in re official reports: concerning proposed perishable protective tariff No. 1 (Docket 10664) and other matters referred to in your communication: have to say: kindly consider this our subscription for the copy referred to, and forward at your earliest convenience to this address.

"Very truly yours, J. R. Kinsman, Sec."

This letter was written upon a letter head of the defendant, and the signature was affixed by a rubber stamp. Acting upon this letter, the plaintiff prepared and mailed to defendant numerous volumes of typewritten transcript of the proceedings before the commission, amounting to $1,218.50 at the rate quoted. The complaint was in two counts, in the first of which it was alleged that the transcript was furnished to defendant at its special instance and request at an agreed price; and in the second count recovery was sought for the same amount as the reasonable value of plaintiff's services in preparing the transcript, which services, it was alleged, were rendered at the special instance and request of defendant.

Appellant urges that the trial court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the letter hereinbefore set out, dated June 27, 1919, addressed to the plaintiff and signed, with rubber stamp, "J. R. Kinsman, Sec." Counsel for defendant objected to the introduction of this letter upon the ground that there was no proof that it had been authorized, and it was not admissible against the corporation. The evidence disclosed that J. R. Kinsman had not written this letter, nor seen it at all until the time of the trial; that he had not authorized it to be written, and did not know that it had been written, but that a clerk in the employ of the defendant, one Henri B. Laidlaw, on his own initiative, without any direction from the board of directors or from any officer of the defendant, had written the letter, to which he had affixed, by rubber stamp, the signature "John R. Kinsman, Sec."

[1] It was not contended that Laidlaw had actual authority to act for the defendant in making a contract of this kind, and the proof was to the contrary. Also, we think, it cannot be successfully contended, on the record that he had ostensible authority to do so. Upon this latter question, although conflicting inferences might be drawn from some of the testimony, such conflict has been resolved against appellant by the findings of the trial court. These findings are of ultimate facts; but they imply that there was no ostensible agency established as against the defendant. This, in itself, would conclude that question before this court, but it may be well to add that, even though we were to give effect only to the portion of the testimony which is relied upon by appellant as establishing ostensible agency, it would avail him nothing, because such facts are not shown to have been known to the plaintiff when he furnished the transcripts.

[2] Section 2317 of the Civil Code defines ostensible authority as such authority as a principal intentionally or by want of ordinary care causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess. Appellant's argument, based upon the fact that Laidlaw was in charge of the office of the defendant and permitted to open its mail and intrusted with the duty of bringing to the attention of the proper officers the correspondence addressed to the defendant, loses its force because there is no evidence in the record that plaintiff knew these facts or was misled by them.

[3, 4] Section 2334 of the Civil Code provides that a principal is bound by the acts of his agent under a merely ostensible authority to those persons only who have in good faith and without want of ordinary care incurred a liability or parted with value upon the faith thereof. The decisions in this state have made clear that there are two essential features of ostensible authority, viz. the third person must believe that the agent had authority, and such belief must be generated by some act or neglect of the person to be held. Harris v. San Diego Flume Co., 87 Cal. 526, 25 Pac. 758; Gosliner v. Grangers' Bank of Cal., 124 Cal. 225, 227, 56 Pac. 1029; Luft v. Arakelian, 33 Cal. App. 463, 165 Pac. 712; Rodgers v. Peckham, 120 Cal. 238, 52 Pac. 483; So. Pac. Co. v. City of Pomona, 144 Cal. 350, 77 Pac. 929. It is well settled that he who seeks to charge a supposed principal with the obligations resulting from the acts and conduct of an alleged ostensible agent must show that he himself was cognizant of the facts which gave color to the alleged ostensible agency and caused him to believe that the person with whom he dealt was acting in the capacity of an agent. 1 Cal. Jur. § 40, and cases hereinbefore cited. A person cannot make himself the agent of another simply by writing letters and acting as agent without the knowledge and consent of the latter. Lambert v. Gerner, 142 Cal. 403, 76 Pac. 53.

[5] Another argument of the appellant for a reversal of this judgment is that, even though the contract be conceded to have been unauthorized by the defendant, it was ratified by said defendant. This position is based upon the showing made that the transcripts were mailed from time to time over a period of several months, by the plaintiff to the defendant, and were delivered at the office of the defendant. They were received by the clerk, Laidlaw, and piled up unopened around his desk or in a corner of the office. These packages were not opened, and became quite bulky in the course of a few months, as they included over 9,000 pages of typewritten matter. When the clerk finally, and, we concede, rather tardily, realized how extensive had been the hearings before the commission, and what a bulk of typewritten matter was being sent to the office of defendant, he called the attention of one of the directors to these transcripts, and the defendant thereupon immediately disavowed the contract, and attempted to return the transcripts unopened, but the plaintiff refused to accept them.

However, it is argued that as the transcripts were necessarily bulky, and as some of the directors visited the offices of the defendant for a short time every day, the defendant is to be charged with knowledge that the transcripts were being delivered, and its failure to repudiate the contract for several months amounted to a ratification. The record contains the positive testimony of the directors that they did not know the transcripts had been sent to the defendant, and knew nothing of the entire transaction between Laidlaw and plaintiff until about the time they repudiated the contract and attempted to return the transcripts. Appellant's argument, then, is, in effect, that although the evidence is that the defendant had no actual knowledge, through its directors or officers, of the delivery of the transcripts, it must be charged with knowledge because it had an opportunity to know the facts, and its silence, under such circumstances amounts to a ratification. This presents, squarely, the question of whether ratification may exist where there is no actual knowledge of facts which must suggest or imply the transaction in controversy, but merely constructive knowledge of such facts. We find no case in which the rule has been carried to the extent contended for by appellant. It is true that ratification need not be express, but may be implied from the acts and conduct of a party. Ralphs v. Hensler, 97 Cal. 296, 302, 32 Pac. 243; Union Trust v. Best, 160 Cal. 263, 116 Pac. 737. But it is an inherent element of ratification that a party to be charged with it must have had full knowledge of what he was doing. Brown v. Rouse, 104 Cal. 672, 676, 38 Pac. 507; Hall v. Wells, 24 Cal. App. 238, 250, 141 Pac. 53; Munroe v. Fette, 1 Cal. App. 333, 334, 82 Pac. 206; Puget Sound Lumber Co. v. Krug, 89 Cal. 237, 26 Pac. 902; Dupont v. Wertheman, 10 Cal. 354; Billings v. Morrow, 7 Cal. 171, 175, 68 Am. Dec. 235; Hutchinson v. Scott, 35 Cal. App. 171, 174, 169 Pac. 415; Brown v. Wrightman, 5 Cal. App. 391, 90 Pac. 467.

The case of Ballard v. Nye, 138 Cal. 598, 72 Pac. 156, might, at first glance, seem to give some support to appellant's position; but a reading of the facts recited in the opinion in that case convinces us that it is inapplicable here. That case states, quoting from Mechem on Agency, that while knowledge of material facts is necessary before the doctrine of ratification can be applied, nevertheless, ignorance of such facts can avail nothing, where it is intentional and deliberate, or where the circumstances are such as reasonably to put the principal upon inquiry. But a reading of that case makes it apparent that, in order to make it apply as authority in the present case, it would have been necessary for plaintiff to have proven, in the present case, that defendant had actual knowledge of the delivery of the transcripts by plaintiff. The proof is to the contrary. In the case of Ballard v. Nye, supra, the principal had actual knowledge of a number of facts from which it was impossible to escape the conclusion that a certain payment had been made to her purported agent. In the present case the defendant had no actual knowledge of the delivery of the transcripts. If it had had such knowledge appellant might have argued, with success, that defendant had constructive notice of the contract or course of dealings with the plaintiff and actual knowledge of the making of the contract was unnecessary; but in the absence of actual knowledge of facts to put the defendant on inquiry as to any contract outstanding, we think the trial court was correct in its conclusion that no showing of ratification had been made.

We think that upon no possible theory was the letter, sought to be introduced by plaintiff, binding upon the defendant, and its exclusion by the trial court was proper. In connection with the ruling on this point, we have disposed of all the matters urged by appellant which require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

BRADEN v. MITCHELL. (Civ. 3826.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 31, 1922.)

I. Evidence ⊂=450(8)—Contract for purchase of a specified lot of goods held sufficiently definite to preclude extraneous testimony.

A contract for the purchase of "a certain salvage stock, consisting of the following approximate articles, to wit," held sufficiently clear and certain in its terms to preclude extraneous evidence of the intents of the parties and the quantity of the goods deliverable under it.

2. Sales ⊂=261(1)—Contract for sale of specified lot of goods of approximate amount held not a warranty of quantity.

A written contract for the sale of "certain salvage stock" described, stating that "the approximate amounts of said goods are as follows," stating the quantities of the various articles, was the sale of a specific lot of salvaged goods of which the probable amount was only estimated, so that, the good faith of the seller being unquestioned and the entire "certain salvage stock" being delivered, the buyer could not recover for any deficiency in the quantity of the items listed.

Action by A. Claude Braden against L. D. Mitchell. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Clark, Law & Clay, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages for failure of the defendant to deliver a part of certain personal property, alleged to have been included in an agreement of sale. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant appeals therefrom.

[1] The court found that the defendant agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff agreed to purchase from the defendant, "a certain salvage stock consisting of the following approximate articles, to wit," the same being certain stated quantities of glass jars and other articles.

The court found that the defendant refused and failed to deliver to plaintiff certain items contained in that list. Appellant contends that these findings are not sustained by the evidence.

[2] The contract was in writing. It described the property sold as follows: "A certain salvage stock from Willets & Green. The approximate amounts of said goods are as follows"—stating the quantities of the various articles. Overruling objections of the plaintiff, the court permitted the defendant to introduce testimony and correspondence of the parties, for the purpose of establishing the actual intention of the parties, and then decided on the evidence that the facts were as above quoted from the findings. This evidence was immaterial to the issues presented if the contract was clear and certain in its terms. We find in the contract nothing that justified a resort to extraneous evidence for the purpose of interpreting the terms of the writing. On the written contract the question to be determined is whether or not the description of the property sold was such that the quantity was warranted. We are of the opinion that the sale was of a specific lot of salvaged goods, of which the probable amount was only estimated. Therefore, since the good faith of the vendor is not questioned, and since the entire "certain salvage stock" was delivered, the plaintiff cannot recover damages for any deficiency in quantity of the items indicated in the contract. The rule which should be applied here is stated in Brawley v. United States, 96 U. S. 168, 24 L. Ed. 622, as follows:

"Where a contract is made to sell or furnish certain goods identified by reference to independent circumstances, such as an entire lot deposited in a certain warehouse, * * * and the quantity is named with the qualification of 'about,' or 'more or less,' or words of like import, the contract applies to the specific lot, and the naming of the quantity is not regarded as in the nature of a warranty, but only as an estimate of the probable amount, in reference to which good faith is all that is required of the party making it. In such cases, the governing rule is somewhat analogous to that which is applied in the description of lands, where natural boundaries and monuments control courses and distances and estimates of quantity."

Taking the written contract as constituting the only material evidence on the principal fact in issue, it is not sufficient to sustain the finding on which the judgment rests.

The judgment is reversed.

SANFILIPPO et al. v. LESSER et al.

(Civ. 4282.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 11, 1922.)

1. Master and servant ⟸330(1)—Burden of showing wife's agency in operating husband's automobile on plaintiff.

In an action against a husband for injuries caused by his wife's negligence in the operation of his automobile, the plaintiff has the burden of proving that the wife in operating the car was the husband's agent.

2. Master and servant ⟸332(1)—Evidence of automobile driver's agency for her husband owner of car held insufficient for jury.

In an action against a husband for his wife's negligence in the operation of his automobile, undisputed testimony that he was not present, and that she had taken the car to drive to her mother's home, and had taken her mother to do some shopping, and then for a drive, held to entitle the husband to a directed verdict, such evidence being sufficient to overcome prima facie agency established by proof of husband's ownership of automobile and permissive use thereof by wife.

3. Death ⟸58(2)—Proof of damages to surviving husband and children essential.

In an action for death under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, the jury is not warranted in awarding damages to deceased's husband and children, in the absence of evidence as to whether the husband and children were living with the deceased, or whether her society was of any pecuniary value to them, or whether she rendered any services to them.

4. Death ⟸89—Damages not awarded for mental suffering.

In an action for death under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, no recovery can be had for grief, sorrow, and mental suffering.

5. Appeal and error ⟸232(3)—Insufficiency of evidence ground for reversal, where urged as objection to instructions notwithstanding failure to specify insufficiency.

The appellate court will reverse a judgment for insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict, though appellants did not specify wherein the evidence was insufficient, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 648, where they raised the question of the insufficiency of the evidence by objection to instructions, and urged such objections on appeal.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1170(1)—Appellate courts will not foreclose substantial rights of appellants on technical grounds, where empowered to reach decision on merits.

It is not the policy of the appellate courts to foreclose substantial rights of appellants upon technical grounds, where they are empowered to reach a decision in any manner upon the merits.

Action by Philipp Sanfilippo and others against Irving Lesser and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hartley F. Peart and Gus L. Baraty, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment for $2,500, rendered upon a verdict of a jury in an action by the heirs of Carmela Sanfilippo to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by them by reason of the negligence of defendants in operating an automobile, which negligence, it is alleged, resulted in the death of said Carmela Sanfilippo.

The complaint alleged that the defendants were husband and wife; that on the 9th day of July, 1919, said defendant Irving Lesser was the owner of a certain automobile, which he purchased, possessed and maintained for the comfort, pleasure, and enjoyment of himself and his wife, said defendant Ruth Lesser; that the said defendant Ruth Lesser, on the 9th day of July, 1919, was allowed, permitted, and authorized by said Irving Lesser to use and operate said automobile for her pleasure, and that the said defendant Ruth Lesser was driving said automobile with the knowledge, consent and authority of her said husband, and in pursuance of the purposes for which he bought, possessed, and maintained the same; that on said 9th day of July, 1919, said defendant Ruth Lesser, with the consent and authority of said defendant Irving Lesser, drove and operated said automobile along said Ellsworth street at a rate of speed of about 35 miles an hour, and while so doing failed and neglected to keep said automobile under control, with the result that she drove and operated the said automobile from the roadway of said street upon and along the sidewalk thereof, and struck said Carmela Sanfilippo, who was then and there walking along the sidewalk of said street; that said automobile struck said Carmela Sanfilippo with great force and violence; and that she thereby sustained injuries which caused her death. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint upon the ground, among others, that it did not state a cause of action against the defendant Irving Lesser. The demurrer was overruled and answer filed, which denied, substantially, all the allegations of the complaint.

[1, 2] There was absolutely no proof made by the plaintiff that the defendant Ruth Lesrer was acting as the agent of Irving Lesser in driving the automobile. It was not disputed that the defendant Irving Lesser was not present at the scene of the accident, and he could be charged with the negligence, if any, of his wife only upon the theory of an agency between them. The burden of proof upon the issue of agency was on the plaintiff. Fahey v. Madden (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 128, 209 Pac. 41. Concerning that the proof of the ownership of the automobile by defendant Irving Lesser and the permissive use of it by his wife made out a prima facie case of agency, that case was based merely upon a possible inference that might be drawn by the jury, and when the defendant introduced evidence, which stands in the record uncontradicted, to the effect that Mrs. Lesser had used the car to drive to her mother's home and had taken her mother down town to do some shopping and then for a drive through the park, and that her husband was at his office at the time, plaintiff's prima facie case of agency was overcome by such direct and positive testimony. Fahey v. Madden (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 128, 209 Pac. 41; Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Co., 39 Cal. App. 738, 741, 179 Pac. 697.

Under this state of facts, the case is within the rule announced in the case of Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 193 Pac. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083, wherein it is said:

"But it seems to us that it cannot reasonably be held that a member of the family using a car so provided, kept, and maintained by the father for the pleasure and convenience of his family, solely on his own mission for his own personal pleasure or convenience, is acting for his father or is engaged on the father's business, notwithstanding that such use was one of the purposes for which the car was provided and maintained. In such a situation we would have simply a permissive use of the father's car by another, solely on that other's business, practically the same use of the owner's automobile that is had by one not a member of his family to whom he loans it for such third party's own use or enjoyment, the only difference being that in the latter case the car is not provided, kept, and maintained by the owner for the purpose of allowing others to use it. It seems to us that this is an immaterial factor."

See, also, Hill v. Jacquemart (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 1021.

The instruction of the trial court to the jury that "if you find that the automobile in this case was owned by Irving Lesser, and that the said Irving Lesser kept and maintained said automobile and authorized and permitted the use of it by his wife, Ruth Lesser, then and in that event Irving Lesser is liable in damages for any injury or death occasioned by the negligent operation of the said automobile by his said wife, Ruth Lesser," was erroneous. The motion of the defendant Irving Lesser for a directed verdict should have been granted. The judgment against him cannot stand.

[3] As to the judgment against Ruth Lesser, numerous objections, are urged, but a consideration of the first one called to our attention is decisive of this appeal. That is, that there is not a scintilla of evidence upon which the jury could arrive at an estimate of the pecuniary damages of the plaintiffs. The statute limits damages in a case like the present one to such an amount as under all the circumstances of the case may be just. Section 377, Code of Civ. Proc. The damages allowable must depend upon the circumstances of the particular case. Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50. The allegations of the complaint, in the present case, upon the subject of damages are:

"That by reason of the negligence of said defendants as aforesaid, the plaintiff Philipp Sanfilippo on account of the loss of services of his said wife and the help and comfort of her society and companionship, and the plaintiffs Salvatore Sanfilippo, Mamie Mercuria, and Josephine Sanfilippo on account of the help and comfort and loss of companionship of their said mother have been damaged in the sum of $20,000."

In the case of Bond v. United Railroads, supra, 159 Cal. at page 286 thereof (113 Pac. 373, 48 L. R. A. [N. S.] 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50), it is said:

"It was not necessary to specifically allege the loss of society, comfort, protection or services. Evidence could be given of the facts relating thereto and allowance could be made therefor under the general allegation of damages."

But let us search the record in the present case for any evidence at all upon which to base an allowance of damages for loss of society and companionship. The first witness called by plaintiffs was Josephine Sanfilippo. She testified that she was 17 years old; that her mother was Carmela Sanfilippo, who was killed on July 9, 1919, in an automobile accident. She continued:

"My father's name is Philipp Sanfilippo. He is 62 years of age and resides in San Francisco. My sister's name is Mamie Mercuria. She is 36 years of age, and resides in San Jose. My brother's name is Salvatore Sanfilippo. He is between 33 and 34 years of age, and resides in San Jose. My brother Salvatore Sanfilippo is married. My sister Mamie Mercuria is also married. My mother at the time of her death was about fifty-four years old."

The next witness was Constantino Mercuria. She described the accident, which she witnessed while sitting in her mother's store. She stated that deceased was her grandmother. Salvatore Sanfilippo testified that his mother was killed in the accident under consideration; that he lived in San Jose; that he arrived at the scene of the accident about 20 minutes after it occurred and examined the automobile; that his mother was 53 years old, and his father was living.

[4] This testimony includes all of the plaintiffs' case, and it appears therefrom that there is no evidence that Philipp Sanfilippo, the husband, was living with deceased at the time of her death, or that her society was of any pecuniary value to him, or that she rendered any services to him. It appears that plaintiffs Mamie Mercuria and Salvatore Sanfilippo were married, and did not reside with deceased. There is no evidence that they suffered the slightest pecuniary loss by her death. As to the minor child, 17 years of age, there is also no evidence that she resided with her mother, and not the faintest suggestion that she suffered any pecuniary loss by her death. It is always to be borne in mind that no recovery can be had for grief, sorrow, and mental suffering of the heirs of deceased.

The unequivocal holding in the recent case of Parsons v. Easton, 184 Cal. 764, 195 Pac. 419, compels a reversal of the judgment in the present case because there is not a particle of evidence to support an allowance for damages. On the question of the necessity of evidence tending to show circumstances indicating a pecuniary loss to surviving heirs in a case such as this one, the court said in the above-cited case:

"It is also held that in addition to the pecuniary loss arising from deprivation of direct financial assistance or services, while nothing can be allowed for grief, sorrow, and mental suffering of the heirs of a person whose death is caused by negligence, additional damages may be given where the 'circumstances' referred to in section 377 indicate that there may be a pecuniary loss to a parent from the death of a child or to a wife from the death of her husband arising from the deprivation of the 'society, comfort, and protection' of such child or husband. Beeson v. Green Mountain G. M. Co., 57 Cal. 38; Munro v. Pacific Coast, etc., Co., 84 Cal. 525. But this is not a universal right existing in every case. It is allowable only where the 'circumstances' show a reasonable probability that the 'society, comfort, and protection' afforded to the surviving parent or wife was of such a character that it would be of pecuniary advantage to the parent or wife, and that a deprivation thereof would entail a pecuniary loss to them. Thus in the Beeson Case the court said: 'The loss of a kind husband might be a considerable pecuniary loss to a wife; she loses his advice and assistance in many matters of domestic economy.' Manifestly, no allowance can be made because of a possible loss arising from circumstances which do not appear from the evidence and which rest upon conjecture or imagination. The evidence in this case does not show circumstances indicating that the society, comfort, and protection of the son had been of any appreciable pecuniary advantage to the plaintiffs, or any reasonable probability that it would be so in the future. It may be that they dearly loved him and that they loved him the more because of his infirmities and helplessness. But it is pecuniary loss only, and not the loss of an object of love and affection, that the law recognizes as ground for allowing damages to the heirs of one whose death has been caused by the negligence of a third person."

In the absence of any evidence as to the mode of living of the deceased and the plaintiffs, and as to their relations and pecuniary advantage one to the other, there is no justification for the allowance of any damages which must take account only of pecuniary loss. Because of this, the case must go back for a new trial.

[5, 6] Respondents do not contend that there is any evidence justifying an award of damages, but seek refuge in the position that this court is precluded from examining that question because it is not specified as one of the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. While it is true that defendants did not specify that the evidence was insufficient in this particular, as they should have done (section 648, Code Civ. Proc.), they raised the same question in their objection to the giving of certain instructions by the trial court upon the question of the elements of damages that might be allowed by the jury. It is urged that these instructions were improperly given because there was no evidence upon that subject before the jury, and instructions upon the matter, in the absence of any evidence, misled the jury into believing that a proper showing had been made by the plaintiffs, and that the court should not have instructed upon matters not touched upon by the evidence. This objection is urged upon appeal, and in passing upon it, we are compelled to examine the record for evidence upon the question of damages, with the result heretofore stated. It is not the policy of the appellate courts of this state to foreclose substantial rights of appellants upon technical grounds where they are empowered to reach a decision in any manner upon the merits. We are of the opinion that the instructions complained of were improper in view of the record, which contains no evidence sufficient to warrant an award of damages to plaintiffs. We must conclude that these instructions misled the jury into awarding damages, because there is nothing in the evidence to explain the verdict.

There are numerous other matters urged by appellants for a reversal of the judgment, but they are not such matters as are likely to recur upon a new trial. It is therefore unnecessary to pass upon them in this opinion, as the judgment must be reversed as against both defendants for the reasons mentioned herein. It is so ordered.

FIDELITY SAVINGS & LOAN ASS'N v. SCHAEFER et al. (Civ. 3958.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 2, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜1050(1)—Admission of evidence concerning prior adjudicated rights held immaterial.

In an action to quiet title, where the Supreme Court had, on appeal of a prior action, finally established the priority of plaintiff's rights in the premises, as against any claim arising under the lien asserted by defendant, the admission of evidence of an agreement by the party through whom defendant claimed to make his lien subject to the rights of plaintiff was immaterial.

2. Abatement and revival ⊜46—Action may be continued in name of original plaintiff in case of transfer of interest.

Where, in an action to quiet title, the objection that at the time of the trial the title to the property was in one other than plaintiff, raised only by statement of counsel, with no showing that it was presented at the trial, was without merit, especially in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 385, providing for the continuance of an action in case of any transfer of interest in the name of the original party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association, a corporation, against Lida A. Schaefer and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. C. Schaefer, of San Pedro, for appellants.

Milton K. Young, Lyndol L. Young, and William K. Young, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to two lots in the Wolfskill Orchard tract in Los Angeles county. The plaintiff's claim of title is derived from a trustee's sale and trustee's deed under the provisions of a trust deed made by one Howard, the former owner of the property. Appellant Lida A. Schaefer claims adversely to plaintiff under a certificate of sheriff's sale of the same real estate as the property of Howard; said sheriff's sale having been made under the purported authority of an order of sale issued out of the superior court in a mechanic's lien foreclosure action of one Hartfield, plaintiff, against Howard and others as defendants. In this action to quiet title, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant Lida A. Schaefer appeals from this judgment.

The trust deed was made by Howard in June, 1915. The trustee's sale and conveyance to respondent were made on the 15th day of January, 1916. It is not denied that respondent thus obtained a clear title, except as it may have been subsequent and subject to the rights of Hartfield. In September, 1914, Howard had entered into a contract for the erection of a hotel building on these lots. In October, 1914, the contractor made a subcontract with Hartfield for the plumbing work of that building. On the 23d day of July, 1915, Hartfield commenced an action for the foreclosure of a lien claim held by him, arising out of that plumbing contract and the work done and materials furnished thereunder. In the year 1916, subsequent to the date of the trustee's deed to respondent, a decree of foreclosure was entered in the case of Hartfield against Howard et al. By that decree the court declared that Hartfield's lien was "subsequent and subservient to the interest of the defendant Fidelity Savings & Loan Association, a corporation, which said last-named defendant's interest is superior to the said claim of the plaintiff herein"; and also provided that the interest of the defendant Title Guarantee & Trust Company in and to the property described in the plaintiff's complaint was subject and subsequent to the interest of the plaintiff Hartfield. On appeal by Hartfield from that part of the decree adjudicating his lien to be subsequent to the interest of defendant Title Guarantee & Trust Company, the Supreme Court directed that the decree be modified by striking out the provisions last above mentioned and substituting a provision to the effect that the claim of the plaintiff and this judgment and decree in that behalf were and are prior and superior to any right, title, interest, or estate of the defendant Charles W. Howard and certain other defendants—

"but that said claim of the plaintiff herein and this judgment and decree in that behalf was and is subsequent and subservient to the interest of the defendant Fidelity Savings & Loan Association (a corporation), which said last-named defendant's interests are superior to said claim of the plaintiff herein; provided that nothing in this judgment shall be construed or held to prejudice or affect the rights of the Title Guarantee & Trust Company accruing prior to the date when the plaintiff's lien attached to the property." Hartfield v. Howard, 180 Cal. 376, 380, 181 Pac. 385, 386.

The remittitur on that appeal was filed in the superior court on the 25th day of June, 1919. Thereafter, on the 7th day of August, 1919, the order of sale was issued pursuant to which the sheriff made the sale under which appellant makes her claim adversely to the title of the plaintiff.

[1] Counsel for appellant in his brief informs us that the decision on the appeal and the judgment as modified thereby left the question open as to whether the title of Fidelity Savings & Loan Association was superior to the claim of Hartfield as asserted in his foreclosure action. Assuming this to be the fact, he claims that the court erred in admitting in evidence a purported contract of Hartfield whereby it was claimed by respondent that at the time when Howard's trust deed was made Hartfield agreed with the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association that if it would make further advances of funds for the completion of said hotel building, all of Hartfield's claims then or thereafter existing for labor or materials furnished by him should be deemed subordinate and subsequent to the lien for any moneys theretofore or thereafter to be advanced by the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association. We are of the opinion that the claimed error of the court in the reception of this evidence is not material to this appeal. It is immaterial for the reason that the judgment as modified under the order of the Supreme Court finally established the priority of the rights of respondent under its trust deed as against any claims arising under the lien asserted by Howard. Any rights acquired by appellant as the purchaser at the sheriff's sale under the decree of foreclosure were subject to the prior rights established by that decree. Having acquired title by the trustee's deed of January 15, 1916, at a sale made on account of default in performance by Howard of the conditions of his trust deed, respondent thus acquired a title superior to and unaffected by the adverse claim asserted herein by appellant.

[2] There is no merit in the claim of appellant that plaintiff cannot recover for the reason that the plaintiff had no title or ownership of the property at the time of the trial. There is nothing in the record concerning this fact except the statement of respondent's attorney that one Bates was then the present owner of the property; he having acquired by mesne conveyance from respondent. It is not claimed that this objection was presented to the court at that time. If made, it would have been properly overruled. Code Civ. Proc. § 385; Knobloch v. Associated Oil Co., 170 Cal. 144, 147, 148 Pac. 938. If Bates was the owner, he had the clear right to continue the action in the name of the plaintiff.

SIEGMAN et al. v. FETTERS et al.
(Civ. 4300.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 19, 1922.)

1. Theaters and shows ⟸6—Finding of negligence in condition of approach warranted.

Evidence of broken condition of a cross-slat on an inclined wooden walk leading from defendants' show house, on which plaintiff, a patron, slipped and fell, held sufficient to warrant finding of negligent failure in the duty of defendants to keep approach reasonably safe for those having occasion to use it.

2. Theaters and shows ⟸6—Patron injured on broken walk not contributorily negligent.

A patron of a show house injured in slipping on a broken cross-slat on an inclined wooden approach, being required only to exercise ordinary care, was not guilty of contributory negligence in not examining each separate slat before treading on it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by Rachel Siegman and husband against Emma Fetters and husband. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment rendered on a verdict of a jury in favor of plaintiffs, for the sum of $500 damages, alleged to have been caused by reason of the injury of Rachel Siegman, due to the negligence of defendants. Plaintiffs are husband and wife, as are defendants.

Defendants operated a hotel, moving picture house, and summer resort at Fetters Hot Springs, Sonoma county, Cal. On August 14, 1920, the plaintiff Rachel Siegman had attended the moving picture theater operated by the defendants. As she was leaving the building at about half past 9 in the evening, and proceeding along an inclined wooden walk extending from a platform in front of the theater, which walk was the means of entering and leaving said theater, she slipped and fell on said walk. It is alleged that said walk was improperly and negligently constructed and maintained by said defendants, in that certain slats nailed on said walk were loose and broken and not properly affixed to said walk, and that, as a result thereof, said plaintiff was not able to maintain her footing and fell to the ground.

[1] Appellants complain of no errors in the proceedings before the trial court, but assert that the verdict is not warranted by the evidence. The point is without merit. There is a conflict in the evidence, it is true, but the testimony of Rachel Siegman, together with that of Francis Campbell, a ticket taker at the theater, was such as to warrant the jury in believing that there was a broken slat on the runway, leaving the edges of the slat where the break occurred rough and uneven, that such condition was known to the defendants, and that plaintiff's fall was due to this defective condition of the runway.

[2] As to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff Rachel Siegman, the jury was also the judge. She testified that she was watching where she was going; that her sight was good; that she did not examine each separate slat before treading upon it. We think she was not required to do this. She was required only to exercise ordinary care, and the duty of the defendants was to keep the approach to their place of business reasonably safe for those having occasion to use it. Long v. Breuner Co., 36 Cal. App. 630, 172 Pac. 1132.

SEVERINI v. SUTTER-BUTTE CANAL CO.
(Civ. 2465.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 22, 1922.)

Damages ⟸62(4)—Owner, who refused to pay for water for irrigation before date on which he claimed it was due, limited to interest thereon during intervening time, and could not recover damages for failure to furnish water.

Where landowner, who was required by his contract to pay water company $58 September 1st, refused to comply with water company's demand made pursuant to order of Railroad Commission that one-half of such amount be paid February 1st and the other half July 1st, and thereby caused the company to withhold water necessary for the irrigation of his land, he could not recover for the damages sustained because of company's refusal to furnish water, since by making payment at the times demanded he could have limited his loss to the $1.53 interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Simone Severini against the Sutter-Butte Canal Company. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Henry Ingram, of Gridley, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Plaintiff sued the defendant for damages in the sum of $7,000 claimed to have been caused by the failure and refusal of the defendant to furnish water to plaintiff for irrigating his lands during the season of 1919. The trial court granted a motion for nonsuit, and the appeal is from the judgment entered thereupon in favor of defendant. Plaintiff purchased the land from the Sutter Irrigated Farms Company. Prior to said sale the company had entered into a contract with the Sutter County Canal Company, predecessor of defendant, for a supply of water at the price of $2 per acre, payable on the 1st day of September of each year. This contract for the supply of water was recorded, and it expressly provided that the water was to be appurtenant to the land. Plaintiff's purchase was of 29 acres, and in 1910, 1912, 1915, and 1916 he planted it to fruit of different kinds. During each year from 1910 to 1918, inclusive, he received from defendant and paid for water at said agreed price. In the year 1919 he made a request of defendant for water pursuant to his contract, but the latter refused to furnish it unless plaintiff would pay $1 per acre on February 1. This plaintiff refused to do unless he was guaranteed water. Defendant declined to furnish guaranty, so the water was not supplied. It appears that defendant's demand was due to the fact that in 1918 the Railroad Commission of this state changed the rates of service of water by respondent to its consumers, including appellant, so as to provide that, instead of paying $2 per acre on the 1st of September, $1 should be paid on the 1st of February and the other $1 on the 1st of July. It appears that about January 15, 1919, respondent mailed to, and which was received by appellant, this notice:

"Notice. Under rules prescribed by the Railroad Commission of the state of California for the undersigned, water rates for the ensuing season are payable as follows: One-half thereof, February 1, 1919. One-half thereof July 1, 1919. If not so paid interest will be charged at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. Service will be refused until rates are paid. Consumers in arrears must also settle their accounts before receiving service."

Thereafter appellant called at the office of respondent at Gridley and was informed by the agent in charge that the company would require the payments to be made in accordance with the rule adopted by said Railroad Commission. Plaintiff was asked on cross-examination this question: "You refused to pay it?" and he replied: "Yes; sure I did. I say that I pay on September 1st."

We may pass by the question of damage to the crops and the contention of appellant that "the water right of the plaintiff is an easement attached to the land and to raise the rate without the consent of the landowner would impair the obligation of the contract," and come directly to the practical question whether by reason of his pertinacious and imprudent refusal to make such trifling concession he should be heard to complain. The situation was as follows: Assuming that appellant would have been required to pay on his total acreage of 29 acres at $2 per acre under the old arrangement, it would have amounted to $58 on September 1st. Under the demand of respondent he would be required to pay $29 on February 1st and $29 on July 1st. At 7 per cent. interest the first would amount to $30.19 on September 1st and the second to $29.34. Hence it appears that appellant refused to pay $1.53 more than he thought he should pay, but chose rather to run the risk of losing his crops. Indeed, according to the allegations of his complaint, he actually lost $7,000. When there is such inconsequential difference between the parties the law expects the one who has great interests at stake to yield in order to save excessive damages and costs. The case is governed by the decision of the Supreme Court in Henrici v. South Feather Land, etc., Co., 177 Cal. 442, 170 Pac. 1135, from which we quote as follows:

"By paying the excessive price without conceding its correctness, he could have saved his trees, vines, and crops, and reduced his damage to a comparatively trifling sum. This it was plainly his duty to do. 'The law imposes upon a party injured by another's breach of contract or tort the active duty of using all ordinary care and making all reasonable exertions to render the injury as light as possible. If by his negligence or willfulness he allows the damages to be unnecessarily enhanced, the increased loss, that which was avoidable by the performance of his duty, falls upon him.' 1 Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) § 88; Ash v. Soo Sing Lung, ante, p. 356, 170 Pac. 843; Cullerton v. Miller, 26 Ont. 36, 45; Dillon v. Anderson, 43 N. Y. 231, 237. The principle has been applied by this court in a case similar to the one at bar. Mabb v. Stewart, 147 Cal. 413. * * * So, in this case, the plaintiff could not hold the defendant responsible for the ruin caused by his own act in allowing his trees and vines to go without water for four years, when, as he well knew, he might, at slight cost, have secured the water and reduced his damage to almost nominal proportions."

The plaintiff may pride himself upon his firmness in insisting upon what he conceived to be his rights, and he is entitled to whatever satisfaction that may bring, but the law does not permit such pride to prevent the payment, although not due, of less than $2 in order to save the loss of possibly thousands of dollars. Of course, he could have paid it under protest and thereafter have had his action for the recovery of the excess, if it was not due.

In reference to the contention of appellant that if the rule in the Henrici Case, supra, applies it is a matter of mitigation, and should have been pleaded (Bader v. Mills & Baker Co. [Wyo.] 201 Pac. 1012), it is sufficient to say that the defense does appear in the answer, and since the facts were developed by the testimony of plaintiff, no proof of it was required on the part of defendant.

If it should be thought that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for the said sum of $1.53, it is sufficient to say that the rule of de minimis applies.

Respondent also claims that, under the authority of Southern Pacific Co. v. Spring Valley Water Co., 173 Cal. 291, 159 Pac. 865, L. R. A. 1917E, 680, the modification made by the Railroad Commission was a valid exercise of jurisdiction, although applying to a prior existing contract, and therefore the right existed to insist upon the increased rate, but in any event the other point is decisive of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

ZURICH GENERAL ACCIDENT & LIABILITY INS. CO., Limited, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 4310.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 22, 1922.)

1. Master and servant ⟸405(4)—Evidence held to show ranch hand was within scope of employment.

Evidence in a compensation case held to show that the employment of a ranch hand originally employed to do grading had been enlarged to cover breaking of horses and that he was acting in that branch of his work when injured.

2. Master and servant ⟸375(1)—Injury to ranch hand watering horse while laid off held compensable as injury "arising in course of employment."

A ranch hand, who did not receive pay when laid off, but received his board and lodging and always cared for his team and other stock when necessary on Sundays and days when he was laid off, held entitled to compensation for injury received while watering an unbroken horse, such injury being one occurring in the course of his employment within the Workmen's Compensation Act, though he was laid off for the day.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

Application for certiorari by Zurich General Accident & Liability Insurance Company, Limited, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for injuries to James Shannahan. Award affirmed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a writ of certiorari to review the award of the respondent Industrial Accident Commission, by which respondent James Shannahan was allowed the sum of $107.34 as damages suffered by him by reason of an injury sustained, according to the findings of the said commission, in the course of and arising out of his employment with the Cloman Land & Sheep Company, of which company the petitioner was the insurer. Petitioner asserts that Shannahan was not entitled to compensation or to any of the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, because at the time of his injury he was not employed by Cloman Land & Sheep Company and was not performing services growing out of and incidental to his employment.

On February 8, 1921, Shannahan was employed by the Cloman Land & Sheep Company to work on a ranch owned by said company and situated at Grimes, Cal. He testified that he was to be paid $3 a day for his services for six days a week, together with board and lodging for seven days. He testified that when he started his work on the ranch he "broke" three horses; that he was employed generally to do "scraping"; that he watered and fed the horses on the ranch; that he would come in with his own team and water it and then go down and water the extra stock whenever Mr. Adams, the superintendent was not around to do it; that Mr. Adams had not instructed him to water the other horses, but he watered them as he watered his own team and Mr. Adams was aware of this and did not object thereto; that he worked eight or nine hours a day on the ranch; that he did not have any regular hours, but worked until "things were done"; that he would be engaged in watering the stock sometimes until half past 7 o'clock. On the evening of the accident between 6 and 7 o'clock, he took one of the horses out for water. Here is his account of what then occurred:

"I watered him, and to get him gentle, the saddle was on and the bridle, and I put my foot on the saddle so the weight on the stirrup would get him gentle. Q. How old was that horse? A. A young horse, maybe 6. Q. Had it been broken? A. Yes; we had hooked it up on the wagon a couple of times. Q. What had you to do with the breaking of that horse? A. Well, we broke it on the wagon. Q. Had you driven it? A. Yes, I was the first one to draw a line on her. Q. Who put the saddle on it? A. I did. Q. Did you ride him over to water? A. No; I walked her. Q. Why did you put the saddle on? A. To get her used to it. Q. Had you done that before? A. A couple of times, and I was on her once. Q. Had you ever put the saddle on before with Mr. Adams' knowledge? A. I don't know; sometimes I did it when he was not there—any time I saw her standing there. Q. I want to know if you were doing anything that was not within your duties or within his knowledge; did he ever object to your watering this horse or putting the saddle on him? A. Never said a word. Q. Had he seen you with this horse before? A. Oh, yes. Q. When you put your foot on the stirrup, what happened? A. She threw back and went up. I had her by the halter, and didn't want it to get away. Q. He stood on his hind legs? A. Just reared up, and I said, 'Oh, Larry! Oh, Larry!' and he said 'All right, Jim.' Q. Who is Larry? A. Mr. Adams. Q. Where was he? A. Fixing the caterpillar. Q. Was he in sight? A. No; he was behind the fence, and he came, and the milker heard it, and he ran out, and that is the time I was tromped. Q. What happened? A. I got kicked and tore in here. * * *

Petitioner argues that, as Shannahan was employed to do grading on the ranch, his duties did not include any work with the horse which injured him; that while he did assist the superintendent on two occasions, in driving this horse in a wagon, this was done merely as an accommodation to the superintendent. It is urged, as a material fact, that, had Shannahan not watered the unbroken horse or assisted in training him, this work would have been done by the superintendent, or by some one else on the ranch, and Shannahan would not have been discharged because of neglect of duty. That may be true, but the trend of the argument is that a man working on a ranch must confine himself strictly to the minimum amount of work expected of him in order to keep his job, and must have his duties very definitely defined; otherwise, he will lose his right to compensation for injuries sustained while serving his employer's interests with the knowledge, consent, and encouragement of the employer. In the present case Adams was the superintendent on the ranch, with authority to direct the men about their work. He stated that Shannahan was employed to drive a Fresno. He was asked:

"In addition to that, what did he have to do, or what did he do, in regard to the horses? A. He assisted me in breaking three colts; that is, we broke the colts together. * * * I told him, before he came down, we would have to break the horses for the Fresno. * * * Q. You knew he was a man experienced in handling horses? A. Yes; I heard he was. Q. You did use him, then, in helping do that work? A. Yes. Q. You found him a capable man with horses? A. Yes."

[1] We think a recital of the above testimony is a sufficient answer to petitioner's contention, and that it clearly shows that, even though Shannahan had been employed originally to do grading, his employment had been enlarged by the superintendent to cover the breaking of horses on the ranch, and that he was acting within that branch of his work at the time he was injured.

[2] Another objection is made to the award based upon the fact that on the day of the accident, July 15, 1921, Shannahan's team of horses being tired, it was thought best to rest it, and, accordingly, he "laid off" for the day. On Sundays and other days upon which he did not work he did not receive his wages of $3 a day, but he did receive his board and lodging, and he always watered and cared for his team and for the other horses on the ranch, when necessary, upon Sundays and holidays and days when he was "laid off." It is contended that, because he was not to receive wages for the day in which he was injured, he was not in the employ of the Cloman Land & Sheep Company on that day. We think the point is without merit. He cared for the horses and received his board and lodging on that day, which, assuredly, was a part of his compensation for his labor. The situation here is different than would be the situation of a factory worker on a holiday. Here the place of employment was open and accessible to the employee on this day, when he was not actually working at the grading. He was at least encouraged, if not expected, to care for his teams and the other stock around the ranch. He was given some compensation for such labor—i. e., his board and lodging—and while engaged in this work he was injured. This work grew directly out of his employment, and would never have been performed by him but for his employment on the ranch.

We think Shannahan was in the employ of Cloman Land & Sheep Company at the time of his injury; that said injury occurred in the course of his employment and was proximately caused thereby, all within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831); that the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission are sustained by the evidence.

The award is affirmed.

1. Parties ⟸76(6)—Objection that mother's complaint in action for death does not show that father is dead waived when not taken by demurrer or answer; "widow."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 376, giving a right of action for death of a minor child to the father, or, in case of his death or desertion of his family, to the mother, the objection in an action by the mother that there is no allegation that her husband is dead, or has deserted her, is only an objection to her legal capacity to sue, which, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 430, 433, must be taken by demurrer or answer, and, under section 434, is waived if not so taken, especially where there is no objection to plaintiff's testimony that she is a "widow," which means a woman whose husband is dead, and who has not married again.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Widow.]

2. Parties ⟸76(7)—Objection to capacity to sue does not go to court's jurisdiction.

The objection that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue does not go to the jurisdiction of the court.

3. Death ⟸99(3)—$5,000 for death of child not excessive.

4. Negligence ⟸90—One employing married woman does not make her husband her agent, so as to impute his negligence to her.

The mother of a child employing a married woman to board and care for the child, and paying her for such service, did not merely because of his community interest in her earnings, make the woman's husband her agent, so as to impute to the mother his negligence in the operation of an automobile in which the child was killed.

5. Husband and wife ⟸270(8)—One asserting married person contracted as agent of community has burden of showing agency.

The question whether, in a given transaction, a married person contracts as an individual or as agent for the community is a matter of proof, and one who sets up the community agency has the burden of establishing the fact of agency.

6. Negligence ⟸90—Automobile driver's negligence not imputed to mother of child riding.

Where the husband of a woman employed to care for a child was not the agent or servant of the child's mother, his negligence in the operation of an automobile in which the child was riding could not be imputed to the mother.

7. Railroads ⟸350(16)—Contributory negligence of driver of automobile crossing spur track held a question for jury.

Where the driver of an automobile crossed the main tracks of a railroad with care, and it did not appear that he knew of the existence of a spur track further on, where the automobile was struck by a backing train which had no light or flagman on the rear end, as provided by an ordinance, whether the driver was negligent held a question for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Louyre Rosenbloom against the Southern Pacific Company and Mary E. Clairemont, as administratrix of Louis E. Stout, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, the first-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. A. Morton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Stutsman & Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for defendant.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant Southern Pacific Company from a judgment against it for $5,000 in an action by plaintiff to recover damages because of the death of her minor child, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of said defendant. A motion for nonsuit was granted as to the other defendant in the action, evidently upon the principle that the cause of action did not survive the death of Louis Stout.

[1, 2] The appellant urges, first, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that there is no allegation that the plaintiff's husband is dead, or that he has deserted her, to conform to the requirements of section 376 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This objection goes to the legal capacity of the plaintiff to maintain the action. The defendant and appellant failed to present this objection by demurrer or answer in the trial court. Legal incapacity of the plaintiff to sue is an objection to be presented by demurrer if the fact appears on the face of the complaint, and by answer if it does not so appear (sections 430 and 433, Code Civ. Proc.); and, if such an objection is not taken either by demurrer or answer, it must be deemed to have been waived. (Section 434, Code Civ. Proc.; Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 507, 516). The objection that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue does not go to the jurisdiction of the court. Crittenden v. Superior Court, 166 Cal. 340, 136 Pac. 287; Work v. Campbell, 164 Cal. 343, 128 Pac. 943, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 581. Furthermore, defendant and appellant failed to object to testimony of respondent as to her status, which testimony established her right to bring the action. She testified that she was a "widow."

"A widow is a woman whose husband is dead and who has not married again." Black's Law Dictionary.

A widow is defined to be an unmarried woman whose husband is dead; one who has lost her husband by death and has not taken another. Bouvier's Law Dictionary; In re Ray's Estate, 13 Misc. Rep. 480, 35 N. Y. Supp. 481, 484.

[3] Appellant also urges that the verdict is excessive and was the result of passion and prejudice. While we do not think that this judgment is such as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury (Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 286, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. [N. S.] 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50), we are also of the opinion that this point, to be available to appellant on appeal, should have been presented to the trial court upon the motion for a new trial. (Clarke v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 472; Hale v. San Bernardino Valley Traction Co., 156 Cal. 713, 106 Pac. 83)[1]. Section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure specifies "excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice" as a separate and distinct ground for a new trial; but the record discloses that appellant made its motion for a new trial upon other grounds, and did not present the question of excessive damages to the trial court. Under such circumstances there is no order of the lower court upon this point which is subject to our review. The relative duties of the trial and appellate courts on the general question of the measure of damages are discussed at length in the case of Bond v. U. R. R., supra.

Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for a nonsuit and its motion for a new trial. These objections involve the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, and may be discussed together.

[4] In support of its position on these motions, appellant argues several matters, for a proper consideration of which a brief preliminary discussion of the facts is necessary. The plaintiff, a widow, was employed as a telegraph operator. At the time of the accident which resulted in the death of her child, she had placed the child with Mrs. Dolly Stout, who was to care for him and furnish him board and lodging for the sum of $5 a week. The child was a little over two years of age. On October 13, 1920, some time between 6 and 7 o'clock in the evening, Mrs. Stout, her husband, Louis E. Stout, and plaintiff's child were riding in a Ford laundry delivery wagon, driven by Louis E. Stout. A collision occurred between the Ford delivery wagon and a train of the Southern Pacific Company. Mr. and Mrs. Stout were killed instantly, and the child died the following day as a result of his injuries. Upon these facts alone it is contended that the negligence, if any, of Louis E. Stout in the management and control of his automobile is to be imputed to plaintiff. This is upon the theory that Mr. and Mrs. Stout were plaintiff's agents in charge of her child.

Plaintiff testified that she made arrangements with Mrs. Stout to care for her child, and paid her for such service. But it is contended that Louis E. Stout, the driver, was also the agent of plaintiff in the matter of the care of her child, merely from the fact that he was the husband of Dolly Stout, the woman to whom she had intrusted her child. Appellant takes this position because the amount paid for the board of the child became the community property of the Stouts. We agree with the respondent that it would be unprecedented to hold that an employer of a married woman enters into a relationship of principal and agent with her husband by virtue of his community interest in her earnings.

[5] The question of whether or not, in a given transaction, a married person contracts as an individual or as agent for the community is a matter of proof, and one who sets up the community agency has the burden of establishing the fact of agency. In the case of Schwarze v. Mahoney, 97 Cal. 131, 31 Pac. 908, it was said:

"The right of a married woman to enter into any transaction with any other person which she might, if unmarried (Civ. Code, § 158), gives to her a correlative right to enforce * * * any obligation which she may have received from such other person as the consideration for such transaction, and whenever, in a transaction with a married woman, another person has received from her any property or advantage for which he has given his obligation, the burden is upon him to show that the transaction was entered into by her as the agent of the community, and not for herself. * * *"

[6] In the case of Wagoner v. Silva, 139 Cal. 563, 73 Pac. 433, it was held that the husband cannot be presumed to have been the agent of his wife from the mere fact of the marriage relation. In the present case, the jury has found, under the instructions given by the court, that Louis Stout was not the agent or servant of the plaintiff in caring for her child. Plaintiff, therefore, cannot be charged with the negligence, if any, of Louis Stout on the ground that he was her agent in charge of her child.

There is no proof in the record whatever as to any negligence on the part of Mrs. Stout. The only facts relating to her which appear in the record are that plaintiff engaged her to care for the child, and that her body was removed from the wreckage. If the action had been brought to recover damages for the death of Mrs. Stout, the doctrine contended for by appellant might have been applicable, for in such a case there would enter the rule that a wife in the care and control of her husband has imputed to her his negligence. Basler v. Sacramento Gas & Elec. Co., 158 Cal. 514, 518, 111 Pac. 530, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 642. But in the present case the facts make such a rule inapplicable, for the plaintiff herein bears no relationship whatsoever to Louis Stout and any amount recovered by her would enrich in no way the estate of Louis Stout, and thus violate the maxim that one may not profit by his own wrong. There is no reason, therefore, why the negligence, if any, of Louis Stout should be imputed to the plaintiff because of the fact that his wife was plaintiff's agent.

[7] But, despite what has been said, the decisive question must be met: Was the negligence of Louis Stout the proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's child? For, of course, regardless of agency between Louis Stout and plaintiff, if the negligence of Louis Stout was the proximate cause of the accident, plaintiff cannot recover from the defendant Southern Pacific Company.[2]

On this question the jury was properly instructed, but appellant's position is that the evidence demonstrates conclusively the negligence of Louis Stout as the proximate cause of the injury, and that it should have been so declared as a matter of law, and a verdict directed for the defendant.

With every intendment in the plaintiff's favor, let us examine the evidence. Between 6 and 7 o'clock in the evening Louis Stout, his wife, and plaintiff's child were traveling in a Ford automobile. They were driving south on Workman street, near its intersection with Alhambra avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. Workman street runs north and south. It is crossed at right angles by Alhambra avenue. There are two main line tracks on Alhambra avenue. There is a spur track about 46 feet south of the main line tracks, which leads to the Southern Pacific shops. The spur track branches from the main line one block east of Workman street, and crosses Workman street about 20 feet south of the sidewalk. The track enters and leaves the crossing over a private right of way. There was a wigwag signal north of the main line tracks, and about 120 feet north of the shop or spur track. There was no warning signal at or near the shop track. There is an arc light at about the center of the main line crossing. A network of wires passes under the arc light. At the southeast corner of the intersection there is a board fence about 4 feet high that parallels the shop track east of Workman street. Several trees stand between the board fence and a cottage on that corner. Between the curb and the shop track a line of telephone poles extends from Workman street to Sichel street. The shop track extends between the line of poles and the fence and trees. At the southwest corner, between the Alhambra avenue curb and the shop track, and extending from the Workman street curb 2 or 3 feet into Workman street, there is a culvert or excavation about 2 feet below the street level.

The story of the accident may be related in the language of the witness, George C. Miller, produced on behalf of the plaintiff. He testified that he resided not far from the intersection crossing; that he had gone to the crossing with his infant daughter to watch the trains, and at the time of the collision, and for some time prior thereto, he was standing close to the electric signal on the north side of the main line tracks. He saw the train that later collided with Stout's automobile move east on the east-bound main track with an engine at the far end, then back down on the shop track and stop about 50 feet east of the east line of Workman street. At this time another train was operating on the shop track about 300 feet west of Workman street. When the collision train stopped just east of Workman street Miller saw a brakeman with a lantern leave the end box car and walk west across Workman street to a point in the roadway about 170 feet west of the west line of Workman street. The brakeman had not returned to Workman street when the collision train backed across the intersection. When the train backed across Workman street it carried no light on the rear end, nor was any brakeman or flagman at or near the crossing. The approaching train was difficult to see because the arc light was shielded by a network of wires crossing the street just under it. The automobile passed Miller just as the train started to move. The automobile was proceeding slowly at about a fast walk, and did not increase its speed, but continued at an even speed down the right side of Workman street until within about 6 feet of the shop track, when a woman screamed, and the automobile turned suddenly to the right and went down into the culvert, out of which it bounced at an angle onto the first rail of the shop track, where it was struck by the train and dragged down the track.

The witness testified, further, that he ran to the wreckage about 50 feet west of Workman street, and there met a brakeman with a lantern running toward the wreckage from the west. This testimony was corroborated in its essential details by other witnesses for the plaintiff.

There was received in evidence an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, section 1 providing that from one hour after sunset to one hour before sunrise a train crossing a public highway shall have a light on the approaching end, or a flagman with a light shall precede the train, unless such crossing or track is protected by an interlocking device or apparatus. It was stipulated that on the day of the accident the sun set at 5:30 o'clock, and it was also stipulated that the shop track and crossing were not protected by an interlocking device or apparatus.

It is contended by appellant that it was the duty of Stout to stop, look, and listen for the approaching train because the record contains testimony that the approaching train could have been seen for a distance of over 100 feet. But the testimony is that the train started to back across Workman street at about the time Stout reached or crossed the main line tracks, only a short distance away from the spur track, and the testimony regarding the physical features of the landscape make the conclusion that it was somewhat difficult to see this train at that hour a reasonable one. Of course, if Stout knew of the existence of the spur track at that point, it was his duty to look and listen, but there is no evidence that he knew of the existence of the spur track. The evidence is that he proceeded slowly across the street and crossed the main tracks in safety. Conceding that the electric wigwag signal north of the main line tracks was ringing, the testimony is that Stout proceeded cautiously to cross the main line tracks in response to such warning. After that there was nothing to warn him of the existence of the spur track. It was only as he crossed the main tracks, or after he crossed them, that the train on the spur track started to move slowly backward, with no light and no signal. He had then but a short distance to travel to the point where he suddenly swerved his car to the right. The evidence is consistent with the view that he was alert in crossing the main tracks, and after passing them naturally relaxed his vigilance because there was nothing to warn him of further danger, and that, when the box car loomed before him, moving directly across his path, without light or signal, he swung his car suddenly to the right to avoid a collision, but, being unfamiliar with the physical features of the road, he drove into the culvert, from whence his car bounced to the track directly in front of the train.

In view of this evidence, and the possible deductions to be made from it, the matter of Stout's negligence was properly left to the jury.

"It is only where no fact is left in doubt, and no deduction or inference other than negligence can be drawn by the jury from the evidence, that the court can say, as a matter of law, that contributory negligence is established. Even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury." Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. at page 241, 116 Pac. at page 515.

In the present case, as in the case last cited, there was nothing to call attention to the existence of a spur track, and the two cases have other features in common.

In the case of Alloggi v. Southern Pacific Co., 37 Cal. App. 72, 173 Pac. 1117, a train of cars was backed along a spur track over a highway crossing, at night. No brakeman was present at the crossing or on the train, and there was a conflict of evidence as to the visibility of the approaching train. The court said:

"The evidence was, therefore, susceptible of the construction, as the jury evidently found, that the defendants were guilty of negligence in shunting cars over a crossing used by the public, at night, without lights and attendants upon them, and without warning. * * * And if, as there is some evidence to show, the cars were standing still and disconnected, assuming that there was sufficient light to have seen them, it does not follow that the plaintiff should be required to conjecture or surmise that the cars might suddenly be shunted backward without notice. * * * The court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury that it was the duty of plaintiff to stop, look, and listen at the most advantageous place. He was not required to look at the most advantageous place, for this would be putting upon him the burden of not only knowing the most advantageous point, but also of exercising the highest degree of care, while all that was required of him was ordinary care."

The case of Wing v. Western Pacific R. Co., 41 Cal. App. 251, 182 Pac. 969, is also in point here. In that case the plaintiff had crossed the two main tracks of a highway crossing, and was struck by a train backing along a spur track that branched from the main track and ran up over a sidewalk near the point of the accident. Plaintiff had a clear view of the spur track in both directions for some distance. There was no light on the approaching car. It was pointed out that, had the accident occurred on either of the main line tracks, the motion for nonsuit would have been properly granted, but the condition and position of the spur track, and the fact that the car that struck plaintiff was being backed upon the track without lights or warning, were elements which might cause reasonable minds to differ as to plaintiff's negligence.

The case of Lawrence v. Southern Pacific, 208 Pac. 966, is the latest expression of our Supreme Court upon this question and is in point here. That court said:

"In the presence of such evidence this court is unable to say as a matter of fact that the decedent knew or should in reason have known of the existence of this crossing or of the approach of this train so as to have been bound to stop and look and listen before essaying this crossing, and hence we cannot say that as a matter of law the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence in failing so to do. Under such conditions the question of contributory negligence would be one to be submitted to the jury under proper instructions of the court."

In the present case we think the question of the negligence of defendant was properly submitted to the jury, and its verdict thereon is conclusive upon this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: NOURSE, J.; STURTEVANT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing in the above-entitled cause in this court is denied.

We desire to withdraw from the opinion that part thereof which holds that the objection that the verdict was excessive was the result of passion and prejudice is not available on appeal unless it has been presented to the court below on a motion for new trial. The verdict in this case was not subject to that objection, and it is sufficiently disposed of by the statement in the opinion that it is not such as to suggest, at first blush, passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury.

The passage in the opinion which states that, "if the negligence of Louis Stout was the proximate cause of the accident, plaintiff cannot recover from the defendant Southern Pacific Company," was not necessary to the opinion.

BIRCH et al. v. ORANGE COUNTY.

(Civ. 3962.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 20, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 16, 1922.)

1. Taxation ⊂⊃459—Grossly inequitable and palpably excessive assessment may be considered fraudulent.

An assessment, grossly inequitable and palpably excessive, may be considered fraudulent.

2. Taxation ⊂⊃494(1)—Judgment of assessor and board of equalization not subject to control by courts.

The assessor and the board of equalization exercise judicial functions and their judgment within the limits of a reasonable discretion cannot be controlled by the courts.

3. Taxation ⊂⊃494(1)—When conclusion of assessing officers as to value of property is conclusive.

The conclusion of assessing officers as to the value of property for purposes of taxation, when honestly arrived at and when not made in pursuance of some fixed rule or general system, the result of which is necessarily discriminatory and inequitable, is conclusive on the courts, however erroneous the conclusion may be.

4. Taxation ⊂⊃542—Assessment of assessor, affirmed by board of equalization, conclusive in action to recover taxes paid under protest, in absence of a showing of fraud.

Assessment made by assessor, who did not adopt a method of valuation so out of relation with the factors that should enter into a fair consideration of the matter of value as to cause assessment to be discriminatory and not just when compared with assessments of other similar property affirmed by the board of equalization, held conclusive, in an action to recover taxes paid under protest in the absence of a showing of actual or constructive fraud, even though a better method of arriving at the value of the property might have been followed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action by A. Otis Birch and others, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of the Birch Oil Company, against the County of Orange. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 195 Pac. 931.

Woodruff & Shoemaker, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

L. A. West and Alex P. Nelson, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs brought this action to recover the sum of $11,173.86, which amount they alleged had been paid to the tax collector of the county of Orange under protest. Incidental to that recovery the court was asked to set aside an assessment valuation entered by the county assessor against the plaintiffs' property for the year 1918 as to all amounts in excess of $150,000. A judgment of nonsuit was granted, from which plaintiffs have appealed.

Plaintiffs as copartners owned 20.16 acres of land in the county of Orange, upon which there were, during the year 1917–1918, 9 or 10 wells producing crude petroleum. As a by-product of the wells gas was also marketed, which increased the income. Surrounding this property were various other oil-producing lands, notably those owned by five corporations. Some of these latter were, in 1918, producing more, but the majority less, oil than were the wells of plaintiffs. The plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that the assessment levied against them for the year mentioned as for their real property, totaling a valuation of $569,615, was disproportionate and not uniform with the valuation placed upon other oil-producing property of similar kind and similarly situated; in other words, that their constitutional right to have equal protection of the laws had been invaded. The examples used for comparison were properties of the several oil corporations referred to hereinbefore. The method adopted by the assessor in arriving at his total figures is characterized as being arbitrary and as not being one from which fair valuation results may be deduced. The plaintiffs admit that the actual value of their property was in excess of the total valuation given to it by the assessor. However, as the assessor used but 40 per cent. of his valuation total in making up the tax roll, it appears that his base figures exceeded by $674,037 the amount claimed by plaintiffs to represent the value of their property. They presented an application for a reduction of the assessment to the county board of equalization in July, 1918. This application, it is conceded, conformed to the requirements of section 3674, Political Code. It set forth as the particular grounds that the "assessed value of said property is unfair, unjust, and excessive as compared with other property of substantially the same character and value and similarly situated in said county, and imposes an unequal burden upon the applicant," and that the assessment was "arbitrary, discriminatory, oppressive, erroneous and illegal." After a full hearing, at which considerable evidence was heard, the application was denied. The claims made at the hearing before the county board of equalization were the same as those here urged, and comparison of values was called for in the assessment figures touching plaintiffs' property and that of the neighboring oil companies hereinbefore referred to.

These same plaintiffs were in court heretofore, making substantially the same claims with respect to the assessment of the same property for the year 1917. Birch et al. v. Orange County, 186 Cal. 736, 200 Pac. 647. In that case neither the method used by the assessor nor the resulting assessment figures were the same or similar to those exhibited in this record. It was shown in that case that plaintiffs' assessment was greater than the combined assessment of the four (adjoining) oil companies, when the latter were producing monthly 215,608 barrels of oil, and the plaintiffs only 44,686 barrels per month. The court held that the disparity was so great as to substantiate the claim of constructive fraud, and reversed a judgment against the plaintiffs.

[1-3] The law as it regulates the making of assessments and the securing of relief to a taxpayer is quite fully expounded in that decision and in the decision found in Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. v. Los Angeles County, 162 Cal. at page 164, 121 Pac. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277, referred to in the following: It is clear by the decisions that an assessment "grossly inequitable and palpably excessive" may be considered fraudulent. At the same time, it is recognized that both the assessor and the board of equalization exercise judicial functions, and that within the limits of a reasonable discretion their judgment cannot be controlled by the courts. Judson on Taxation, §§ 464, 472, 473; Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) vol. 2, p. 1467.

"It is not disputed that the conclusion of assessing officers as to the value of property for purposes of taxation, when honestly arrived at and when not made in pursuance of some fixed rule or general system the result of which is necessarily discriminatory and inequitable, is conclusive on the courts, however erroneous the conclusion of those officers may be. The law necessarily leaves the determination of the question of fact of value to certain officers, and when it appoints tribunals for that purpose, as in this state primarily the assessor, and, for purpose of review, the board of supervisors acting as a county board of equalization, the conclusion of those tribunals on such a question of fact constitutes a judgment. * * *" L. A. Gas & Elec. Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 121 Pac. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277.

Attention has been called to the fact that plaintiffs were accorded a hearing before the county board of equalization. They were accorded a full hearing and allowed to introduce all evidence that they wished to offer. This included the testimony of the assessor, and evidence as to the amounts of the assessments made against adjoining oil properties. It was shown by that evidence that the assessor for the year in question used precisely the same method in arriving at his total valuations against the several companies. There was some small difference in the allowances made as for production cost and value of the wells, but the assessor gave his reasons for making the difference, and those reasons were sufficient to support his judgment in the matter.

In arriving at the total amount of his assessment, the assessor first ascertained the number of barrels of oil produced by the plaintiffs during the preceding year, which was found to be 342,570. He estimated a sale value of $1 per barrel (that amount was admitted by plaintiffs to be reasonable), allowed 65 cents per barrel as cost of production, leaving a remainder of 35 cents which he classed as net income. This he multiplied by the number of barrels produced, which gave him his total net income for oil. He then ascertained the quantity and value of gas commercially produced during the year, allowed 25 per cent. off for cost of production, added the remainder to the oil total. Having then a total net income amount he "capitalized" the mineral and gas value by assuming that a net 10 per cent. return was being made to the operators. Multiplying his net income by ten and taking 40 per cent. thereof as the basis for taxation, he secured a total of $529,643. He added a nominal $100 for surface value of ground, and added $39,900 as the value of the wells, approximating $3,000 for each well. The latter amount he estimated to be the fair value of the well casing in a producing hole. The amount resulting from this computation was $569,615. Respondent has tabulated the production figures for the year preceding March, 1918, and the assessment total assigned in each case. As a result it is found that plaintiffs' and the properties of the neighboring oil companies, under the method used by the assessor, were valued as follows:

|---|---|---|
| Birch Oil Company..... | 342,510 bbls. | $529,715.00 |
| Fullerton Oil Company..... | 350,700 bbls. | 431,240.00 |
| General Petroleum Company | 242,269 bbls. | 276,270.00 |
| Brea Canyon Oil Company.. | 288,229 bbls. | 413,700.00 |
| Columbia Producing Company ..... | 277,565 bbls. | 462,965.00 |
| Union Oil Company of California ..... | 730,969 bbls. | 1,300,520.00 |

Answering the argument that the capitalization method as used by the assessor is not designed to produce reasonably accurate results, as compared with the market value of the property assessed, it sufficiently appears from the evidence presented that the ascertainment of the value of the producing oil properties is one of great difficulty, so many and various are the elements which enter into that value. Actual experience may prove that a producing oil property may increase or diminish in value; production quantity may become lessened or the price of the product may be reduced accordingly as the market for petroleum fluctuates with variations in demand and supply. No one can ever foretell when such variations may occur, how great they may be, or how long they may continue. Value then becomes a matter of opinion to a large extent, and may be based upon estimate of the reasonable production probabilities of the property under consideration. It has long been the accepted practice of assessing officers to use an income amount mathematically ascertained as a basis for estimating the value of the property which produces the income. We find the method extensively used in the appraisement of corporate stocks. The Circuit Court of the United States in Chicago Union T. Co. v. State Board of Equalization (C. C.) 112 Fed. 607, approved the method as being legitimate and fair. Such a method, the court said, was a reasonable one to employ in arriving at the value of "the beneficial ownership of everything that enters into the property of the corporation." In the case cited the income was estimated to produce a rate of 6 per cent. on capital. Mathematically considered, the higher the rate the less the estimated capital value. The assessor here took one-tenth or 10 per cent. as his income multiplier. It is not demonstrated in this case that the percentage adopted resulted in the property being assessed at an amount disproportionate to its value or the assessed value of other property of like kind and similarly situated. The physical merchandise constituting the "well" necessarily had to be separately listed (Pol. Code, § 3617) as personal property. The value of the casing in the "hole" depended in part upon its condition and the possibilities of its being salvaged in event that the well was abandoned. The assessor necessarily had to approximate that value, having little to guide him except the current cost of casing and the length of time the particular casing had been in use. He testified that whenever old casing stood in an abandoned well he treated it as valueless; where the casing was in a producing "hole" and doing duty, he assessed it as indicated. There was no evidence offered to show that the casing itself, if removed from the wells, might not have been worth in the market all that the assessor valued it at. Some of the "wells" of the adjacent oil operators were assessed for $2,500, others for $3,000, some at more and some at less, but, as has been mentioned, the assessor gave substantial reasons for making the difference. Having determined that the assessor did not adopt an unauthorized method in arriving at the value of plaintiffs' property for assessment purposes, it at once is apparent that the court committed no error in sustaining objection to questions asked of a witness by whom it was proposed to show the various factors that should be considered in estimating the value of oil-producing property.

[4] The entire cause of complaint of the plaintiffs is answered with the statement that the assessor did not adopt a method of valuation so out of relation with the factors that should enter into a fair consideration of the matter of value as to cause plaintiffs' assessment to be discriminatory and not just when compared with assessments entered against other property of similar kind. Conceding that a better method might have been used, the result is still the same. The assessor exercised a permitted discretion in making up his assessment figures. He treated all similar properties as he did that of plaintiffs. The board of equalization heard and fully considered plaintiffs' application for adjustment, and, with the testimony offered and the evidence of the tax roll before it, affirmed the assessment. The courts are not empowered to make a more extensive review than to ascertain that the acts of the assessor and board of equalization are not open to the charge of fraud, actual or constructive.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WREN. (Cr. 1049.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 20, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⟹1134(9)—Proceeding to recover property wrongfully seized is independent of criminal prosecution, and not reviewable on appeal from conviction.

A proceeding to recover property wrongfully seized and sought to be used as evidence against accused is independent of the criminal prosecution involved, and a denial of a motion for an order directing the return of such goods is not reviewable on an appeal from the conviction.

2. Criminal law ⟹395—Articles, though unlawfully seized, are admissible in evidence in prosecution for their possession.

The unlawful seizure of prohibited drugs on the person of the defendant arrested on suspicion will not prevent their use as evidence against him in a prosecution for their possession in violation of the State Poison Act, since the courts will not inquire into or investigate the source of competent testimony produced on trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Thomas Wren was convicted of possessing morphine in violation of the State Poison Act, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. D. Duncan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. [1] The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of having in his possession a quantity of morphine in violation of the State Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124). Though the offense is a misdemeanor in the first instance, the defendant was informed against and convicted in this case of a felony because of a prior conviction of the same offense. In his application on appeal numerous assignments of error are made, but all of these have been abandoned except the point that the court erred in denying his motion for a return of property which had been taken from his possession and used in evidence against him at the trial, and the point that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the property so taken from the person of the defendant. The motion for the return of the property was made at 9:45 a. m. of the day of the trial, and prior to the calling of the case for trial. Assuming that the motion was made at a reasonable time, the point is not to be considered on this appeal as the motion for the return of the property is an entirely separate proceeding, and no part of the cause from which the appeal is taken. People v. Mayen (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 435.

[2] As to the second point, appellant concedes that, if the issue raised on this appeal comes within the ruling of People v. Mayen (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 435, there is no merit in the appeal. The only material difference between the issue raised on this appeal and that considered in the Mayen Case is that in the present case the property was taken from the defendant's person by the arresting officer, and while in custody following an arrest upon suspicion, while in the Mayen Case the property was taken from the premises of the defendant under a void search warrant.

The facts of this case are that the defendant was arrested on the public streets of San Francisco by a member of the police department on suspicion that he (the defendant) was a drug addict, the arresting officer having had him under observation for several days prior to the arrest. He was immediately taken to the southern police station, and without a search warrant, and without any charge being placed against him, but while still in the custody of the police officer, his clothing was searched and five packages of narcotics were found in the lapel of his coat. He was immediately charged and booked for a violation of the State Poison Act, was subsequently arraigned, and pleaded guilty, and thereafter, upon request of his counsel changed his plea to "not guilty" and raised the defense that his arrest was illegal, and that the subsequent search and seizure were contrary to his constitutional rights.

[2] Whatever may be said as to the arrest of defendant without a warrant, it is sufficient for the purposes of this case that, when the search was made at the police station, and the prohibited drugs found in his possession, the crime with which he was charged was complete. Thereafter the arrest upon the charge on which defendant was tried and convicted was free from any legal objection. The search and seizure of which defendant complains was made before this charge was laid, and is therefore outside of the realm of this appeal. The fact that the property was taken from the person of the defendant rather than from his premises can have no bearing upon its competency as evidence to be produced on the trial. As said in People v. Mayen, supra (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 437:

"There is no rule better established or more universally recognized by the courts than that where competent evidence is produced on a trial the courts will not stop to inquire or investigate the source from whence it comes or the means by which it was obtained."

And, again, in the same case ([Cal. Sup.] 205 Pac. 440):

"But no authority, so far as we have been able to discover, has suggested that the subsequent use of articles so taken as evidence is in itself any part of the unlawful invasion of such constitutional guaranty. The search and seizure are complete when the goods are taken and removed from the premises. Whether the trespasser converts them to his own use, destroys them, or uses them as evidence, or voluntarily returns them to the possession of the owner, he has already completed the offense against the Constitution when he makes the search and seizure, and it is this invasion of the rights of privacy and the sacredness of a man's domicile with which the Constitution is concerned."

Judgment affirmed.

59 Cal. App. 121

PEOPLE v. MARTINEZ. (Cr. 876.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 20, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⟸977(3)—Judgment after application for probation 16 days after conviction within period prescribed by Code.

Where defendant was convicted December 17, and after application, probation was denied, and judgment pronounced January 3, it was within Pen. Code, § 1191, which provides that, upon conviction, the court must appoint a time for pronouncing judgment which must be not more than five days thereafter, unless on application for probation the court extend the time for a period not exceeding 20 days.

2. Rape ⟸54(1)—Uncorroborated testimony of victim sufficient in statutory rape.

The uncorroborated testimony of the victim of a statutory rape is sufficient, considered alone, to sustain a conviction.

3. Criminal law ⟸564(1)—Evidence held to show that rape was committed in county of prosecution.

In a prosecution for rape, evidence and defendant's admission held sufficient to warrant conclusion that the crime was committed in the county of prosecution.

4. Criminal law ⟸369(8)—Admitting evidence of other acts of sexual intercourse shortly after act charged not error.

In a statutory rape prosecution, where venue was laid in T. county, permitting evidence of other acts of sexual intercourse shortly afterwards in V. county, offered to show disposition of defendant and the probability of his committing the act charged, was not error.

5. Criminal law ⟸783(1)—Instruction limiting effect of evidence as to previous intercourse with another than defendant not error.

Where, in a statutory rape prosecution, a physician stated that after examination of prosecutrix he found the hymen had been ruptured, and thereupon defendant elicited from prosecutrix that prior to her intercourse with defendant she had like intercourse with another, the court's statement in ruling that the jury should consider such testimony to show that the rupture might have been caused by another than defendant, but, if they found defendant guilty of the act as charged, such fact of intercourse with another would be no defense, was not error.

6. Rape ⟸49(1)—Not material that victim of statutory rape made no outcry.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, it is not material that the victim made no outcry.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Lino Martinez was convicted of statutory rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. C. Russell, of Hanford, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. On December 13, 1921, the defendant was convicted upon an information charging him with the crime of statutory rape committed in Tulare county in June of that year. Four days after his conviction, to wit, on December 17th, the court convened for the purpose of pronouncing judgment against him, at which time he applied to the court to be admitted to probation. The hearing of this application was postponed to January 3, 1922, at which time his application was denied and judgment pronounced, all in accordance with the provisions of section 1191 of the Penal Code. From this judgment he has appealed.

[1] First. Defendant's first contention is that the court failed to pronounce judgment within the time prescribed by law. While section 1191 of the Penal Code provides that, upon the conviction of a defendant, the court must appoint a time for pronouncing judgment, which must not be more than five days thereafter, it further provides that, where an application for probation is to be considered, the court may extend such time for a period not exceeding 20 days. As appears from the record herein, there was an application made by defendant for probation, and the time for hearing of the same was continued from December 17th to January 3d, a period well within the 20 days provided by the section, and within which time judgment was pronounced.

[2] Second. It is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict of conviction. This contention is likewise without merit. While the testimony of the prosecuting witness clearly tended to prove the commission of the act of sexual intercourse between herself and the defendant, he insists that such testimony was not corroborated. The law that the uncorroborated testimony of the victim of a statutory rape is sufficient, considered alone, to sustain a conviction, is too well settled to require comment. There was ample testimony, as to the truth of which the jury was convinced, tending to show that the prosecuting witness, at the time of the commission of the crime, was under the age of 16 years.

[3] Third. Another contention is that the evidence was insufficient to show the alleged offense was committed in Tulare county. The testimony of the prosecuting witness, while to the effect that she did not know whether the act occurred in Tulare county, was that while living at or near Selma, which is in Fresno county, defendant took her with him in an automobile, traveling southerly through Goshen, which is in Tulare county, to Santa Paula, in Ventura county; that before reaching Goshen, in Tulare county, but near that place, they left the automobile, crossing a ditch near some shrubbery, wherein the act of sexual intercourse as charged was committed. The location of the points named, the direction of travel from Selma southerly towards Goshen, and the commission of the act near but before reaching Goshen, constituted evidence from which a fair inference might be drawn that the crime was committed in Tulare county, and which, taken in connection with the fact that the defendant, in the absence of any threats, intimidation, or inducements offered him so to do, voluntarily stated to a witness for the prosecution that he committed the act of sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix in Tulare county, was sufficient to warrant the jury in concluding that the crime was committed therein.

[4] Fourth. It is next claimed that the court erred in permitting testimony tending to prove that, upon arriving at Santa Paula, in Ventura county, defendant was guilty of acts of sexual intercourse committed with the prosecutrix. The conviction, however, was not based upon such acts, and the evidence as to the commission thereof was offered, as stated in the court's instructions, merely for the purpose of showing the disposition of defendant and the probability of his committing the act with which he was charged. There was no error of the court in admitting such evidence.

[5] Fifth. Counsel for defendant devotes much of his brief to alleged misconduct of the district attorney, and also to misconduct of the court. That of the former is predicated solely upon the fact that, in the course of the trial, he asked some questions to which objections were interposed, and by the court sustained, upon the ground that they were immaterial, irrelevant, and not proper cross-examination. Such acts constitute no ground for the claim of misconduct, and, since the objections were overruled, upon no possible stretch of the imagination could it be said that defendant was prejudiced thereby. As to the misconduct of the court, it appears that a physician was called, who testified that upon an examination of the prosecutrix he found that the hymen had been ruptured. Thereupon defendant elicited from the prosecutrix the fact that prior to the act of sexual intercourse with defendant she had like intercourse with another person. In ruling upon the objection to this testimony, the court stated that the jury should consider such testimony only as tending to show that the rupture to which the physician testified might have been caused by an act of sexual intercourse had by the prosecutrix with another than the defendant, but, if they found that defendant was guilty of the act as charged, such fact of intercourse with another would constitute no defense to the act with which he was charged. We perceive no error in this statement; on the contrary, it was rather favorable than otherwise to the defendant, since it tended to controvert the inference that the hymen was ruptured by the act committed by defendant.

[6] Finally, it is claimed the court erred not only in the instructions given to the jury, but likewise in refusing instructions tendered by the defendant. We have carefully read the instructions, which, as a whole, were full, fair, and explicit, and well calculated to state the law which the jury should apply to the facts as found by them. No purpose could be subserved by a discussion of the several assignments of error based thereon. Suffice it to say that appellant's contentions in this regard appear to be based upon an erroneous construction of the law applicable to the facts, wherein he contends that the testimony of the prosecutrix should have been corroborated, and that the jury were entitled to consider the fact that she made no outcry, and did not immediately complain to others of the unlawful act committed upon her. As we have stated, the fact of defendant's guilt did not depend upon corroboration of her testimony, and the fact that she, a female under 16 years of age, made no outcry, but concealed from others knowledge of the act, was not material to the inquiry provided the jury upon sufficient evidence was satisfied that he was guilty of the act as charged.

That defendant is clearly guilty of the crime of which he is convicted admits of no doubt, and a careful reading and consideration of the record discloses no error in the rulings of the court nor in the instructions given or refused.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re RUSSELL'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9883.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 26, 1922.)

1. Wills ⟸300—Jury warranted in believing contestant's evidence and disbelieving proponents'.

The jury in a will contest was warranted in believing as true all evidence in support of contestant's claim not so inherently improbable as to be unworthy of belief, and in disregarding as untrue all of the evidence on behalf of proponents which was in any way contradictory or otherwise impeached.

2. Wills ⟸386—Evidence to be interpreted to support verdict so far as reasonably possible.

It is the duty of the appellate court in reviewing the facts in a will contest to interpret the evidence so as to support the verdict to the extent that it is reasonably susceptible thereto in the light of the rule as to the jury's right to believe or disbelieve evidence.

3. Wills ⟸300—Jury entitled to disbelieve testimony of interested witness.

In a will contest, the jurors had a right if they saw fit to disbelieve the testimony of the sole beneficiary under the will, especially where they might conclude that she had been successfully impeached by evidence of conflicting declarations.

4. Evidence ⟸318(2)—Statements in letters written by witnesses held hearsay and admissible only to impeach them.

In a will contest statements contained in letters written by the testator's son and sister-in-law were pure hearsay as against the proponents, and incompetent on the question of testamentary capacity, and admissible only to impeach such persons as witnesses.

5. Trial ⟸105(2) — Hearsay statements in letters rendered competent when writers testified they were true, and letters admitted without objection.

In a will contest hearsay statements in letters written by the testator's son and sister-in-law were rendered competent when the writers, in answer to questions, declared the statements therein were true, and the letters were then offered and received in evidence without objection.

6. Evidence ⟸215(3) — Admissions by sole beneficiary under will competent on behalf of contestant.

In a will contest any admissions of fact contained in letters written by the sole beneficiary under the will were competent evidence in behalf of the contestant.

7. Appeal and error ⟸206(2)—Error cannot be predicated on method of examining, when not objected to and letters about which examined subsequently introduced without objection.

Error cannot be predicated on the fact that counsel in examining a witness read in the presence of the jury all or portions of letters written by him, and then questioned him regarding the truth of the statements therein, though such statements were incompetent for any purpose other than impeachment, where this method of examination was indulged in without objection and the letters were afterwards introduced in evidence without objection.

8. Evidence ⟸568(2)—Opinion of lay witness as to sanity of no value except as facts and reasons stated give it value.

The opinion of a lay witness upon mental sanity is of no value other than such as is afforded to it by the facts stated and the reasons furnished by the witness in support thereof.

9. Wills ⟸55(1)—Evidence of change of temperament and character held to tend to show mental derangement.

When a mild, quiet, amiable, and modest man suddenly becomes irritable, harsh, suspicious, obscene, and profane, evidence of such revolution of temperament and character tends to show mental derangement.

10. Appeal and error ⟸994(1)—Bias and unfairness of witnesses go only to credibility, and cannot be considered by Supreme Court.

The alleged apparent bias and unfairness of witnesses is a matter which goes only to the weight and credibility of their testimony, and cannot be considered in the Supreme Court so long as their testimony is not inherently incredible.

11. Wills ⟸31—Nature of mental unsoundness which will invalidate will specified.

Mere mental derangement or insanity in a medical sense is not sufficient to invalidate a will, and there must be either such a complete mental derangement as denotes utter incapacity to know and understand those things which the law prescribes as essential, or a specific insane delusion which affected the making of the will.

12. Wills ⟸55(9)—Evidence held insufficient to overcome presumption of sanity.

Evidence in a will contest held insufficient to show that testator did not understand the nature of the business in which he was engaged, and did not have a recollection of the property he meant to dispose of and of the persons to whom he desired to bequeath it and of the manner in which he desired to distribute it; and hence insufficient to overcome the presumption of sanity in these respects.

13. Evidence ⟸317(18) — Testator's statement competent to show his belief, but not to show truth of facts stated.

Evidence that a testator in his later years told several persons that he found a man in bed with his wife was competent to prove that he then believed such to be the fact, but was pure hearsay and wholly valueless for the purpose of proving that the incident in fact occurred.

14. Wills ⟸55(1) — Presumption of honesty and chastity held to rebut conclusions that testator's claim of wife's infidelity was either true or plain falsehood; "delusion"; "insane delusion."

The presumptions of honesty and chastity, which are but applications of the presumptions of innocence, in the absence of evidence, rebut the conclusions that testator's story that he found a man in bed with his wife was either true or a plain falsehood, and leave open only the conclusion that it was either a delusion or an insane delusion; a "delusion" being a fixed belief that a thing is true which is not true or not true in the manner in which it is believed, and an "insane delusion" being such a belief entertained without any basis in reason or evidence, and adhered to against reason and evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Delusion; Insane Delusion.]

15. Wills ⟸38(3)—Testator's belief, arising long after daughter's birth, that she was not his child, held to show a diseased mind.

Where for over 40 years a testator entertained no belief or suspicion that the contestant was not his daughter, such belief, thereafter first appearing without any fact, circumstance, or evidence then transpiring to justify it, can only be ascribed to a diseased mind, especially where there are other circumstances indicating mental derangement.

16. Wills ⟸52(5)—Contestant bound to show absence of evidence or information sufficient to form basis for claimed delusion.

A daughter, contesting a will on the ground that the testator had an insane delusion that she was not his daughter, first arising years after her birth, had the burden of proving that the testator had not received some evidence or information sufficient in law to provide a basis in reason for his belief.

17. Wills ⟸55(3)—Contestant held to make prima facie case against existence of basis for claimed delusion.

Where a daughter contesting a will, whose relation to the testator was admitted, proved that for 42 years he never questioned the fact, and that his attitude was uniformly that of an affectionate father, and called all the apparently available witnesses who would be likely to know of the existence of any fact, circumstance, or evidence affording reason for the testator's belief that she was not his daughter, and elicited from all of them that they knew of no such fact, circumstance, or evidence, she made a sufficient prima facie case to shift the burden of evidence, though not the burden of proof, to the proponents, and to make it incumbent upon them to show the existence of some such evidence or information.

18. Evidence ⟸317(3), 553(3)—Statement of physician held hearsay, and should not be assumed in hypothetical question.

In a will contest, what a doctor told testator about his having a clot of blood on the brain was hearsay, and should not have been assumed in hypothetical question respecting the testator's soundness of mind.

19. Wills ⟸54(1) — Testator's statements about disinclination to dictate letters held competent on question of capacity.

In a will contest involving the question of testamentary capacity, what the testator told his stenographer about being disinclined to dictate letters held competent evidence of his state of mind.

20. Appeal and error ⟸1048(3)—Evidence ⟸553(3) — Fact assumed in hypothetical question held improper, but not prejudicial.

In a will contest on the grounds that testator was incompetent and under an insane delusion, the inclusion in the facts assumed by a hypothetical question of the fact that the writing of a letter by the testator to the contestant was a great shock to the members of his family held improper, but not prejudicial.

21. Evidence ⟸506 — Hypothetical question not objectionable as invading the province of the jury.

A hypothetical question, asked an expert alienist, as to whether if the assumed facts were true the testator was able to understand and carry in his mind the nature and situation of his property and his relations to his relatives and those around him, with clear remembrance as to those in whom and those things in which he had been most interested and capable of understanding the act which he was doing and the relation in which he stood to the objects of his bounty, free from any delusion, etc., held not objectionable, as calling upon the witness to determine the ultimate question in issue, as the jury still had to determine the credibility of the witness, whether the assumed facts had been proved, and whether they were fair and sufficient.

22. Limitation of actions ⟸127(10)—Amendment in will contest to allege an insane delusion held not to set up new cause of action.

Assuming that in a will contest it is necessary to specifically allege the existence of an insane delusion, the gist of the cause of action thus pleaded is the same as that pleaded by general allegations of the testator's incompetency to make a will, and hence such allegation may be made by amendment, though a new cause of action would be barred by limitations.

23. Wills ⟸384—Instruction requiring testator to be able to remember extent of property not prejudicial.

In a will contest an instruction, which in defining mental competency, required ability on the part of the testator to remember the character "and extent" of his property, was not prejudicial, where the testator's entire estate consisted of a sum of money which he had recently received from the sale of a business.

24. Wills ⟸330(2)—Instruction against will if testator had insane delusion, etc., though capable of attending to ordinary business, not erroneous.

In a will contest instructions that, if the testator was suffering from an insane delusion and the will was a product thereof, or if he lacked general testamentary capacity, the jury should find against the will, though he had sufficient capacity to attend to ordinary business, were not erroneous.

25. Trial ⟸260(5)—Refusal of instructions covered by others given not error.

In a will contest, the refusal of an instruction was not error, where all the essential matters contained therein were embodied and correctly stated in other instructions given by the court.

26. Wills ⟸300, 386—Reviewing court will scrutinize evidence on which jury found against will; sufficiency of evidence to be measured by same standard as in other cases.

Though because of proneness of juries to set aside wills if the provisions thereof do not accord with their own conceptions of justice and fairness it is the duty of the reviewing court to scrutinize with great care the evidence upon which a verdict invalidating a will has been predicated, the sufficiency of the evidence in such a case is to be measured by the same standard and tested by the same rules applicable to all other cases.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Proceeding to revoke the probate of the will of James R. Russell, deceased. From an order revoking the probate, the proponents appeal. Affirmed.

Tum Suden & tum Suden, of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. J. Woolsey, of Oakland, Harry G. McKannay, of San Francisco, and McKannay, Hunt & Woolsey, for respondent.

MYERS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order revoking the probate of a will on a contest instituted after probate. The grounds of contest were insufficient execution, undue influence, and mental incompetency. A nonsuit was granted as to the first two grounds, and the issue submitted to the jury on the third, resulting in a verdict for the contestant. Proponents appeal on the grounds of insufficiency of the evidence and errors of law. Contestant is a daughter of the testator, and the will under contest bequeathed the entire estate to Ella F. Russell, the second wife, and named her and Elbridge Russell, a son by the second marriage, as executors thereof. The unsoundness of mind is alleged to consist in both general mental incompetency and a specific insane delusion that the contestant was not the daughter of the testator.

[1, 2] In considering the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, it is well to bear in mind that the jury was warranted in believing as true all of the evidence in support of contestant's claims (unless it was inherently so improbable as to be entirely unworthy of belief), and in disregarding as untrue all of the evidence in behalf of proponents which was in any way contradicted, or otherwise impeached. It is likewise the duty of the appellate court in reviewing the facts to interpret the evidence so as to support the verdict, to the extent that it is reasonably susceptible thereto, in the light of the foregoing rule. Applying this rule of interpretation to the evidence herein, the facts appear therefrom substantially as follows:

The will was executed July 9, 1919, by the testator, who was then confined to his bed in his last illness, and who died therefrom four days later. The cause of death was "general spinal paralysis," and the disease had first manifested itself in the form of an apoplectic stroke, suffered by the testator September 16, 1916, resulting immediately in paralysis of the left portion of his body and limbs, from which he had never fully recovered.

[3] The testator was born in Massachusetts in 1851, was married there in 1873, and his daughter, Lillian, the contestant, was born three or four months thereafter. Contestant testifies that her father said to her in 1908, "I wronged your mother and had to marry her. I want now to ask your forgiveness." Of course, this is not competent evidence to prove such fact, but it is competent to prove that the testator then believed such to be the fact. On the other hand, counsel for proponents testified that sometime after October, 1916, testator had told him that "when he was a young fellow he was made the goat." Testator lived with his wife and child nearly 4 years, then suddenly abandoned them, and never thereafter communicated with them during the life of the wife. As to the existence of any fact affording a reason for this action, the record is entirely void of any competent evidence. It is in evidence that testator told the contestant, in 1908, that he came home one day and found his wife in company with a woman with whom he had forbidden her to associate, and that he thereupon left; that he had been a skunk all his life, and that he was sorry to have to make the confession. On the other hand, witnesses for proponents testified that he had told them that he came home one day and found a man in bed with his wife, and that was the reason he left. It does not appear, however, that he even told this story to any one prior to 1915, 39 years after the supposed occurrence. The proponent, Ella F. Russell, testified that he told her the story at the time of their marriage in 1892, and that, referring to his first wife, "he cursed the very ground she walked on." But it must be remembered that the jurors had a right, if they saw fit, to disbelieve the testimony of this witness, because of her interest as the sole beneficiary under the will, and because they might conclude that she had been successfully impeached by the evidence of conflicting declarations made by her at other times.

The testator's first wife died in March, 1888, and almost immediately thereafter he instituted inquiries to locate his daughter, which resulted in a correspondence between them lasting until the latter part of 1889. Four letters written by the testator during this period are in evidence, and it is not clear whether or not there were any more. In these letters he repeatedly refers to contestant as "my child" and "my dear child," always refers to himself as "your father," and the letters contain numerous expressions, apparently sincere, indicating love, affection and parental solicitude for the daughter's welfare. In his last letter of this period, dated October 7, 1889, he encloses $10, promises to write her a long letter soon and urges her to write soon and send him her picture. Then he appears to have dropped from sight again, so far as the daughter was concerned. He had removed from Santa Ana, and contestant sent letters to him addressed to Santa Ana, to Oakland, to Alameda and San Francisco, which were returned to her by the post office as "unclaimed." Contestant heard nothing from him thereafter, until 1907, when she learned of his business address in San Francisco, wrote him there, and then followed an affectionate correspondence between them, which continued with more or less regularity up to January, 1917. Some dozens of letters written by the testator during this period are in evidence, and contestant testified that there were many more, which she had not brought with her to California because she had not realized that they would be material. It appears that the letters prior to 1913 were long and "chatty," and abounded in expressions of parental love, affection, and solicitude; that those subsequent to that year were usually brief. Contestant explains this change by saying that testator said to her, in 1913, that her brother Elbridge, was now old enough to write her all the news, that he, her father, was very busy, and that she must not expect long letters from him thereafter, but must rely upon Elbridge to write her all the news.

The testator, in planning and building a new house in 1907, added thereto a room which was expressly planned to be the room of this daughter, the contestant. In 1908, upon invitation of the testator, seconded by the other members of the family, she came West on a visit, and remained six months as a member of the family. During this time she was introduced to the friends and neighbors by the testator as his daughter, and uniformly so treated by the testator, his wife and son. Thereafter she returned to her home in Massachusetts. In 1911, while on an eastern trip, the testator arranged for the daughter to meet him in Chicago, and they proceeded thence together upon a combined business and pleasure trip to this coast, by way of New Orleans and various southern cities. Finally arriving at testator's home, contestant again remained there as a member of his family three or four months. On the occasions of both these visits the testator urged the contestant to remain here permanently as a member of his household, which she declined. The testimony is without conflict that throughout both these visits the relations between the contestant on the one hand and the testator and the other members of his family on the other were uniformly cordial, affectionate, and harmonious, with the single exception that the testator was disappointed and perhaps displeased at her refusal to remain permanently as a member of his household. In 1913 the testator visited contestant at her Massachusetts home, and throughout this visit their relations were equally affectionate and harmonious. On the occasion of this visit the testator repeated the assurances which he had several times previously given to contestant—that he would always see to it that she should be provided for financially. He had made at least one other visit to her during this period.

When their correspondence had been resumed in 1907 he had made her an allowance of $10 per month, which was increased to $25 a month during her visit in 1908, and was paid regularly thereafter until some time in 1915, when it was cut down to $15, which he continued to pay until 1917. In January, 1917, he wrote her, "cannot send you more remittances for present, as I have all the expense can stand here." At that time he was confined to his house from the paralytic stroke, and his salary, which was his sole income had been discontinued by his partner. Notwithstanding testator's action at this time, his wife continued to send contestant the monthly allowance out of her own funds.

Testator did not thereafter communicate directly with contestant (although she continued writing to him, and the son, Elbridge, continued writing to her), until December, 1917, when testator sent her the following letter:

"San Francisco, Dec. 1, 1917.

"Miss Russell as you call yourself. Enclosed find Ck. for $15.00 which is the last I will send to you reasons I am getting well along in years and have a family to support without assistance from anyone which is no joke in times like these I don't doubt but you need money who don't but you cannot get it from me. would suggest you hunt up some of your mothers gentlemen friends who accomodated then and encourage them to contribute to your birth—there never was a young man stung more than I so if you interview them they may held you Minnie and Jim Hagan know some if not I will tell you. I curse her every day of my life and her offspring I hate the sight off and it makes me puke to think off

"Please do not write me again I never want to hear from you I offered you a home once in Calif you would not accept but never again.

"J."

In November, 1914, testator had made an olographic will in which he left his entire estate to his wife, "knowing that she will do justice to all interested," and in which he did not mention either of his children, except by naming his son as one of the executors thereof. In October, 1916, he made a will in which he provided for each of the children, the provision for contestant being an annuity of $35 per month for life, and the creation of a trust fund of $12,000 to carry out the purposes thereof. On July 7, 1919 (six days before his death), he republished and reaffirmed this last will by executing a codicil thereto, whereby he changed the executors thereof, but made no other change except such as was necessitated by the fact that he had in the meantime sold out his business. Two days later he executed the will here in contest, leaving his entire estate to his wife and expressly excluding his son, Elbridge, and his daughter, Lillian, from participation therein.

Counsel for the respondent claim that the evidence proves that the testator, in connection with his stroke suffered in 1916, underwent a mental degeneration evidenced by a complete change of personality. Their claims as to what the evidence proves in this behalf are well summarized in the following language in their brief:

"Here we find a man who, prior to his stroke, was a loving father, affectionate, regular in his habits, apparently in control of his emotions, and friendly and lovable in all relationships, both business and personal, suddenly transformed into an individual capable of writing the document hereinabove referred to to the unfortunate child whom he deserted in her infancy, suddenly claiming that she is not his child; in his business relationship unexpectedly turning upon his partner of 20 years, quarreling with him daily, using the most profane and violent language, threatening to strike him with a cane, challenging him to fight a duel, and in every other manner acting in a most unbecoming manner many times daily before the office employees at the tannery. Before his stroke, he was normal, vigorous, quick-thinking, keen, active, pleasant and aggressive, in business, and after his stroke he could not walk with vigor, his speech was thick, his left foot dragged, his mouth drooled, and his left hand and arm were practically useless. Where before his sickness he assumed full control and management of all of the affairs of the office of a large tanning concern, after his sickness he did nothing. He would go to the office and stare into space, tell the stenographer to answer the letters, told her it worried him to answer them, he could not keep his mind on the subject; that he tired quickly. The general trend of his physical and mental condition was steadily down hill. He lost his temper very quickly; grew irritable and angry; would shout and stamp his cane on the floor. He became vulgar and profane, suspicious of his partner and of all his business associates, aswell as his attorney."

Without attempting to review in detail the mass of evidence on this subject, it will suffice to say that there was evidence which, if believed, was legally sufficient to support substantially all of the foregoing claims. There was also an abundance of evidence to the contrary thereof. This but presents the common situation of a conflict of evidence, which was to be resolved by the jury.

[4-6] Appellants contend that the major portion of the evidence relied upon to support contestant's claims in this behalf is incompetent for that purpose, being statements contained in letters which had been written by Elbridge Russell and by Miss Arnold, a sister-in-law of the testator. The statements contained in those letters were, of course, pure hearsay as against the appellants; were incompetent to prove any fact at issue herein, and were admissible in evidence only for the purpose of impeaching those witnesses. But those statements, for the most part, were rendered competent evidence herein by virtue of their adoption by those witnesses as part of their testimony at the trial. For example, the witness would be shown a statement in one of the letters and asked, in effect, if that statement was true, and the witness would reply, in effect, that the statement was and is true, and that the fact was and is as there stated. After a letter of the witness had been gone through in this fashion, and its statements adopted as the present testimony of the witness, it would then be offered and received in evidence, without objection from appellants. In this connection it may be noted that any admissions of fact contained in letters written by Ella F. Russell were competent evidence in behalf of the contestant because she was the sole beneficiary under the will. Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467, 485.

[7] Appellants now complain of the practice, indulged in by counsel for contestant in the examination of Elbridge Russell, of reading to him in the presence of the jury all or a portion of a letter written by him, and then questioning him in regard to the statements therein contained. Of course, those statements were incompetent for any purpose other than the impeachment of the witness, and it is urged that this procedure was improper, unfair, and highly prejudicial. This method of examining a witness cannot meet with our approval, but the record shows that it was here indulged in without objection, and with at least the tacit acquiescence of counsel for appellants. It further appears that all of the letters which had been so read in the presence of the jury were thereafter introduced in evidence without any objection whatever. For these reasons no error can be claimed in this connection.

[8-10] But two witnesses testified directly in behalf of the contestant that the testator was of unsound mind. Appellants contend that when the facts stated and the reasons given by these witnesses for their opinion are considered it becomes apparent that the opinion is of no value, and is not entitled to be accorded any weight whatever. It is true that the opinion of a lay witness upon a question of mental sanity is of no value other than such as is afforded to it by the facts stated and the reasons furnished by the witness in support thereof. But we cannot say that the facts stated by these two witnesses do not afford a reasonable and sufficient basis for the conclusions expressed by them. The substance of their testimony is summarized in the foregoing quotation from respondent's brief. As was said in 3 Elliott on Evidence, 774:

"If a mild, quiet, amiable, and modest man should suddenly become irritable, harsh, suspicious, obscene and profane, evidence of such a revolution of temperament and character would be admissible as tending to show mental derangement."

Much is said in appellants' briefs as to the apparent bias and unfairness of these two witnesses. But that is a matter which goes only to the weight and credibility of their testimony, and cannot be considered here, so long as their testimony was not inherently incredible.

[11] But mere proof of mental derangement or of insanity, in a medical sense, is not sufficient to invalidate a will. The contestant is required to go further and prove either such a complete mental degeneration as denotes utter incapacity to know and understand those things which the law prescribes as essential to the making of a valid will, or the existence of a specific insane delusion which affected the making of the will in question. Counsel for respondent claim that she has submitted an abundance of proof upon both of these issues.

[12] Upon the question of general testamentary incapacity we are inclined to hold, after an examination of the entire record, that there is nothing therein which is irreconcilable with the following conclusions: That the testator at the time of making the will understood the nature of the business in which he was engaged; that he had a recollection of the property he meant to dispose of, and of the persons to whom he desired to bequeath it, and of the manner in which he desired to distribute it. This being so, it follows that the evidence was insufficient to overcome the presumption of sanity in these respects. There remains to consider under this issue only the question of the ability of the testator to know or understand his relation to his relatives, the natural objects of his bounty. This question, in the instant case, is substantially identical with that presented by the allegation of an insane delusion; the claimed delusion being the belief that the contestant was not the daughter of the testator.

In considering the question of an insane delusion we start with the admitted fact that the contestant was the daughter of the testator. We come next to the proven fact that, so far as the evidence discloses, the testator never voiced a question or doubt or suspicion concerning her paternity until 42 years had elapsed after her birth. Nothing is shown to have occurred at this time (1915), or at any time after contestant was born, which affords any ground, reasonable or unreasonable, for this belief. Counsel for appellants argue that the fact that when contestant was 3½ years old testator found a man in bed with her mother furnished an abundantly sufficient reason to take the belief out of the category of insane delusions. It may be doubted whether, if this were a fact, it alone would afford a basis in reason for a belief which was first formed more than 40 years thereafter; but there is not a scintilla of competent evidence in this case that such an incident ever occurred.

[13, 14] Evidence that the testator, in his later years, told this story to several persons was competent for the purpose of proving that he then believed such to be the fact, but it is pure hearsay and wholly valueless for the purpose of proving that such an incident had in fact occurred. This story as told by the testator may have been either a delusion or an insane delusion, or it may have been true, or it may have been a plain falsehood. The conclusion that it was a falsehood is rebutted by the presumption of honesty, which is but an application of the presumption "that a person is innocent of crime or wrong." The conclusion that it was true is rebutted by the presumption of chastity, which is but another application of the same basic presumption of innocence. This leaves open only the conclusion that it was either a delusion, that is to say, a fixed belief that a thing is true which is not true, or which is not true in the manner in which it is believed, or an insane delusion, that is to say, such a belief entertained without any basis in reason or evidence and adhered to against reason and evidence. At any rate there is no basis at all in the evidence for a conclusion that any such incident as related by the testator ever occurred.

[15] The evidence discloses only this single fact or circumstance to which this belief of the testator can in any way be ascribed:

That the contestant was born three or four months after the marriage, and must, therefore have been conceived out of wedlock. If the testator had entertained this belief, or even a suspicion concerning her paternity from the time of her birth, it might be fairly said that this circumstance affords that slight basis in reason for the belief, which is all that the law requires to take a delusion out of the category of insane delusions. But when it is shown that the testator entertained no such belief or suspicion for a period of more than 40 years, such belief thereafter first appearing can be ascribed in reason only to some fact or circumstance or evidence which thereafter transpired. There being no such fact or circumstance or evidence disclosed, it remains only to ascribe the belief to the spontaneous generation of a diseased mind. This conclusion is rendered more probable by the proof of the many facts and circumstances above referred to, which, as Elliott says, may be regarded as indicia of mental derangement.

[16, 17] Appellants argue that the burden of proof was upon the contestant to prove the insane delusion, and that she has failed to meet the requirement of the law, in that she has failed to prove that the testator did not at some later time receive some evidence or information sufficient in law to provide a basis in reason for his belief. The rule of law is beyond question that the burden of so proving rested upon the contestant, but we are not prepared to agree that the effect thereof goes to the extent claimed for it by counsel. The contestant, starting with the admitted fact of her paternity, proved (by evidence sufficient to go to the jury) that for 42 years the testator never questioned this fact but that, on the contrary, his attitude during this period was uniformly, so far as disclosed, that of an affectionate father. Then, after showing the formation of this belief in the testator's mind, and its apparent effect upon the will, contestant called to the stand apparently all the available witnesses who would be likely to know of the existence of any fact or circumstance or evidence which would afford a reason for this belief, and elicited from all of them that they knew of no such fact or circumstance or evidence. We are of the opinion that in so doing contestant sufficiently made a prima facie case. To hold, as appellants contend that contestant is required to go further and to negative every possibility that testator might at some time in his life have received some information which afforded some basis for his belief, would be to require of her the performance of an obvious impossibility. We are satisfied that in making the proofs above mentioned contestant made a sufficient prima facie case to shift the burden (not the burden of proof, but the burden of evidence), to the proponents, and to make it incumbent upon them to show the existence of some such evidence or information.

Contestant called as witness a physician who, after qualifying as an expert alienist was asked an hypothetical question which assumed the facts claimed by contestant to have been proved. The question ended as follows:

"Assuming these facts to be true, was the subject of this question able to understand and carry in his mind the nature and situation of his property and his relations to his relatives and those around him, with clear remembrance as to those in whom and those things in which he had been mostly interested, capable of understanding the act he was doing and the relation in which he stood to the objects of his bounty, free from any delusion, the effect of disease, which might lead him to dispose of his property otherwise than he would if he knew and understood what he was doing, on July 9, 1919, the date of his will?"

The question was objected to "as confiding the determination of this entire issue to the expert, and invading the province of the jury," and "as not based on the facts brought out in the testimony."

[18-20] Appellants specify in their briefs numerous assumed facts which are claimed to be without support in the evidence. Without reviewing them all in detail, it may be said that the great majority of the assumptions so attacked do find some support, direct or inferential, in the evidence; that the few which do not and which should therefore have been excluded doubtless would have been excluded if they had been called to the attention of court and counsel at the trial. For example, the question assumed that—

"The doctor informed the subject that he had a clot of blood on the right side of the brain which would have to dissolve before he would be able to recover."

What "the doctor informed the subject" was, of course, hearsay, but the jury might have inferred the presence of a clot of blood on the right side of the brain from the proven fact that the patient's entire left side was paralyzed. "What the subject told his stenographer about being disinclined to dictate letters" was competent evidence of his state of mind. The question assumed that "the writing of this letter (hereinabove quoted) was a great shock to the members of his family." This, of course, was a false quantity, and should have been excluded, but we cannot see that proponent was prejudiced by its inclusion.

It is worthy of note that to this question as first framed appellants objected only generally on the ground that it assumed facts not in evidence. It was only after repeated requests from the trial judge that counsel consented to specify the particulars thereof. When he did so the question was then reframed by contestant to meet every objection so specified. Again appellants contented themselves with the general objection, in the face of repeated requests that they specify the particulars, saying they "would rather stand on the objection." It might well be urged in view of these circumstances that appellants are estopped to now claim error in this behalf; but it is sufficient to say that we find no prejudicial error in any event.

[21] There is no merit in the contention that the objection should have been sustained because the question invaded the province of the jury by calling upon the witness to determine the ultimate question in issue. This question when answered by the witness still left for the determination of the jury at least all of the following questions: (1) The credibility of the witness, (a) as to his skill and learning, (b) as to his honesty, impartiality, and fairness; (2) as to whether or not each of the assumed facts had been proven; (3) as to whether or not the facts assumed had been fairly selected from among the facts proven; (4) as to whether or not material facts omitted from the question had been proven. The cases cited by appellants are not in point here. Some of them had to do with a question which called for a mixed conclusion of law and fact; the others with a question which called for the opinion of the witness upon a question not "of science, art, or trade," and which was not a proper subject of expert testimony.

[22] This contest, as originally filed within a year after probate, alleged generally that "the said deceased was not of sound and disposing mind, or of sound or disposing mind, and was not competent to make his last will" on the date in question. Thereafter, more than a year after the probate, contestant, by leave of court, filed an amendment thereto, specially pleading the existence of the alleged insane delusion. Appellants contend, on the authority of Estate of Ruffino, 116 Cal. 304, 317, 48 Pac. 127, that the issue of an insane delusion was not raised by the general allegation of testamentary incompetency; that it was presented only by the specific allegations contained in the amendment; that the amendment was filed too late, and therefore the latter issue is barred. The Ruffino Case does not so hold. What was there decided was that an allegation that the testator was deceived by false representations which were made to him, and a finding responsive thereto, constituted neither allegation nor finding of an insane delusion. The allegations and findings there involved were relevant to an issue of fraud, rather than insanity. Assuming that it is necessary to specifically allege the existence of an insane delusion in order to tender that issue (which we do not hold), still the gist of the cause of action thus pleaded would be the same as that pleaded by the general allegations, to wit, testamentary incapacity. Even under that view of the law the amendment could not be held to state a new and distinct cause of action, so as to be barred by the statute.

Neither is there any merit in the claim that the issue of general incompetency was abandoned at the trial. The court fully instructed the jury upon both issues, at the request of both parties.

Numerous other rulings of the trial court in the admission of evidence are specified as error. We find that some of them were erroneous, but we are unable to conclude that the appellants could have suffered any substantial prejudice therefrom.

[23] Many attacks are made upon the instructions given, predicated for the most part upon a very close and critical, not to say hairsplitting analysis of the words used therein. Perhaps the most substantial error thus pointed out is that wherein the jury was told, in the definition of general mental competency, that the testator must be able to remember the character and extent of his property. Conceding that in the case of a testator whose estate was very large and diversified this instruction might be prejudicial, it is clear that it could not have so operated here, where the testator's entire estate consisted of the sum of $135,000, which was the net purchase price received by him from the sale of his business the preceding month.

[24] The court did not err in instructing the jury, in effect, that if they found that the testator was suffering from an insane delusion as defined in the instructions, and that the will was the product thereof, they were to find against the will, notwithstanding they might also find that he had sufficient capacity to attend to his ordinary business. Neither was it error to give the similar instruction predicated upon their finding a lack of general testamentary capacity.

[25] All of the essential matters contained in proponents' instruction 9, which was refused, were embodied and correctly stated in other instructions which were given by the court. The two instructions given by the court of its own motion are not fairly susceptible to the construction claimed for them by appellants. Fairly construed and read together, the instructions given present a full, impartial, and substantially correct exposition of the rules of law applicable to the questions of fact submitted to the jury.

[26] It has frequently been remarked that juries are often prone to set aside a will because the provisions thereof do not happen to accord with the jurors' concepts of justice and fairness. It may also be said to be the duty of the reviewing court to scrutinize with great care the evidence upon which a verdict invalidating a will has been predicated, where the sufficiency thereof is questioned. But that is the most that can be properly claimed in this behalf. The sufficiency of the evidence in such a case is to be measured by the same standard and tested by the same rules which are applicable to all other cases. So measured and tested, we conclude that the evidence herein was legally sufficient to sustain the verdict, and that no prejudicial error was committed at the trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, C. J.; LENNON, J.; WASTE, J.; RICHARDS, Justice pro tem.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. I adhere to the view expressed in the first opinion rendered in this case (64 Cal. Dec. 37), that the evidence was insufficient to show a want of testamentary capacity, and it will not be necessary again to review it.

It is conceded by the majority opinion that the evidence of decedent's having told the story of the circumstances under which he left his first wife was competent to prove his state of mind. The issue raised by the pleadings was whether he was seized with an insane delusion after the stroke in September, 1916, notwithstanding the evidence that he had such a state of mind from the time he left her in 1876 until his death. In any event, the issue of the sufficiency of the evidence was so closely contested it cannot be said the verdict was unaffected by any errors that may have been committed.

The main opinion concedes the hypothetical question contained inadmissible hearsay statements. This error and the inclusion of the erroneous element that decedent became enraged at his partner "apparently without any cause or provocation" in my opinion rendered the question lacking in a fair and substantial statement of the evidence. The admission of the opinion of the expert witness, the only one called, was calculated to influence the verdict, and should have been excluded. Further, the course followed by respondent's counsel in getting before the jury the contents of letters, written by relatives of the decedent, giving accounts of his physical and mental condition, was clearly improper, and such a practice is condemned in Estate of Packer, 164 Cal. 525, 129 Pac. 778. A large part of the evidence in support of respondent's case was contained in such letters, and their admission under the circumstances could not have failed to be prejudicial. I do not think from the record it can be said that counsel for appellants did not object to the reading of such letters to the jury. They did not object every time such evidence was offered, but that was not necessary, since it appears that the whole course pursued was objected to.

"Where a party has once formally taken exception to a certain line or character of evidence, he is not required to renew the objection at each recurrence thereafter of the objectionable matter arising in the examination of other witnesses; and his silence will not debar him from having the exception reviewed." ## CARSE v. MARSH, Superior Court Judge.

Intoxicating liquors ⊂⊃269—State court has jurisdiction of action for maintaining nuisance under Volstead Act.

Under Const. U. S. Amend. 18, providing that Congress and the several states shall have concurrent jurisdiction to enforce this article by appropriate legislation, and the Volstead Act, providing that an action to enjoin a nuisance under the act may be brought in the name of the United States in any court having equity jurisdiction, and the state Constitution, giving the superior court jurisdiction of actions to prevent or abate a nuisance, the superior court of San Diego county had jurisdiction to try a case brought by the district attorney in the name of the United States to enjoin a nuisance, as defined by the Volstead Act.

In Bank.

Application for a writ of prohibition by W. C. Carse, to be directed to Spencer M. Marsh, Judge of the Superior Court of San Diego County. Writ denied.

A. J. Morganstern, of San Diego, for petitioner.

H. S. Utley, Dist. Atty., and J. D. Malcolm, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court of the county of San Diego from proceeding to punish the applicant herein for contempt, said contempt consisting in his alleged violation of the terms of an injunction issued in a cause then pending in said court.

The action wherein the order was issued, which the applicant is charged with having violated, was entitled United States, Plaintiff, v. W. C. Carse, Defendant, and was brought under the provisions of the act of Congress commonly known as the Volstead Act (41 Stat. 305). The object of the action was to have it declared that said applicant was maintaining a "public and common nuisance," and of having such nuisance abated, and of procuring an injunction preventing said applicant from further maintaining the same. That act declares that a place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered is a "common nuisance," and provides that—

"An action to enjoin any nuisance defined in this title may be brought in the name of the United States by the Attorney General of the United States or by any United States attorney or any prosecuting attorney of any state or any subdivision thereof. * * * Such action shall be brought and tried as an action in equity and may be brought in any court having jurisdiction to hear and determine equity cases."

The section also provides for the issuance of restraining orders in actions commenced pursuant to its terms. The sole contention of the applicant is that the superior court of the county of San Diego has no jurisdiction to entertain said action, and hence no jurisdiction to make or enforce said order.

The Eighteenth Amendment, adopted by the people of the United States in the year 1919, provides that—

"The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited."

The second section of that amendment provides that—

"The Congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

We think there is no doubt of the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the action. The Constitution of this state gives the superior court jurisdiction of actions to prevent or abate a nuisance. The statutes of the United States enacted for the purpose of enforcing said amendment to the Constitution of the United States declares that a place wherein intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered is a common nuisance, and that an action to abate the same may be begun by any prosecutor of any state or subdivision thereof in any court having jurisdiction in equity. The superior court of this state by the Constitution of this state is given jurisdiction in equity, and hence it has jurisdiction by that provision. Such being the case, it cannot be disputed that the superior court of the county of San Diego had jurisdiction within the county to abate any nuisance existing within that county, whether it is declared to be a nuisance by an act of Congress or by the state Legislature, or whether it is of such a character as would be a nuisance by common law. It matters not what power declares the thing to be a nuisance, providing it is done by somebody having authority to act. Undoubtedly Congress has power under the Eighteenth Amendment to declare any place wherein intoxicating liquor is manufactured, kept, sold, or bartered to be common nuisance. The court has such jurisdiction to abate it, regardless of the authority which declares it to be a common nuisance. In the case of Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U. S. 244, 21 Sup. Ct. 345, 45 L. Ed. 497, in replying to the claim that resort to a court of equity was unnecessary, the court said:

"The defendant contends that the law furnishes a plain, adequate and complete remedy for this nuisance by an indictment or by proceedings under the statutes for the abatement of a nuisance by the board of health. Neither of these remedies can be invoked until a part of the mischief is done, and they could not, in the nature of things, restore the pond, the land and the underground currents to the same condition in which they now are. In other words, they could not remedy the whole mischief. The preventive force of a decree in equity, restraining the illegal acts before any mischief is done, gives clearly a more efficacious and complete remedy."

In Stead v. Fortner, 255 Ill. 468, 99 N. E. 680, the court said on this subject:

"There are a number of states where jurisdiction is expressly conferred upon courts of equity, but a statute is not necessary to enable such courts to exercise a jurisdiction of ancient origin and which has always existed without any statute. * * * If there is a statute of that kind it is no more than a legislative declaration of an existing jurisdiction. It would require a statute to destroy such a jurisdiction."

An action in all respects similar to this was involved in the Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 56, 32 Sup. Ct. 169, 56 L. Ed. 327, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 44. In that case the right of a state court having general jurisdiction to entertain an action for the recovery of damages for personal injuries under the federal disability law relating to interstate commerce was directly involved. It was held that civil rights established by federal legislation in the exercise of its jurisdiction, directed to a case wherein interstate commerce was involved, and upon which the states had no power to legislate, were cognizable in the state courts, provided they had the jurisdiction of such cases by local law. The court held that the provision in the statute giving the states authority to enforce that law was unnecessary, as they had the right and authority regardless of the act of Congress especially giving it to them.

The right of the district attorney to proceed in the name of the United States is given by the Volstead Act. There can be no doubt of the right of the United States to avail itself of the law officers of the state for the purpose of enforcing the act of Congress; consequently the case is properly brought in the name of the United States.

Our conclusion is that the court had jurisdiction in the case, and that it could proceed to judgment, declaring the place maintained by the applicant to be a common nuisance, and proceed to abate the same either by the means provided in the act, or by any other means which it sees fit in the exercise of its jurisdiction in equity to adopt for that purpose.

The writ of prohibition is denied.

YOUNG et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. (Sac. 3169.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 25, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1099(8)—Law on first appeal becomes law on second appeal as to matters decided.

Decision on former appeal that question of contributory negligence should not have been submitted to the jury is the law of the case on subsequent appeal, where the evidence is practically the same.

2. Railroads ⟸338—Last clear chance doctrine held inapplicable to motorcyclist on adjoining track.

Where a motorcyclist going about 6 miles an hour was first seen by the trainmen when he was crossing a passing track about 14 feet from the main track on which he was struck by a caboose, the failure to apply the emergency brakes at the very instant he was seen did not render the railroad company liable under the last clear chance doctrine, as the doctrine did come into play before he was in a position of peril from which he could not have extricated himself by the exercise of ordinary care.

3. Negligence ⟸122(1)—Person presumed to see and hear within range of senses.

The law presumes that a person possessing normal faculties of sight and hearing must have seen and heard that which was within the range of his sight and hearing.

4. Railroads ⟸327(1)—Absent-mindedness or forgetfulness not an excuse for failing to look and listen.

Absent-mindedness or forgetfulness will not excuse a person about to cross a railroad track from looking and listening, and a person who attempts, regardless of warnings, to cross in front of a moving train, is guilty of contributory negligence, though he be apparently in a condition of mental abstraction, and consequently indifferent to the peril of his situation.

5. Negligence ⟸83—Avoidable injury to negligent person actionable.

A person who fails to exercise reasonable and ordinary care to avoid injuring another who is known to be in a situation of peril, from which he cannot extricate himself by the exercise of ordinary care, is liable for resulting injury, despite the previous negligence of the person injured.

6. Negligence ⟸83—Last clear chance doctrine inapplicable to contemporaneous mutual carelessness.

The last clear chance doctrine does not apply where, by mutual carelessness, an injury ensues to one of two parties, both of whom are contemporaneously and actively in fault down to the very moment of the injury.

7. Negligence ⟸83—Avoidable injury to person in position of inescapable peril actionable.

Liability is placed upon the party inflicting an injury only where, immediately before the actual infliction of the injury, the injured party was in a position of peril from which he could not extricate himself by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, and where vigilance on his part would not have averted the injury.

8. Railroads ⟸346(5)—Burden of issue last clear chance on plaintiffs.

In an action for death of a motorcyclist, sighted by the trainmen when he was on a passing track about 14 feet from the main track on which he was struck, plaintiffs relying on the last clear chance doctrine had the burden of showing that deceased could not have avoided the collision by altering the direction, accelerating or retarding the speed of his vehicle after the trainmen first saw him.

9. Railroads ⟸350(33)—Evidence on issue of last clear chance held insufficient for jury.

In an action for the death of motorcyclist, sighted by trainmen when he was on a passing track about 14 feet from the main line track on which he was struck, evidence on the issue of last clear chance held insufficient to go to the jury in that it failed to show that deceased could not have avoided the collision by altering the direction, stopping, accelerating, or retarding the speed of his motorcycle after the trainmen saw him.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of nonsuit, entered against them in favor of defendants in an action to recover damages for the death of one Frederick Bluhm, son of one of the plaintiffs.

Upon the first trial of the case, in which both the issue of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased and the doctrine of last clear chance were presented to the jury, the plaintiffs recovered. Upon appeal from the first judgment, entered upon the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiffs and against all of the defendants, this court held that the undisputed evidence showed that the deceased was, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence, and that therefore the issue of contributory negligence should not have been submitted to the jury. And inasmuch as some of the defendants manifestly could not in any view of the evidence be held liable for the death of the deceased, under the doctrine of last clear chance, the judgment was reversed because it was impossible to ascertain whether the verdict of the jury, against all of the defendants, was had in response to the charge of the trial court upon the issue of contributory negligence, or was predicated upon the applicability to all of the defendants of certain instructions, incidentally held to be erroneous, enunciating the doctrine of last clear chance. Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 369, 190 Pac. 36.

Upon a retrial of the case, the court below, upon the conclusion of plaintiffs' case, granted a motion for a nonsuit upon the grounds, in substance: (1) That the undisputed evidence conclusively showed, as a matter of law, that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence; (2) that the doctrine of last clear chance could not be availed of to send the case to the jury because it was not shown in evidence that the deceased, when first observed by the train crew, had placed himself in a position of actual peril from which he could not extricate himself by the exercise of ordinary care. From the judgment entered upon the order of nonsuit, the plaintiffs appeal.

[1] In support of the present appeal the point is again presented, rather by suggestion than positive contention, that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the sending of the case to the jury upon the issue of contributory negligence. The evidence upon the second trial, bearing upon the issue of contributory negligence, is practically the same as that presented upon the same issue at the first trial. This being so, the ruling of this court upon the first appeal "that the question of contributory negligence should not have been submitted to the jury" became the law of the case, and, therefore, binding upon the trial court and conclusive of the question upon appeal.

It is earnestly contended, however, that the trial court was in error in withholding the case from the jury upon the theory that the plaintiffs had failed to sustain the burden of affirmatively showing in evidence facts sufficient to warrant the invocation and application of the doctrine of last clear chance.

The plaintiffs' case, as presented upon the second trial, was rested upon facts and circumstances which, in so far as they are pertinent to the point of the applicability of the last clear chance doctrine are as shown by the record, now before us, substantially as follows:

The deceased, Fred C. Bluhm, while riding a motorcycle at right angles across the railroad tracks of the Southern Pacific Company at "Main Street railroad crossing," in the city of Woodland, was killed by coming into collision with a caboose which was being switched by the employees of the defendant railroad company. Main street runs east and west through the city of Woodland, and is crossed by three railroad tracks of the Southern Pacific Company; the most easterly being the passing track, the middle being the main line track and the third being the switch track. The main line track of the Southern Pacific, upon which the caboose, at the time of the collision, was being shoved in a northerly direction, runs straight north and south. The other two tracks converge slightly to the main line track in their course northerly across the street. The distance from the west rail of the passing track, at which point Bluhm was first seen by the trainmen, to the point of collision on the main line track was shown by actual measurement to be 13.8 feet. The width between the rails of the tracks was 5.1 feet. At the time of the accident the view of a person approaching from the east would be obscured by several box cars left by the defendant railroad company on the passing track, which projected into the street far enough to conceal from sight the switching of the caboose.

While the switching was in progress the deceased approached the crossing from the east on his motorcycle without making any effort to ascertain if there was danger at the crossing from moving trains. He approached the crossing at a speed of about six or eight miles an hour, and while so doing a stationary electric bell was ringing, as was the bell on the engine. The engineer had just previously given two sharp whistle blasts. A friend of the deceased, following in a horse-drawn vehicle about 40 or 50 feet behind the deceased, and who had heard the warning bells and observed the smoke from the engine, shouted to the deceased: "Look out Fred, you are liable to get killed." As the deceased continued to approach the crossing two other persons standing near the main line track were wildly gesticulating at him. The actions of these men attracted the attention of one of the brakemen, who was standing on the right-hand steps of the caboose. Sensing the fact that something was wrong, but not knowing why the men were waiving their arms, the brakeman looked both ways and then for the first time saw the deceased. At the time when he was first seen by the brakeman the deceased was on the passing track, shown to be 13.8 feet distant from the main line track, moving in a direction which, if continued in, would carry him onto the main line track and across the path of the oncoming train. There was evidence to the effect that the northerly end of the caboose, at that time, was only 10 feet from the point of the subsequent collision and moving at a rate of speed approximating 10 miles an hour. Upon seeing the deceased on the passing track the brakeman waved and shouted a warning at the deceased, and then gave the signal for the emergency brakes, which were instantly applied, not because of the signal, but because the engineer, simultaneously with the brakeman, saw the approach of the deceased. The deceased, despite the warning of shouts and bell, continued on his course onto the main line track immediately in front of the train. At that point the brakeman first observed that the deceased seemed confused and "looked as if he wanted to try and save himself." The deceased was then on the easterly rail of the main line track and about two feet in front of the oncoming train. At this point the deceased, so the engineer and brakeman testified, threw up his hands and either jumped or fell backward from his motorcycle. It is an undisputed fact in the case that the motorcycle, after the deceased left it, continued upright and uninjured on its course across the main line track for a short distance and finally fell for lack of balance and momentum, with its motor still running, about two or three feet from the west rail of the main line track. However, upon this particular phase of the case there is direct evidence that the deceased was knocked from his motorcycle by the impact of the train, and this evidence must, for the purpose of testing the correctness of the ruling granting the motion for a nonsuit, be taken as true.

There is evidence tending to show that it would have been impossible to have stopped the train, traveling at the speed of 10 miles per hour, within a distance of 10 feet. It is insisted, however, that there is other evidence in the plaintiffs' case to the effect that the train was traveling at the rate of from four to eight miles per hour when deceased was first seen on the passing track, and that deceased was then 20 or 25 feet from the main line track, and that the end of the caboose at that time was 30 or 40 feet from the point of subsequent collision. This latter view of the evidence is found upon the testimony of the engineer and brakeman, given at the former trial and embodied in their depositions taken after the accident. The testimony of these witnesses came into the case on the second trial primarily for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the witnesses, and their depositions were offered and received in evidence upon the second trial as original evidence. It was explained, however, by the engineer and brakeman upon the second trial, that the differences in their testimony relative to the speed of the train, the distance at which they first saw the deceased, and the distance at that time of the caboose from the actual point of collision resulted from the fact that their previous testimony was based only upon estimates which must give way in the face of the fact established by actual measurement that the distance from the passing track to the main line track was but 13.8 feet.

It is contended in support of the appeal that the physical facts of the case showing the distance of the train from the deceased at the time the deceased was first sighted at the passing track, the speed of the train, and the speed of the motorcycle would have warranted the inference and would have supported a finding by the jury that the engineer did not immediately nor at all apply the emergency brakes upon first sighting the deceased on the passing track; that respondents were under a duty to so apply the brakes; and that a failure to do so when the deceased was first seen on the passing track made the defendant liable, notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the deceased and that therefore the case should have gone to the jury upon the question of fact as to whether the defendants failed to make immediate and effective application of the emergency brakes, and thereby lost the last clear chance to avoid the accident.

Assuming without deciding that the testimony of the engineer and brakeman, relative to distances and speed as given at the first trial and as embodied in their depositions, was substantive evidence which tended to create a conflict in the evidence of the plaintiffs' case as to whether or not the emergency brakes were applied immediately upon the deceased being sighted by the brakeman and engineer, and taking such conflict in the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs' case, still we must hold with the trial court that, as a matter of law, the doctrine of last clear chance had no application to the facts of the plaintiffs' case.

The primary negligence of the defendants having been offset, as a matter of law, by the undisputed showing of the contributory negligence of the deceased, the burden was then upon the plaintiff, in order to avoid the nonsuit, to show that, by the exercise of ordinary care, the defendants, notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the deceased, could have avoided the accident.

[2] Assuming, as we have hereinbefore indicated, for the purpose of discussion and decision, that there was sufficient affirmative evidence in support of plaintiffs' case to the effect that the emergency brakes were not applied in time or at all, the question to be decided is whether or not it was the imperative legal duty of the defendants to apply the brakes immediately upon seeing the deceased on the passing track. The only evidence appearing in support of this phase of plaintiffs' case upon which the claim can be made and based that the deceased was in a position of peril when first sighted upon the passing track, is the testimony of the brakeman to the effect that, upon first seeing the deceased, he gave the signal for the emergency brakes which "means immediate danger." It is argued in effect from this that the trainmen were aware that the deceased was in danger of collision even before he came upon the main line track and that therefore it was the duty of defendants at the very instant that they became aware of the danger of collision to apply the emergency brakes. This contention cannot be maintained. To do so we would be compelled to hold that the doctrine of last clear chance came into play before the deceased was in a position of peril from which he could not have extricated himself by the exercise of ordinary care.

[3, 4] The law presumes that a person possessing normal faculties of sight and hearing must have seen and heard that which was within the range of his sight and hearing. Absent-mindedness or forgetfulness will not suffice as an excuse for the neglect of a person about to cross a railroad track to look and listen for a possible approaching train. And a person who attempts, regardless of warnings, to cross in front of a moving train, even though he be apparently in a condition of mental abstraction and consequently indifferent to the peril of his situation, is nevertheless negligent. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co. v. Hedges, 118 Ind. 5, 20 N. E. 530; Lake Shore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Pinchin, 112 Ind. 592, 13 N. E. 677; Cones v. Cincinnati, etc., R. R. Co., 114 Ind. 328, 16 N. E. 638; Lake Shore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274; Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Whitacre, 35 Ohio St. 627; Bruker v. Covington, 69 Ind. 33, 35 Am. Rep. 202; Rogstad v. St. Paul, etc., R. R. Co., 31 Minn. 208, 17 N. W. 287; Woodard v. New York, etc., R. R. Co., 106 N. Y. 369, 13 N. E. 424.

So, therefore, the plaintiffs' case cannot prevail unless it can be said that viewing the established facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, the case falls within the exception to the general rule which permits the defense of contributory negligence to be interposed to an action for damages resulting from the primary negligence of the defendant. This exception to the general rule is enunciated in the doctrine of last clear chance which, as crystallized into a settled rule of law, has for its basic principle the humane proposition that even though a person by his own negligence has placed himself in a position of peril, nevertheless, an injury to him inflicted in that situation by a person knowing such peril will, strictly speaking, be considered as willfully and wantonly inflicted if it can be shown that the injury could have been thereafter avoided by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care on the part of the party inflicting the injury, and if it could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the injured party.

[5, 6] More shortly stated, it is the exception to the general rule, relating to the defense of contributory negligence, that a showing of a failure to fulfill the duty of exercising reasonable and ordinary care to avoid injuring a person who is known to be in a situation of peril from which he cannot extricate himself by the exercise of ordinary care will render a defendant liable in damages for the resulting injury despite the previous negligence of the person injured. This exception to the general rule, however, has no application to a situation where, by their mutual carelessness, an injury ensues to one of two parties, both of whom are contemporaneously and actively in fault down to the very moment of injury. Rowe v. Southern California Ry. Co., 4 Cal. App. 1, 87 Pac. 220; Denver City Tramway Co. v. Cobb, 164 Fed. 41, 90 C. C. A. 459; Holmes v. S. P. Coast Co., 97 Cal. 161, 31 Pac. 834. In other words, the doctrine of last clear chance excludes from the operation of its underlying principle every case wherein it may be said that the negligence of the injured party was contemporaneous, concurrent, continuing, and contributory with the negligence of the party inflicting the injury. Gilbert v. Erie R. Co., 97 Fed. 747, 752, 38 C. C. A. 408; Louisville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Young, 153 Ala. 232, 45 South. 238, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 301; Green v. Los Angeles Terminal Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68; Tobin v. Omnibus Cable Co., 4 Cal. Unrep. 214, 34 Pac. 124.

[7] Obviously, if both parties to an accident could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided it, neither can be said to have had the last clear chance. It is only when a defendant charged with the negligent infliction of the injury, knowing plaintiff's peril, could and the injured plaintiff could not have avoided the injury that the defendant is liable. The liability is placed upon the party inflicting the injury only if immediately before the actual infliction of the injury the injured person was in such a situation as to be unable, by the exercise on his part of reasonable and ordinary care, to extricate himself, and vigilance on his part would not have averted the injury. French v. Grand Trunk Ry., 76 Vt. 441, 58 Atl. 722; Young v. Southern Pacific, supra.

[8, 9] No evidence was offered in this behalf by plaintiffs, and the burden was upon them to show that deceased had reached a point from which he could not escape by the exercise of ordinary care, either by stopping his motorcycle or by retarding or accelerating its speed. Young v. Southern Pacific, supra. Indeed, the evidence leads to the conclusion that deceased, had he exercised ordinary care, could, when first sighted, have avoided the accident as easily as could the defendants. Deceased, when first sighted, was approaching the main line track upon a motorcycle the speed of which, nothing to the contrary appearing, could have been readily retarded, accelerated, or altogether stopped. It is a fair inference, and indeed the only inference from the evidence, that the slightest acceleration of speed of the motorcycle would have carried the deceased across the main line track free from the impact of the approaching train. True, a retardation of the speed of the train, at the time the deceased was first sighted, might also have permitted the deceased to have passed safely in front of the train. It is certain, however, that an acceleration or retardation by the deceased of the speed of the motorcycle would have avoided the collision. This conclusion is warranted and fortified by the fact that the motorcycle, after the deceased left it, proceeded upright under its own power, free and clear of the impact of the train. And it must be conceded that an endeavor by the deceased to accelerate or retard the speed of the motorcycle would have been less difficult and more certain of success than an endeavor by the trainmen to retard or stop the speed of the train. And this is so, whether the point at which the deceased was first sighted be 13.8 feet or 25 feet from the main line track. Indeed, if the latter point be the true one, as contended by the plaintiffs, then there is even less room for the application of the doctrine, since the greater distance afforded the deceased increased opportunity to stop his motorcycle short of the point of collision.

The testimony of the brakeman to the effect that he signaled for the emergency brakes when he first saw deceased on the passing track and the giving of the signal for the emergency brakes meant "immediate danger" will not of itself suffice to show that the deceased at that time had placed himself in a position of danger from which he could not have extricated himself. That is to say, while the testimony last referred to may have shown that the deceased, when first sighted, was approaching a position of danger, still it does not show that at that time he was in a position of inescapable danger. And until he was in a position of inescapable danger the trainmen were not obligated to apply the emergency brakes, and therefore their application would have been the exercise of greater care than that called for by the law, for under the law they were required to exercise only ordinary care. With the warning bells ringing and men gesticulating at him, it was a fair inference that the deceased was aware or would become aware of the danger in time to save himself, and therefore the trainmen were justified in believing that the deceased would slow down, stop, or turn aside in time to avoid the collision. Young v. Southern Pacific, supra; Basham v. Southern Pacific, 176 Cal. 320, 168 Pac. 359; Green v. Los Angeles Terminal Ry., 143 Cal. 31, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68; Wallis v. Southern Pacific Co., 184 Cal. 662, 195 Pac. 408, 15 A. L. R. 117. Of course, every person approaching a crossing at a speed which would bring him in collision with a moving train at the crossing is in danger and certain to be injured unless he accelerates his speed, slows down, or stops, or the engine does so. Therefore, in order to establish the fact that the deceased, when first sighted on the passing track, was in a position of inescapable danger, it was necessary, as a part of plaintiffs' case, to show that the deceased could not have avoided the collision by altering the direction of his motorcycle, accelerating or retarding its speed, or that he could not have saved himself by jumping from it at some point before reaching the main line track.

There is nothing inconsistent with this view in the case of Basham v. Southern Pacific Co., 176 Cal. 320, 168 Pac. 359. A careful consideration of that case will show that it is very similar to the instant case in its statement of facts and the principle of law enunciated therein. The effect of a decision may not be extended by a reference to a single phrase but must be determined by a consideration in its entirety of the opinion in the case. When read and considered in its entirety, the case last above referred to did no more than reiterate the rule in vogue in this state that the doctrine of last clear chance cannot be invoked and applied where both parties are continuously, contemporaneously, and actively in fault. The phrase "or was immediately about to enter the danger zone" found at page 327 of the opinion in that case was employed in a general discussion of the doctrine of last clear chance and must be taken as having reference to a position of danger where the person approaching is already in such close proximity to the danger point as to warrant the belief that he could not by any efforts of his own have avoided the impending danger.

The only point at which, in any view of the evidence, it can be said that deceased was in a position where he could not have avoided the accident, save by accelerating the speed of his motorcycle, is to be found within that space comprising the distance between the rails of the main line track plus the distance in which the motorcycle, considering the speed at which it was traveling, could not be stopped. And the deceased having arrived at that point without any prior endeavor on his part to avoid the train, it was then obviously too late for the defendants, save by the exercise of the most extraordinary efforts, to have prevented the accident.

The plaintiffs, having failed to show in evidence that the deceased could not have altered the direction, stopped, retarded, or accelerated the speed of his motorcycle after the train crew first saw him on the passing track, and thereby, of his own endeavor, have avoided the accident, it must be held that the negligence of the deceased was contemporaneous, concurrent, and continuing down to the very moment of the collision. This being so, the plaintiffs failed to support the burden of proof put upon them by the law to show, as part of their case in chief, that the defendant had the last clear chance to avoid the accident. This, in effect, was the ruling of this court upon the first appeal of the instant case, upon practically the same facts presented upon the present appeal, and therefore the ruling in the first instance constitutes the controlling law of the case. The trial court, therefore, was justified, as a matter of law, in granting the motion of nonsuit.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. Upon the former appeal I joined in the dissent on the ground that while the instructions on contributory negligence were erroneous, under the evidence the verdict might well have been based upon the doctrine of the last clear chance. To this conclusion I still adhere. I have not been able to convince myself that the former decision is susceptible of the interpretation put upon it by the majority opinion that it held, so as to become the law of the case, that the evidence was insufficient as matter of law to justify a verdict for the plaintiff under the doctrine of the last clear chance, although the law which would govern that issue on a retrial was declared. As I have this view, and as the evidence on the retrial is of the same general import as that on the first trial, I think it was sufficient to have gone to the jury.

McCULLAGH et al. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

1. Waters and water courses ⟸257(1)—Water company held not "public utility" within rate-fixing jurisdiction of Railroad Commission.

Where owner of large tract of land acquired the right to use the water of certain river, and thereafter conveyed such right to newly organized corporation, all the stock of which was owned by the landowner, and where the land was sold in smaller tracts to purchasers to whom the water company agreed, in connection with the sale of the land, to furnish certain amounts of water, which water rights were to be appurtenant to the land, and for which the purchaser agreed to pay annual rate, the water company was not a public utility, within the rate-fixing jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Public Utility.]

2. Corporations ⟸3—Corporation not a public utility merely because articles empowered it to exercise power of eminent domain.

The mere fact that the articles of incorporation empowered the corporation to exercise the power of eminent domain did not make the corporation a public utility, where the power so reserved was never exercised.

3. Public service commissions ⟸19(1)—Determination of Railroad Commission as to character of utility not conclusive as to persons not parties.

Determination of the Railroad Commission, holding that a water company was a public utility, was not res judicata on question of whether the company was a public utility, in subsequent proceeding to review order subsequently made by the commission by persons who were not parties to the prior proceeding, and were not affected by the determination made therein.

In Bank.

Application by A. McCullagh and others against the Railroad Commission of the State of California and the Coneland Water Company to review an order of the Commission declaring the Water Company to be a public utility and fixing rates. Order annulled.

Fred C. Pugh, of Red Bluff, and F. S. Brittain, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Hugh Gordon, Wm. W. Clary, Richard C. Harrison, and Devlin & Brookman, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This is a petition for a writ of review, wherein A. McCullagh and some 77 other persons are applicants for the writ, to be directed against the Railroad Commission of California and Coneland Water Company, a corporation, the respondents herein, and by which it is sought to have a certain order and decision of the Railroad Commission declaring the said Coneland Water Company to have been and to be a public utility, and directing a certain increase in water rates, affecting injuriously the rights of the applicants herein, reviewed and annulled. As to the main facts of this case there is no material dispute, and these may be briefly summarized as follows:

The Los Molinos river rises in the Sierra Nevada Mountains and flows in a westerly and southwesterly direction through Tehama county to the Sacramento river. During a portion of its course it passes for several miles through the Rancho Rio de Los Molinos, a Mexican grant dating from the year 1844. A large part of this rancho came into the ownership of one J. S. Cone, who also acquired a considerable portion of another and adjoining Mexican grant known as the Rancho Rio de Los Berrendos, which properties were at the time of his death, which occurred prior to the year 1905, distributed to certain of his heirs. In the year 1905 one of these heirs, Mrs. Sherwood, conveyed certain portions of the land which she had thus acquired to a corporation known as the Los Molinos Land Company, which had been incorporated in that year for the purpose of receiving the title to said lands and of subdividing and selling the same. In the following year Mrs. Anna R. Cone, the widow of the decedent, J. S. Cone, also conveyed a portion of the lands of these two ranchos, which she had received from the estate of her deceased husband, to the Los Molinos Land Company; said corporation also acquiring additional lands from other sources, making a total acreage of 10,560.19 acres under its ownership during the latter year. In May, 1905, one Smith Crowder, then the vice president and manager of the Los Molinos Land Company, posted along the Los Molinos river notices of his intention to appropriate water from that stream to the extent of 10 inches thereof, measured under a 4-inch pressure, in which notices he stated the purposes for which he claimed said water to be for distribution for irrigation and domestic uses upon the lands owned or to be thereafter acquired by the Los Molinos Land Company lying south and west of the point of diversion. It seems evident that the posting of these notices, while done by and in the name of said Smith Crowder personally, were intended by him to be done for the benefit of and on behalf of the Los Molinos Land Company, since subsequently he transferred all of the rights which he had acquired by virtue of the posting of said notices to the latter corporation, which, during the year 1905 commenced installation of diversion works at the points indicated by said notices, and proceeded with the construction of irrigation canals and laterals during that and the succeeding year, for the distribution of the water thus appropriated over portions of the land it had undertaken to subdivide and sell, including the lands acquired from Mrs. Cone.

In the early part of the year 1907 the Los Molinos Land Company conveyed to a corporation known as the Sunset Syndicate 72 inches of said water in payment for rights of way for its canal. A little later in the year 1907 the Coneland Water Company, one of the respondents here, was incorporated. All of the water rights thus acquired and of the distributing system thus in course of construction were transferred by the Los Molinos Land Company to the Coneland Water Company. All of the original capital stock of the latter, amounting to $100,000 in par value, was subscribed for and issued to the Los Molinos Land Company, and said original capital stock has ever since been and now is owned by said latter corporation. The two corporations occupied the same offices and had practically the same officers; the land company paying the bills. Commencing in the year 1905, the Los Molinos Land Company had entered upon the subdivision and selling of its said lands in smaller tracts to individual purchasers, and continued such sales down to about the year 1912, when practically all of its said lands had been sold. It seems to be conceded that said lands without irrigation were worth from $10 to $30 an acre, according to location, but in connection with each of said sales the Los Molinos Land Company, prior to the formation of the Coneland Water Company, agreed with each of said purchasers that it would furnish each of their respective tracts of land with water for irrigation purposes to the extent of one-fifth of a miner's inch per acre, which said water rights were to be appurtenant to the land in each case, and for which the purchaser agreed to annually pay the sum of $2 per acre. After the formation of the Coneland Water Company the agreements of the Los Molinos Land Company with each of its said purchasers were changed, so as to provide that the Coneland Water Company would agree to furnish each of said tracts of land with water in the same amount and for the same terms. The agreement which the Coneland Water Company was thus to provide was to be executed by it of even date with the deed conveying each of said tracts to its purchaser. Said agreement was to be termed a water right agreement and it was to be therein stipulated that the water right thus created should become appurtenant to the land, and that such water right should only be transferable with and should run with said land. Each of said water right agreements were also to contain, and in each case did contain, a clause reciting that the water company had sold and transferred certain other and similar water rights to prior purchasers of said lands from the land company, and that it was understood and agreed that the water right transferred by the instant agreement should be subsequent and subject to the existing vested rights created by such prior agreements. It also provided that the water company should have the right to sell to other persons under similar contracts amounts of water totaling 10,000 miners' inches, and that in the event the agreed quantity of water in the canals of the said water company, after supplying said prior contracts and rights to the use of said water, should fall short of 10,000 cubic inches under miners' measurement, then and in that event the water rights thereby transferred should entitle the holder thereof to a proportionate equal part of the available water.

The sales of land by the Los Molinos Land Company, with the accompanying water right agreement of the Coneland Water Company, continued thereafter and up to about the year 1912, when the Los Molinos Land Company had thus disposed of 10,145 acres of the entire tract theretofore owned by it and thus subdivided and sold. With the exception of two instances, neither the Los Molinos Land Company nor the Coneland Water Company ever undertook or agreed to sell, rent, supply, or deliver any of said water to other persons than the said individual purchasers of said lands. The first of said exceptions was the transfer of 72 inches of said water by the Los Molinos Land Company in the year 1907 to the Sunset Syndicate for certain rights of way for its canal. The second of said exceptions occurred in the year 1912, when the Coneland Water Company agreed to supply the Sunset Syndicate with 500 inches of water for use upon certain lands owned by said Syndicate and described in said agreement. The consideration for this latter agreement was the compromise and settlement of certain controversies and litigation which had arisen between the Sunset Syndicate, on the one hand, and the Los Molinos Land Company and the Coneland Water Company, on the other, involving certain rights of way for the canals and water ditches of the latter company over the lands which had been acquired by said Syndicate. The waters thus transferred were to be used upon said lands of the Sunset Syndicate for such purposes as it might desire, and entirely beyond the control of either the Los Molinos Land Company or the Coneland Water Company after its diversion to said lands. As a portion of the consideration for such water the Sunset Syndicate agreed to pay the Coneland Water Company the sum of $12,500.

In the year 1912, when the Railroad Commission had become invested with jurisdiction to regulate water corporations under and by virtue of the terms of the Public Utilities Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 18), which went into effect on March 23d of that year, the Coneland Water Company began making reports to the Railroad Commission in compliance with the rules and regulations of the latter as to its method of transacting business, and later in the same year the said water company applied to the commission for authority to issue additional capital stock, which application was granted. It also regularly thereafter filed with the commission its annual report. In the year 1914 two corporations, known as the Los Molinos Citrus Farms Company and the Lyon Cattle Company, alleging themselves to be successors in interest of the Sunset Syndicate in said lands affected by the two agreements above referred to, transferring to the latter corporation 72 and 500 inches of water, filed a complaint before the Railroad Commission alleging that the Coneland Water Company was a public utility, the water rates and charges of which were within the control of the commission, and charging the said Coneland Water Company with unjust discrimination in the matter of its said rates, the contention of the complainants being that their predecessor, the Sunset Syndicate, had been charged the sum of $12,500 for the amount of water to be delivered to it under the terms of said two agreements, while the said water company was only charging its other customers their annual rate of $2 per acre, which was far less than the sum required to be paid by the terms of said agreement for the amount of water to be received by the Sunset Syndicate and its successors in interest.

The Coneland Water Company appeared in said proceeding with the contention that it was not a public utility, and hence was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission. It appeared that the sum of $12,500, which it was to receive from the Sunset Syndicate, was not in the nature of a water rate, but was a payment made or to be made by the latter to it in compliance and settlement of certain controversies over property rights, and that whatever rights the complainants had to receive water from its system of canals was derived solely from said contracts, and was not based upon any duty which the respondent as a public utility owed to the complainants. Upon the hearing the commission went quite fully into the history of the transactions of the Los Molinos Land Company and the Coneland Water Company in regard to sales of land and water rights, and as a conclusion therefrom held that the Coneland Water Company was a public utility, and that its water system was and is a public utility water system, and as such subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission. The Coneland Water Company apparently acquiesced in this decision and thereafter continued its operations in conformity with the rules and regulations of the commission applicable to public utilities. It is to be observed, however, that none of the petitioners herein were parties to said proceeding before the Railroad Commission, nor as to their water rights or rates thereon affected thereby, nor were they or any of them parties to or concerned in the subsequent acts and conduct of the Coneland Water Company in conforming to the rulings of the Railroad Commission in said proceeding, nor in the subsequent acts and conduct of said water company in conducting its business in conformity with the rules and regulations of the commission, up to the time at least when, in March, 1921, the proceedings were instituted by the Coneland Water Company before the Railroad Commission out of which the present controversy arose.

On March 21, 1921, the Coneland Water Company filed with the Railroad Commission its application for an order of said commission fixing just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory rates for water, in which it set forth that it was a public utility corporation, and as such was the owner of a certain system of canals and ditches in Tehama county, California, and was and is engaged as a public utility in the sale, distribution, and delivery of water through said system for purposes of irrigation to owners of certain lands therein described, describing the lands owned in severalty by the petitioners herein, and naming these petitioners as their customers in the sale, distribution and use of said water. It then set forth the annual rate of $2 per acre of their respective holdings paid by each of its said customers and proceeded to allege that said rates were unduly low and unjustly discriminatory, and were unreasonable and noncompensatory. It therefore prayed that the commission fix the rates to be charged by it for its water thus supplied to its customers at such rate as the commission should deem reasonable. The petitioners herein, having been served with process in said proceeding, appeared therein and set forth fully and in detail the history of their and each of their relations with the Los Molinos Land Company and the Coneland Water Company, and alleged that their and each of their rights to the use of the water of the Coneland Water Company upon their said lands had been created and secured to them by contracts which created vested rights in each of the holders of said contracts to the use of the stipulated amount of water annually upon their said land at the rates provided therein, and that said petitioner Coneland Water Company was not, and never had been, as to said respondents, a public utility corporation. Wherefore the respondents prayed that the Railroad Commission find as a fact that the said waters and water rights and irrigation system of the Coneland Water Company had never been dedicated to a public use, and that said corporation is and always has been a private water company, engaged in the sale and distribution of water and water rights to the lands of the respondents sold by the Los Molinos Land Company with such appurtenant water rights for private gain. Wherefore the respondents prayed for the dismissal of said petition.

Upon the hearing of the issues thus tendered before the commission, the facts hereinbefore recited were brought forth fully and in detail. On November 24, 1921, the commission rendered its decision, holding that the question of the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission over the Coneland Water Company had been determined in the prior proceeding above referred to, wherein the said corporation had been held to be a public utility and that the commission had jurisdiction to fix or regulate its water rates to its said customers. The commission accordingly determined that the rates theretofore charged for water supplies to its customers by said water company were unjust and unreasonable, and proceeded to establish water rates to be charged its said customers, the petitioners herein, at $3.50 per year, payable in semiannual installments, making such rates effective on November 4, 1921. The petitioners herein filed an application for a rehearing in said proceeding, reiterating their former contention, which application for rehearing was by the commission denied on December 10, 1921. They thereupon united in instituting the present proceeding seeking an annulment of the above decision and order of the Railroad Commission, and setting forth in their said application herein the practically undisputed facts above recited.

[1] We are unable to perceive any material distinction between the facts of this case, as to the principles involved, and the question presented in the case of Allen v. Railroad Commission et al., 179 Cal. 68, 175 Pac. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249. In that case, as in this, the owner of a large tract of arid land had acquired similar rights to the use of the water of a nearby river, which it was proposed to bring, by means of canals, ditches, and laterals, to its said lands and to distribute the same thereon for purposes of irrigation in domestic uses. The lands, thus greatly increased in value by the proposed use of the said water thereon, were to be subdivided and sold in smaller tracts to individual purchasers under agreements, by the terms of which each purchaser was to receive, as a part and portion of his agreement to purchase the land, a perpetual water right to receive annually a specified amount of water upon his said land, for which he was to pay a definite annual sum per acre thereof. The form and method by which these transfers of the ownership of the land and its appurtenant water right were to be consummated were in practical effect identical in each case, since there was in each case a land company owning, subdividing, and selling the land, and a water company ostensibly owning, diverting, and distributing the water, and issuing the water rights agreement and certificates to the purchaser of each several tract of land in pursuance of the land company's contract with such purchaser that he should be entitled to receive the same; the land company and the water company in each case being organized, owned, controlled, and operated by the same individuals. In each of said cases the water right agreed to be conveyed to each purchaser of a portion of said land was expressly made appurtenant to the tract of land so purchased and ran with said land. In each case, after the land company had disposed of a large portion of its said lands, the individual purchasers and holders of these appurtenant water rights, the water company, finding its agreement to supply water to and upon the several portions of said larger tract held in these several ownerships, undertook to go before the Railroad Commission and have it declared that the said water company was a public utility, and as such subject to the jurisdiction of said commission for the purpose of having its water rates as fixed by its aforesaid agreements regulated and increased by the orders of said commission.

In certain of its aspects the instant case furnishes a stronger justification for the interference of this court with the orders of the Railroad Commission in the premises than was presented in the Allen Case, since in that case said acts and things had been done by the land company and the water company which may be said to have furnished some basis for the claim of the latter that it was from its inception a public utility; as, for example, the record in the Allen Case disclosed that upon the original survey and plat of the lands of the Hemet Land Company there was delineated and laid out a townsite, which was to be supplied as to the lots therein to be sold to later purchasers with water for public and domestic uses and which was supplied as the townsite developed into the town or city of Hemet. As to such portion of the water of the Lake Hemet Water Company as were devoted to such purposes, this court held that there had been a dedication thereof to public uses, and that as to such town or city said water company was a public utility. No such complication is presented in the instant case. The Coneland Water Company never, with the exception of the instances above noted, devoted its water to any other uses than the supply of its holders of contractual water rights; the exceptions being its two special agreements with the Sunset Syndicate for the supply of a definite quantity of water for the independent use of that corporation and its successors. Such an exceptional transaction cannot be taken to evidence the devotion of the whole or any portion of the water of the Coneland Water Company to general public uses.

[2] The respondents, however, contend that in certain of its aspects this case presents stronger reasons for upholding the orders of the Railroad Commission than were presented in the Allen Case. One of these consists in the fact that in the articles of incorporation of the Coneland Water Company it was provided that the corporation should have power to "acquire water and water rights by appropriation, purchase, condemnation, eminent domain, and all other lawful ways and means." It is argued that the power to acquire water by condemnation and eminent domain are essentially the powers of a quasi public corporation, and hence of a public utility, and that the assertion of this power in its articles of incorporation indicated the intent of said corporation from its inception to be a public utility. This court, however, has held in the case of Del Mar Water, Light & Power Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, 948, that "the mere chartered authority does not * * * mark the nature of the operating corporation." Mr. Justice Shaw, in his concurring opinion in that case, puts it aptly:

> "The fact that the articles of incorporation empower the company to engage in public service does not, of itself, constitute proof that it is engaged in such public service, or that it has dedicated such property as it may own to such public service. * * * The only effect of the adoption of such articles by a corporation is to give it the capacity to engage in such public service if it so desires. After having become incorporated in this manner, it has the power to engage in such service in the same sense that an individual has power to engage in such service. It may or may not do so, and until it does, it cannot be said to be subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission."

In the instant case there was no showing before the Railroad Commission that the Coneland Water Company had ever attempted to exercise the powers of eminent domain or had ever acquired any property whatever by condemnation. No significance is therefore to be given to its reservation in its articles of incorporation of powers which it has never in fact exercised.

[3] The respondents make the final contention that the Coneland Water Company has taken on the status of a public utility by virtue of the decision of the Railroad Commission holding it to be such in the proceedings instituted before the commission by the Los Molinos Citrus Farms Co. and others against the Coneland Water Company to have it so declared, which proceedings were reported in volume 8, Opinions and Orders of the Railroad Commission, at page 24, wherein the commission decided that the said Coneland Water Company was a public utility. It is to be noted, however, that the petitioners herein were not parties to that proceeding, and were not in any way concerned in the issues there presented, nor in the conclusions arrived at by the commission in so far as the establishment of any water rates affecting the rights or rates of these petitioners are concerned. Such decision was therefore in no wise binding upon them; nor could the fact that the Coneland Water Company acquiesced in said decision and thereafter submitted itself to the rules, regulations, and jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission have any binding effect upon these petitioners or any of them. The first time that the contractual water rights of these petitioners and their annual water rates thereunder were called in question was in the proceeding before the commission to which they were made parties, and which are sought to be reviewed upon this writ. They then appeared therein and asserted, as for the first time they were required to do, the existence of contractual and vested rights to the amount of water and at the annual rate provided for in the several agreements which they had each received from the Los Molinos Land Company and the Coneland Water Company at the time of acquiring their several tracts of land. The Railroad Commission having upon the hearing in that proceeding ruled against these petitioners' contention and decided that said Coneland Water Company was a public utility and that as such the commission had jurisdiction to regulate and advance its water rates over those fixed as to these petitioners by said agreements, the petitioners have instituted these proceedings to review the decision of the commission in that regard.

We are entirely satisfied that this case comes fully within the principles declared in the case of Allen v. Railroad Commission, supra, and later affirmed and upheld in the case of Stratton v. Railroad Commission, 186 Cal. 119, 198 Pac. 1051. The cases of Traber v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 304, 191 Pac. 366, and Butte County Water Users' Ass'n v. Railroad Commission, 185 Cal. 218, 196 Pac. 265, cited by the respondents herein, contain nothing out of harmony with the views expressed herein, since in each of those cases a state of facts was presented before the commission showing that as to the parties before it the water companies therein concerned had taken on the quality of public utilities through the dedication of their water systems and service to public uses. No such showing having been made before the commission in the instant case, the conclusion reached in the decision of that tribunal, in the absence of the requisite facts to sustain it, is the proper subject of review in the present proceedings.

The order of the Railroad Commission is annulled.

MAR SHEE v. MARYLAND ASSUR. CORPORATION, BALTIMORE.

(S. F. 9778.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 26, 1922. Rehearing Denied Nov. 25, 1922.)

1. Coroners ⟹10—Purpose of inquest stated.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 1510, 1520, and Pol. Code, §§ 4143, 4148, the primary purpose of a coroner's inquest is to provide a means for the prompt securing of information for the use of those charged with the detection and prosecution of crime.

2. Coroners ⟹22—Verdict on coroner's inquest not admissible.

While a coroner's inquest may partake somewhat of a judicial character, it does not do so to an extent which confers upon the verdict any inherent evidentiary value so as to render it admissible in evidence as against either party to an adversary civil action.

3. Evidence ⟹219(1)—Claimant by furnishing copy of coroner's verdict, as required by policy, does not adopt its recitals or declarations.

Where a life insurance policy requires the furnishing of a copy of the coroner's verdict with the proofs of death, the claimant by mere compliance with such requirement does not adopt as his own the recitals or declarations contained in the verdict so as to render it evidence against him.

4. Evidence ⟹89—When fact proved so as to deprive presumption of evidentiary force.

Under the rule that as against a proved or admitted fact a disputable presumption has no weight, and under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1957, 1963, and 2061, subd. 2, that a fact is proved as against a party when established by the uncontradicted testimony of the party himself or his witnesses under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence, when a fact so proved is wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked, the presumption is dispelled and disappears from the case.

5. Insurance ⟹646(6) — Presumption that shooting of insured was not criminal or wrongful held overcome by circumstances.

In action on life insurance policy which excluded liability for death resulting from murder, the presumption under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1, that the shooting of insured was not criminal or wrongful, and hence must have been accidental, was overcome, and would not support a verdict, where it appeared from plaintiff's own evidence that insured was shot twice in the back, and that no person was in sight when witnesses arrived at the scene of the killing; it being inconceivable how he could have been so shot unless the person doing the shooting was aiming at him.

6. Homicide ⇐22(1)—Shooting with intent to kill deceased or person for whom he was mistaken held murder in the first degree.

If the person shooting another intended to shoot such person or some other person for whom he mistook his victim, the killing constituted murder in the first degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Mar Shee, sometimes called Mah See, against the Maryland Assurance Corporation, Baltimore. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied; LAWLOR and SLOANE, JJ., dissenting. WASTE, J., absent.

John Ralph Wilson, C. B. Morris, and Fred L. Berry, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harding & Monroe and Robert H. Borland, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

MYERS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action as the beneficiary under an accident insurance policy issued to Fong Wing, which insured him against "loss resulting from bodily injuries, including death resulting therefrom, effected independently and exclusive of all other causes directly through accidental means." Upon this policy was indorsed a rider or proviso as follows:

"Nor shall the company be liable for any injury, fatal or otherwise, resulting directing or indirectly from murder, highbinder acts, or tong wars, anything else in the policy to the contrary notwithstanding."

The defendant denied that the death resulted through accidental means, and alleged affirmatively that the death of the insured resulted from "murder, highbinder acts, and tong wars." Plaintiff had judgment below, and the defendant appeals on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and of errors of law occurring at the trial.

The facts so far as established by the evidence are substantially as follows: On December 21, 1918, at about 8 o'clock in the evening, the insured, Fong Wing, left his store on Waverly place in the city of San Francisco, presumably for the purpose of going to a drug store on the corner of Clay street and Grant avenue. About 15 minutes thereafter four or five or six shots were heard in rapid succession; there being an appreciable interval between the first two and those which followed. A witness who was in front of his store on Waverly place, diagonally across from Fong Wing's store, ran out to the street immediately upon hearing the shots, and found Fong Wing lying upon the sidewalk mortally wounded. No other person was in sight upon the street at that time, nor was anyone heard running or walking away from that vicinity, nor was any smoke from the shots visible. It was after dark, and the street lights were burning, but it was "not very light" at that point. Fong Wing had been shot twice in the back with bullets of 38 caliber or larger, one of which entered between the shoulders, slightly to the left of the spine, and the other of which entered the posterior portion of his left side, just above the hip bone. Both bullets had ranged somewhat downward in their course through his body, and either one was sufficient to cause death. He died about three hours thereafter.

It also appeared in evidence that the insured was a director of the China Mail Steamship Company, a corporation which had about 9,000 Chinese stockholders; that this corporation had expended more than $3,000,000 in a manner which met with intense dissatisfaction on the part of some of its stockholders, and that various threats had been made against its officers, both orally and by means of anonymous letters. The precise nature of the threats does not appear. Some of them could be construed as threats of personal violence towards some officials of the steamship company, and others of them appear to have been merely attempts to extort bribes or hush money upon the threat to hold up a pending bond issue of the corporation by means of legal proceedings. It does not, however, appear that any threat of any character was directed at Fong Wing personally. It further appears that about six months prior to the shooting a number of officers and stockholders of the corporation, among whom was Fong Wing, had applied to the chief of police, telling him of threats which had been made against them, and asking for police protection.

In support of its contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, the defendant makes two points: The first is that under the circumstances of this case the plaintiff is precluded from recovery by the verdict of the coroner's jury, a certified copy of which was received in evidence. The terms of the policy required the claimant thereunder to attach to and include with her proofs of death a certified copy of the verdict of the coroner's jury, which was done. This verdict found "that said deceased was murdered by parties unknown to the jury." Defendant contends that the verdict of a coroner's jury is competent evidence because found and rendered in the course of an official procceding of a judicial character, and relies upon People v. Devine, 44 Cal. 452, 458, as so holding. The sole question there before this court was as to the admissibility of the deposition of a witness at the coroner's inquest for the purpose of impeaching that witness by showing that her testimony given at the trial was contradicted by her testimony given at the inquest. The conclusion there reached as to the judicial character of the proceedings was based upon the uniform holdings of the English courts to that effect, under the common law and the statute of 4 Edward I, but in so concluding this court overlooked a fundamental difference between coroners' inquests under the English law and the proceedings called by the same name under the law of this state. Under the English law, one important purpose of the coroner's inquest was to ascertain and determine whether or not the circumstances were such as would result in an escheat to the crown of the real property of the deceased, and to make an official record of such determination. 1 Jones' Blackstone, § 478.

[1, 2] In this state substantially all the rules of law governing the conduct of inquests are to be found in the Penal Code (sections 1510, 1520), the provisions in the Political Code (sections 4143, 4148) having to do mainly with the subject of fees and expenses and the preservation of vital statistics. It appears from a consideration of all of these provisions that the primary purpose of such inquest under our laws is to provide a means for the prompt securing of information for the use of those who are charged with the detection and prosecution of crime. We conclude therefore that, while in England a coroner's inquest may be fairly said to be in the nature of a judicial proceeding in rem, no such dignity or weight attaches to such an inquest in this state; that while such proceedings in this state may partake somewhat of a judicial character, they do not do so to an extent which confers upon the verdict of such a jury any inherent evidentiary value so as to render it admissible in evidence as against either party to an adversary civil action.

[3] It is urged by counsel for appellant that if the coroner's verdict was not inherently competent it was rendered competent as against the plaintiff by the fact that she delivered a certified copy of it to the defendant as a part of her proofs of death; that by so doing she must be held to have adopted it as her own declaration; and it is accordingly admissible in evidence as against her, as her own admission against interest. This, notwithstanding the fact that she was required by the terms of the policy to furnish a copy of the coroner's verdict as a part of the proofs of death. In support thereof they cite the decision of this court in Walther v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, 65 Cal. 417, 4 Pac. 413, which appears to fully support their contention. That was an action upon an insurance policy which excluded "self-destruction in any form" as a ground of liability. The defense was suicide. Upon the trial the plaintiff offered, for the sole purpose of proving compliance with the terms of the policy, the proofs of death, which included a copy of the coroner's verdict finding that the deceased committed suicide. This court held that when the papers were in evidence they were in for all purposes; that they were prima facie evidence of suicide, placing upon the plaintiff the burden of overcoming the presumption thus raised; and that, inasmuch as she had offered no other evidence of the cause of death, she could not recover. It was asserted in the briefs, but not stated by the court, that plaintiff was required by the terms of the policy to furnish the copy of the verdict with her proofs of death. No reason was stated in the opinion for the conclusion thus reached, other than the citation of the case of Insurance Co. v. Newton, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 32, 22 L. Ed. 793.

An examination of that case discloses that it falls far short of supporting the rule here contended for and apparently adopted in the Walther Case. That also was an action upon a policy defended on the ground of suicide. The proofs of death in that case included a number of affidavits together with a copy of the coroner's verdict; and the affidavits, as well as the verdict all showed death by suicide. The defendant offered them in evidence, and their exclusion by the trial court was held to be prejudicial error. The Supreme Court held that they "were admissible as representations on the part of" the plaintiff, saying:

> "They were intended for the action of the company, and upon their truth the company had a right to rely. Unless corrected for mistake, the insured was bound by them. Good faith and fair dealing required that she should be held to representations deliberately made." (Italics ours.)

It is apparent that the court in using this language had in mind the affidavits, the procurement of which by the plaintiff rested largely in her discretion, and the submission of which to the company was, in large measure at least, her voluntary act. The quoted language is entirely inapt to describe the coroner's verdict, in the framing of which the plaintiff could have no voice and in the submission of which to the company she could have no choice. We are confirmed in this conclusion by the following language of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, quoted with approval in the opinion in the Newton Case:

> "The effect of such disclosure [of purported facts in the proofs of death] to defeat the action must depend upon the degree to which the plaintiff is bound by the statement. If not sworn to by the plaintiff, nor treated by him in such manner that he is concluded by his conduct, the whole question will be open to explanation and proof." (Italics ours.)

We conclude therefore that where, as here, the policy requires the furnishing of a copy of the coroner's verdict with the proofs of death, the claimant is not to be held, by the mere compliance with such requirement, to have adopted as his own the recitals or declarations contained in such verdict. If the Walther Case, supra, is to be construed as in conflict with this conclusion, it is to that extent disapproved and overruled. We do not intend to intimate that there may not be circumstances under which the claimant under such a policy should be held to have adopted as his own the declarations or recitals in such a verdict and to have thus rendered them competent evidence against him. But no such circumstances have here been made to appear.

There was direct evidence to the effect that Fong Wing was not at any time connected with any highbinder tong, and that there was no tong war at that time which affected the tong or family of which he was a member, so that appellant's claim in this connection narrows down to the contention that the evidence shows without conflict that he was murdered. Appellant concedes that under the circumstances here shown the plaintiff was entitled, in the first instance, to the benefit of the presumption of law that the shooting was accidental, rather than criminal. But it claims that where, as here, the facts are proved to the contrary, the presumption is dispelled, the conflict vanishes, and nothing remains to support the finding of the court.

[4] There seems to be some confusion in the decisions of this state with respect to the extent to which under various circumstances presumptions of law are to be regarded as evidence of facts. The Code expressly declares them to be evidence (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1957, 1963), and admonishes the trial judge to instruct the jury on all proper occasions "that they are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a * * * presumption." Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2.

Among the decisions of this court recognizing and applying the foregoing rule may be mentioned the following: Sarraille v. Calmon, 142 Cal. 651, 76 Pac. 497; Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 19, 77 Pac. 712; Moore v. Gould, 151 Cal. 723, 91 Pac. 616; People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 390, 95 Pac. 863; Freese v. Hibernia Sav., etc., Soc., 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172; Gilmour v. North Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 Pac. 1066.

On the other hand is the line of cases illustrated by the case of Savings & Loan Socy. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 529, 39 Pac. 922, 925, relied on by appellant, wherein it is said:

"Disputable inferences or presumptions, while evidence, are evidence the weakest and least satisfactory. They are allowed to stand, not against the facts they represent, but in lieu of proof of them. The fact being proven contrary to the presumption, no conflict arises; the presumption is simply overcome and dispelled."

Among the cases which appear to follow and apply this rule are the following: Savings & Loan Socy. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 529, 39 Pac. 922; Larrabee v. Western Pac. Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 743, 747, 161 Pac. 750; Williams v. Hasshagen, 166 Cal. 386, 390, 137 Pac. 9; Freese v. Hibernia Sav., etc., Socy., 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172; King v. Hercules Powder Co., 39 Cal. App. 223, 178 Pac. 531; Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Co., 39 Cal. App. 738, 179 Pac. 697; Maupin v. Solomon, 41 Cal. App. 323, 183 Pac. 198.

There is a third group of cases which recognize the rule that, "as against a proved fact, or a fact admitted, a disputable presumption has no weight," but hold also that—

"Where * * * an endeavor is made to establish a fact contrary to the presumption, the fact in dispute still remains to be determined upon a consideration of all of the evidence including the presumption." Pabst v. Shearer, 172 Cal. 239, 242, 156 Pac. 466; Pacific Portland C. Co. v. Reinecke, 30 Cal. App. 501–507, 158 Pac. 1041; People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 179, 54 Pac. 833.

In order then to resolve this apparent conflict it becomes important to determine what is "a proved fact," within the meaning of the rule. Looking to the nature of the evidence by which the fact was "proved," contrary to the presumption in the several cases so holding, we find that in both the Burnett Case and the Larrabee Case, supra, the fact was proved by the testimony of both the witnesses for the plaintiff and the witnesses for the defendant, without substantial conflict, and that the fact so proved was irreconcilable with the presumption. In the Williams and Freese Cases, supra, none of the testimony in support of the facts contrary to the presumption was given by witnesses of the party who relied upon the presumption, and the court in those cases, while recognizing the rule that as against a proved fact a presumption disappears, refused to apply it to that situation.

In the cases above cited from the District Court of Appeal, that court in each instance recognized and undertook to apply the rule, but did not in fact do so, as it was there dealing in each instance, not with a presumption of law, but with an inference of fact. That distinction was pointed out by this court in its order denying a hearing in the Maupin Case, supra.

In the case of Albert v. McKay & Co., 174 Cal. 451, 457, 163 Pac. 666, this court held, in effect, but without discussion, that a presumption cannot be deemed to give rise to a conflict of evidence, unless the presumption on the one hand is irreconcilable with the evidence on the other hand.

From the foregoing we deduce that a fact is proved as against a party when it is established by the uncontradicted testimony of the party himself or of his witnesses, under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence; and that, when the fact so proved is wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked, the latter is dispelled and disappears from the case.

[5,6] Considering the evidence herein in the light of this rule, it is apparent that the evidence which is claimed by appellant to prove that the insured was murdered in the carrying out of a conspiracy to blackmail the steamship company is of such a vague and insubstantial character that it goes no further than to arouse a suspicion or afford ground for conjecture or speculation. Furthermore, it was in no way binding upon the plaintiff. But the proof of the facts and circumstances immediately surrounding the shooting was furnished by plaintiff's own witnesses, was uncontradicted, and its truth is not questioned by either party. Are the facts thus proved irreconcilable with the presumption relied on by plaintiff? In this connection it should be noted that, strictly speaking, there is no presumption of law that the shooting was accidental. The presumption here involved is "that a person is innocent of crime or wrong." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1. As applied to the present situation, the presumption is that the shooting was not criminal or wrongful, from which the conclusion would follow that it must have been accidental. But we are unable to conceive of any set of circumstances under which the insured could have been shot twice, in the manner here shown, unless the person who did the shooting was aiming at him. We are thus led inevitably to the conclusion that the person who did the shooting intended to shoot either Fong Wing or some other person for whom he mistook Fong Wing. But the killing, in either of these events, constituted murder in the first degree. People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 366, 75 Pac. 1093.

The facts thus proved being wholly irreconcilable with the presumption of innocence, it is dispelled thereby, and no evidence remains to support the finding that the insured was not murdered. As the judgment must be reversed for this reason, it is unnecessary to here consider the claimed errors of law.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: WASTE, J.; LENNON, J.; RICHARDS, Justice pro tem.

SHAW, C. J. I concur, but I do not agree that the fact of murder must be proved by "uncontradicted testimony of the party himself or of his witnesses, under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence." Such circumstances must be weighed by the court or jury, and the testimony need not be uncontradicted.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. The majority opinion concedes the legal presumption that the killing was not criminal applies, but holds that the evidence offered on behalf of respondent that the decedent was twice shot in the back constituted a proved fact, within the meaning of the rule there laid down, which rebutted that presumption. It may be assumed on appeal that a fact is proved and such a presumption dispelled within the meaning of the rule when, for instance, a witness for the party claiming the presumption testified directly to the contrary, or when the uncontradicted testimony offered by such a party is irreconcilably opposed to the presumption. But such an assumption is not to be indulged if in determining whether a fact has been proved it is necessary to consider the probative force of the evidence. In every case the presumption and the other evidence must be considered together. In either of the above instances only one inference could be drawn from the evidence, and that would be in favor of the other party. Of course, where opposing inferences may be drawn, the one found by the trial court will not be disturbed on appeal.

The main opinion proceeds on the theory that, as matter of law, only one inference is deducible from the evidence offered by respondent, and that therefore the presumption has been overcome. In my opinion the evidence is susceptible of two inferences—either that the killing was not intentional or that it was murder.

The circumstances are these: Suddenly several shots were heard, and two bullets were found in different portions of decedent's back. Wong Ming Yin went immediately to the scene. He saw no other person in the vicinity. No smoke was visible, no weapons were found, and no one was heard running away. The only statement made by the wounded man was to give his name. It may be remarked that if we were considering whether the foregoing evidence established the corpus delicti it could hardly be claimed we would not be bound to uphold a finding either that the death was or was not caused by criminal means.

In appellant's third amended answer it is alleged that Fong Wing's death was directly caused by highbinder acts or by other unlawful acts and personal disputes and tong wars which resulted in his murder. The finding is a negation of this defense. Concerning the evidence admitted under the above allegations of the answer as tending to establish a motive for the killing, it may be pointed out that several settlements had been made by the officers of the steamship company, of whom the deceased was one, with the dissatisfied stockholders; that six months intervened between the request for police protection and the shooting; that deceased was not a member of a fighting tong. One Fong Fat testified as follows:

"Q. When you first heard the first shot, that is when the sound came to your ear, did you look out? A. I looked out as much as I could, but I don't care to go out. Q. Why didn't you care to go out? A. There was more or less trouble going on you know. Q. In Chinatown? A. Among the tongs. The chances if I would go out I might get in the way, there is so much flying bullets anyways, and one is liable to catch it, so I did not care to go out."

Man Quong Fong, general manager of the steamship company, testified that—

"After the death of Mr. Fong Wing we at that time, and even up to the present time, did not know the reason for his death."

There is no evidence that the deceased took an active part in the affairs of the steamship company which led to the trouble between the officers and the stockholders, although he joined in the request for police protection. It was testified that no weapons were taken from Fong Wing.

In weighing the probabilities of the evidence it is conceivable to me that the trial court could have concluded, as against the circumstance upon which the prevailing opinion relies—that two bullets were in Fong Wing's back—that it was more likely he came to his death as a result of a shooting affray between other Chinese than that he was the object of assassination. Upon the face of the evidence one theory would be no more speculative than the other. The fact that Fong Wing was unarmed and that there was an interval after the second shot, might have indicated to the trial court that the shooting was between other persons. Under either theory those responsible for the shooting would naturally disappear and take their weapons with them.

Evidence of the presence or absence of motive is always admissible in such cases, and often is of a most persuasive character. It must be presumed from the record in this case and in favor of the finding that the court decided there was no motive for the killing. It may also have reasoned that if the shooting was intentional Fong Wing would have said more to his fellow countryman than to merely mention his name, and that more than two of the bullets would have found lodgment in his body.

In the summary of the evidence I have not attempted to determine its probative value, but have only considered the effect which the court below might have given to it. I cannot avoid the conclusion that the evidence would support either theory, and that for this court to hold it could not have the effect stated in the findings is to invade the province of the trial court. It seems plain to me beyond controversy that in arriving at the conclusion that only one inference could be drawn from the evidence the majority opinion must of necessity have passed on its probative effect, for there is no presumption or other rule of law that the presence of two bullets in a person's back is sufficient proof of murder. I do not think it can be held on appeal that this circumstance avails as matter of law against all the other facts and circumstances which the trial court may have inferred from the evidence, for before it can be said that such a circumstance is irreconcilably opposed to the presumption its probative effect must be determined.

PEOPLE v. HERBERT. (Cr. 1061.)

1. Poisons ⟸9—Evidence held to connect defendant with possession of narcotics.

In a prosecution under Poison Act, § 8, for possession of a preparation of morphine, evidence that at the time defendant was arrested he threw something away, that with the aid of a flash light the arresting officers found several packages a few feet away, which defendant admitted contained morphine and cocaine, was sufficient to show possession of the drugs in defendant.

2. Poisons ⟸9—Instruction as to possession of narcotics held not erroneous.

In a prosecution under Poison Act, § 8, for possession of a preparation of morphine, an instruction that the burden of proving possession of the narcotics rested on the prosecution, and such possession must have been immediate and exclusive possession, and one under the dominion and control of defendant, correctly stated the law.

3. Criminal law ⟸730(12)—Remarks of counsel held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution under Poison Act, § 8, for possession of morphine, remarks by the district attorney in closing argument, suggesting to the jury that defendant appeared to be and was a drug addict was not prejudicial where the court charged the jury to disregard the remarks.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Sidney Herbert was convicted of violating the Poison Act. From the judgment of conviction, and an order denying motion for new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Reuben J. Liebman, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant was accused of a violation of the State Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124), was tried by a jury and found guilty, and this is an appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The information charged the defendant with willfully and feloniously having in his possession a preparation of morphine, contrary to the provisions of section 8 of the act above referred to, and also with having been convicted of a prior offense under the same act.

It was proved at the trial that an inspector for the state board of pharmacy, whose duty it is to arrest violators of the State Poison Act, had received information to the effect that defendant was a narcotic peddler, and that he thereupon determined to intercept and arrest him for his unlawful practice. Accordingly he and his assistant procured a woman who was addicted to the use of narcotics to go to defendant and make a purchase of certain drugs. Defendant undertook to procure the same and accepted the purchase price therefor, and agreed to meet her at an appointed place to deliver the drugs to her. The inspector and his assistant repaired to the place designated. Defendant appeared and was immediately placed under arrest. The inspector, in taking hold of the arm of defendant, felt the latter make a motion as if throwing something away, and an object was heard to drop upon the street pavement. Upon investigation with the assistance of a flash light, several packages were found some 8 to 15 feet away from where the parties were standing. Defendant, upon being questioned as to what the packages contained, admitted that they were made up of morphine and cocaine. When asked to account for his presence in the vicinity, he stated that he was there for the purpose of returning to the drug addict the money he had received from her, as he had been unable to make the purchase of the narcotics she desired.

[1] As ground for reversal it is urged that the evidence is insufficient to show possession in defendant of the drugs in question, and that defendant's objection to the admission of the packages in evidence should have been sustained. We see no merit in this contention. Taking all the facts into consideration, together with the admission by defendant as to the contents of the packages, they certainly constituted sufficient evidence to connect defendant with possession of the narcotics. In this connection defendant also complains of the instructions of the trial court upon the question of possession. He contends that the rule is that the possession must be personal and not constructive.

[2] The court instructed the jury in effect that the burden of proving possession of the narcotics as alleged in the information rested upon the prosecution, and such possession must have been an immediate and exclusive possession and one under the dominion and control of defendant. The instructions given by the court fully and correctly stated the law upon the subject.

[3] Complaint is also made that the district attorney erred in his closing argument by suggesting to the jury that defendant appeared to be and was a drug addict. These remarks could in no manner have prejudiced the rights of the defendant, for the court guarded those rights by charging the jury that they should disregard the statement. Under such circumstances it is not to be presumed that the jury ignored the charge, nor that the defendant's substantial rights were injuriously affected. People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 Pac. 372.

For the reasons given the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: KERIGAN, J.; ST. SURE, Justice pro tem.

LANE v. STARKEY et al. (Civ. 4288.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 21, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 20, 1922.)

1. Executors and administrators ⊂⊃29(5) — Letters of administration conclusive of qualification and regularity of proceedings when attacked collaterally.

Letters of administration regular on their face can be attacked only in a direct proceeding, as they are conclusive as to due qualification and authority of the administrator to act and of the regularity of the proceedings leading up to their issuance in the case of collateral attack.

2. Limitation of actions ⊂⊃174(2) — Minor heirs barred by failure of the administrator to sue for possession of property.

Minor heirs are barred by the statute of limitations because of the failure of the administrator or executor to sue to recover possession of real property belonging to the estate within five years after the disseizin, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 1452, providing the heirs or devisees may themselves, or jointly with the executor or administrator, sue for the possession of real estate or for the purpose of quieting title to the same against any one except the executor or administrator, but that "this section shall not be so construed as requiring them so to do."

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by George W. Lane against Mrs. G. T. Starkey and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, and R. D. McLaughlin and J. B. McLaughlin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Thomas, Thomas & McCowen, of Ukiah, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them in an action to quiet title to real property in Mendocino county, Cal. The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that Charles H. Starkey, the former husband of defendant Mrs. G. T. Starkey, died in the county of Mendocino on September 6, 1904. He left an estate therein consisting of certain personal property, and there was also standing of record in his name at the time of his death certain real property being the same property described in the complaint herein, upon which he was living at the time of his death.

The said decedent left as his heirs at law Mrs. G. T. Starkey, his widow; Marshall Ney Starkey, one of the defendants herein, a minor son, who was at the time of the filing of the complaint herein of the age of 18 years and appeared by his guardian; Elizabeth Margaret Starkey, a minor daughter, who died in February, 1918, at the age of 18 years, and whose interest herein is represented by the administrator of her estate; and Hazel Gertrude Starkey, a minor daughter, who died in March, 1914, at the age of 12 years, and whose interest herein is also represented by the administrator of her estate.

On October 5, 1904, Mrs. Starkey filed her petition to be appointed administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, and thereafter, on October 17, 1904, an order was duly made and entered that she be appointed administratrix of said estate, and that letters of administration issue to her upon her taking the oath and filing a bond according to law in the sum of $500. Thereafter, and on the 20th day of October, 1904, a bond was filed in the sum prescribed, signed by Mrs. Starkey and B. Edwards and A. H. Ewert. The said sureties failed to justify on said bond in the following particular: There does not appear on said bond the name of any notary or person authorized to administer oaths, nor the seal of such officer or person. It does not appear on said bond or in the records in said probate proceeding that said bond was ever approved by any judge or other person authorized to approve the same. On October 20, 1904, Mrs. Starkey took the oath as administratrix, and letters of administration were issued to her by the clerk of the court. Appraisers of said estate were appointed according to law, and an inventory and appraisement returned and filed on October 24, 1904. The real property involved in the present action was not returned in the inventory as a part of said estate; the only property appearing in the inventory being personal property of the appraised value of $143.50. The inventory was not sworn to by the administratrix.

On October 24, 1904, Mrs. Starkey, as surviving widow, filed her petition, praying that all of the personal property of said estate be set aside to her for the use and benefit of herself and her minor children, and an order was made in accordance with said prayer. The said estate of Charles H. Starkey has never been closed.

Plaintiff has been in possession of the real property described in the complaint since on or about February 17, 1906, during which time he has paid all taxes or assessments levied or assessed against the property, and during which time the said realty has been inclosed by a substantial inclosure, and has been occupied by plaintiff, claiming to own it against all persons, and the possession of said plaintiff has been under a claim of right and ownership, and his possession and claim have been open and notorious.

Defendants made no claim to the said property prior to the commencement of this action, and Mrs. Starkey had no knowledge that the legal title to said property was in her husband at the time of his death until on or about January 1, 1921.

Two questions are argued by the parties to the appeal. One of the contentions of the appellants is that because of the defect in the bond filed by the administratrix, heretofore mentioned, and because of the defect in the inventory caused by the absence of the oath of the administratrix, the administratrix was not duly appointed pursuant to law, and, in the language of appellants, "any acts or failures to act on her part in the matter are void."

[1] The answer to this contention is that letters of administration regular on their face may be attacked only in a direct proceeding and not collaterally. They are conclusive evidence of the due qualification and authority to act of the administrator and of the regularity of the proceedings leading up to their issuance in a case of collateral attack. Dennis v. Bint, 122 Cal. 39, 42, 54 Pac. 378, 68 Am. St. Rep. 17; Baxter v. Boege, 173 Cal. 589, 595, 596, 160 Pac. 1072; Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 318, 322, 323, 86 Pac. 183, 90 Pac. 711, 121 Am. St. Rep. 105; Bank of Commerce v. Humphrey, 41 Cal. App. 552, 554, 83 Pac. 222.

[2] The only other question in the case is whether the minor heirs are barred by the statute of limitations because of the failure of the administratrix to start action to recover the possession of the real property within five years after the disseizin.

The appellants rely upon the cases of Crosby v. Dowd, 61 Cal. 557, 587, and Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 170, 27 Pac. 658. The former is a direct holding in accordance with appellants' views after a most elaborate consideration of the subject, and the latter contains a sentence which, while unnecessary to a decision of the case, is in harmony with the holding in the earlier case.

However, the Supreme Court of this state has recognized that there is some conflict in the decisions upon this question (Patchett v. Pacific Coast Ry. Co., 100 Cal., at page 509, 35 Pac. 73), and after expressly taking account of the divergence among the cases, has held, in Patchett v. Pacific Coast Ry. Co., supra, that when the right of action vests in an executor, guardian, or trustee who is under no legal disability, the statute will commence to run despite the disability of the minor, and if the right is lost by the neglect of the representative to sue, the minor is barred. This conclusion was based upon some of the very arguments which were discussed and rejected in the case of Crosby v. Dowd, supra. Under such circumstances, we apprehend that it is not the province of this court to analyze the conflicting cases. We think we are bound by the latest expression of the Supreme Court upon the subject which settled the question in this state.

Appellants do not fail to take note of the cases in conflict with their views, but they argue that because of certain language contained in section 1452, Code of Civil Procedure—i. e., "The heirs or devisees may themselves, or jointly with the executor or administrator, maintain an action for the possession of the real estate, or for the purpose of quieting title to the same, against any one except the executor or administrator: but this section shall not be so construed as requiring them so to do"—the holding in Crosby v. Dowd, supra, presents the better rule. In reply to this, we take occasion to point out that, while section 1452 of the Code of Civil Procedure in its entire present form was not a part of our Code of Civil Procedure in 1893, when the case of Patchett v. Pacific Coast Ry. Co. was decided, the portion of the same relied upon by appellants and herein quoted was in force and effect at that time, and had been the law of this state since 1872. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: NOURSE, J.; STURTEVANT, J.

BAR ASS'N OF SAN FRANCISCO v. DEVALL. (Civ. 4316.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 29, 1922.)

1. Attorney and client ⟸53(2)—Evidence in disbarment proceedings held insufficient to show responsibility for insertion of date in will.

In disbarment proceedings, evidence held insufficient to show that accused inserted a date or caused it to be inserted in a purported will before it was offered for probate.

2. Attorney and client ⟸42—Attorney suggesting erasure of printed matter in will violates duty not to mislead judge by artifice of fact.

An attorney who, believing that certain printed matter on a will invalidated it under Civ. Code, § 1277, suggested that it be erased, may be removed or suspended, under Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 2, for violation of his duty under section 282, subd. 4, never to seek to mislead the judge by an artifice of fact.

3. Attorney and client ⟸58—Attorney suggesting erasure of printed matter on will suspended for six months.

An attorney who appeared in propria persona at the hearing on June 29, 1922, of accusations filed June 6th by the bar association looking toward his disbarment under Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 5, for commission of an act involving moral turpitude, following a hearing on January 24th of charges based on acts done about the middle of July, 1921, entered no dilatory pleas or motions, and made no objections, submitted himself as a witness against himself without objection, and testified that he would never again do such an act, suspended from the practice until January 1, 1923.

Application by the Bar Association of San Francisco to disbar Arthur M. Devall for commission of an act involving moral turpitude. Accused suspended.

Harold E. Haven, of San Francisco, for accusant.

Arthur M. Devall, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an original proceeding brought in this court by the Bar Association of San Francisco against the accused to obtain a judgment of disbarment. It is the claim of the accusant that the accused should be disbarred under subdivision 5 of section 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As sustaining that claim the accusant contends that the accused did advise the altering of a paper purporting to be the will of George A. Holland, deceased. The charges against the accused are pleaded in two counts, and no question has been presented as to the sufficiency of the pleadings.

George A. Holland, formerly of Boston, Mass., resided in San Francisco for a period of time prior to December, 1920. About Christmas of that year he died, and at least some of his effects were so located that one W. D. Potter had access thereto. Thereafter the said W. B. Potter informed the accused of the facts regarding the death of the decedent, and the accused undertook to locate the heirs of the deceased. Later he took such steps that at least some of the heirs were located, and some of the correspondence between the accused and the heirs was introduced in evidence. The purported will was produced in court and exhibited to the court, and an enlarged photographic copy was filed as an exhibit. Three exemplars of the writing of the deceased were produced and filed. The purported will is very short, and is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"The Boston Five Cents Savings Bank,
"Boston,—Mass. Nov. 8th 1920.
"please notify William J. McCurdy if anything Should happen me I feel as though I havn't long to stay William McCurdy Emma McCurdy Lillian & Elanor are my cousins. I wish them to have all I leave they are poor industerious people and need all the assistance possible George A. Holland
"formerly of Boston Mass."

The words, "The Boston Five Cents Savings Bank, Boston,—Mass.," are printed in the upper lefthand corner, and the printing is in large block type. It is the contention of the accusant that the accused either wrote or caused to be written on the purported will, before the paper was offered for probate, the words and figures "Nov. 8th 1920." The proof offered in support of this contention is as follows:

The letter admitted to be signed by the accused and dated July 18, 1921, contains statements among others as follows:

"I have decided to tell you now the full details in regard to the property, or rather the money. I am pledging you, however, to absolute secrecy, as it will help no one else, and might prove a loss to you and those George wanted to benefit by the little he had. * * * Now, George A. Holland left an imperfect will. There was a technical omission that made it absolutely void. Although it was as clear as day that he wanted you, William, Lillian and Eleanor to have his money. The paper stated so in so many words. I will send you a copy of it. On another paper also he left words to the same effect although this paper was more imperfect than the other. Fortunately these papers came to my hand. My first move was to find you and see if you and your immediate relatives would get this money under the intestate laws. That was the reason of not wanting to have relatives who were not friendly know about the matter, and also in getting the details as to relatives. When I got all these details I found that this money would not all go where George wanted it to go, and there was a possibility that none of it would, and if any of it did, it would be very little. I then took it upon myself, with the aid of a friend of George's to perfect that will. That was done. A good will perfected, planted in the trunk where it was found, and is now in the hands of the public administrator and will be found to be a good will."

[1] On the trial in this court an expert was called who testified that the date was not in the handwriting of the decedent, but he did not testify that it was in the handwriting of the accused. The accused took the stand and testified that he did not write the date nor authorize the writing of the date; that he did not see it written, and never saw the will until it was offered in this court. He further testified that at one time he telephoned Mr. Potter that the public administrator would call on Mr. Potter for the effects of the decedent; that in the course of that conversation Mr. Potter informed the accused that he had found a paper (the will) and read the contents over the telephone. "We had a talk about it and he said there was some printing—the name of a bank on it. I says, 'Can't you erase it?' and he says, 'Yes,' and I says, 'If I was in your place, I would go ahead and do it.' That was our complete conversation and only conversation in regard to that." As to whether the date, "Nov. 8th 1920" was inserted in the will by the accused or by some one else acting on the suggestion of the accused, the foregoing testimony is all that was adduced on the subject. It does not show conclusively to our minds that the accused either inserted the date or caused it to be inserted.

[2] The attorney for the accusant has cited to this court certain authorities to the effect that the printed matter, "The Boston Five Cents Savings Bank, Boston,—Mass.," on the face of the will does not violate the provisions of section 1277 of the Civil Code. The accused has not cited to us any authorities on the subject. However, it is proved by all of the testimony, and, indeed, is admitted by the accused, that he believed the presence of such printed matter invalidated the will; and, so believing, he suggested to Mr. Potter that Mr. Potter erase the printed matter. Such conduct was reprehensible. Section 282 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"It is the duty of an attorney and counselor: * * * 4. * * * never seek to mislead the judge * * * by an artifice * * * of fact. * * *"

And it is provided by section 287 of the same Code:

"An attorney and counselor may be removed or suspended * * * by any district court of appeal * * * for either of the following causes, arising after his admission to practice: * * * 2. * * * violation * * * of his duties as such attorney and counselor. * * *"

[3] The admitted facts clearly sustain the second count pleaded in the accusation on file against the accused. It remains for us to determine what should be the punishment. The acts of commission by the accused were done about the middle of July, 1921. The matter was taken up by the Bar Association on the 24th of January, 1922, at which time a hearing was had. The association filed in this court its accusation on June 6, 1922. The accused entered no dilatory pleas of any kind or nature, but appeared for a hearing and the same was had on June 29, 1922. At the hearing the accused appeared in propria persona, and without objection submitted himself as a witness against himself and entered no objections of any kind or nature and made no dilatory motions. Bearing on whether the accused would hereafter engage in similar practice, the accused stated when testifying before this court, "So far as doing it again, I would not do it again in that case or any other."

Considering all of these matters together and as bearing on the punishment, we think that the accused should be suspended from the practice of the law until the 1st day of January, 1923, and it is so ordered.

OLIVER v. ROBNETT et al. (Sac. 3243.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 3, 1922.)

1. Waters and water courses ⟸143—Title by prescription extends only to waters reasonably necessary to use.

The water must not only be actually diverted and adversely used to give title by prescription, but such title extends only to so much of the water so used as is reasonably necessary for the purpose for which it is used.

2. Appeal and error ⟸995—Weight of evidence not considered on appeal.

The question of the weight of evidence cannot be considered on appeal.

3. Waters and water courses ⟸137—Adverse user for five years establishes title by prescription.

An adverse user of water for five years only is required to establish title by prescription.

4. Waters and water courses ⟸152(6)—Upper riparian owner presumed to use waters from stream in exercise of right, and not adversely to lower owner.

An upper riparian owner, using water from stream, is presumed to be doing so in the exercise of his right, and if he has openly used a certain amount for the statutory period, this right, to the extent that it is a mere exercise of a riparian right, has no effect on the riparian rights of the lower owner, and title by prescription is only gained to the extent to which the rights of the lower riparian owner are interfered with.

5. Waters and water courses ⟸138 — Rule where upper riparian owner's use is adverse to lower owner's stated; "adverse use."

The use of water by an upper riparian owner is adverse to the rights of the lower riparian owner only when it constitutes such an interference with the rights of the lower owner as would justify an action to restrain such interference.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by Charles M. Oliver against Isaac Robnett and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

McCamant & Thompson, of Portland, Or., for appellant.

Daly B. Robnett, of Alturas, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. The plaintiff owns land through which Cottonwood creek flows. He brought this action to quiet his title to a portion of the waters of this stream. Defendants Charley C. Larkin and Ellen Larkin and defendant Isaac Robnett also own riparian land on Cottonwood creek, above plaintiff's land. The defendants Dick own nonriparian land to which water has been diverted from Cottonwood creek, and Isaac Robnett also owns a tract of nonriparian land known as the "Home Place," to which water has been diverted. The action thus involves both riparian rights and the prescriptive rights of nonriparian owners in the waters of Cottonwood creek. The creek is fed by mountain snows, and about April 1st carries over a thousand miner's inches of water. This flow gradually diminishes during the irrigating season, which lasts from April 1st to July 1st, and for gardens extends through the month of August, until there is a very small stream of water. The court awarded the defendants a continuous flow of 350 miner's inches of water as follows: To defendants Larkin, 80 inches, to defendant Robnett, 100 inches for his riparian land and 120 inches for his home place, and to defendant Dick, 50 inches, thus awarding 180 inches to riparian and 170 inches to nonriparian land, and then apportioned the remainder of the water, awarding the Larkins two-sevenths thereof for 158.54 acres, defendant Robnett, five-fourteenths for 160 acres, and plaintiff Oliver five-fourteenths upon his 221 acres, of the surplus over and above 350 miner's inches. The plaintiff contends that the evidence is insufficient to show a prescriptive right to the 350 miner's inches of water, not only because an uninterrupted user for the statutory period was not shown, but also because the amount allowed was unreasonably large. The amount allowed was approximately one miner's inch per acre per annum for each acre irrigated, whereas it is claimed that one-half miner's inch per acre per annum was amply sufficient, if reasonably used, to irrigate the lands which were in fact irrigated.

We have heretofore had occasion to advert to the excessive allowances of water by some of the decisions in the northern part of California. In Northern California Power Co. v. Flood, 186 Cal. 301, 304, 199 Pac. 315, 316, it was said:

"The right to the use of waters of a stream may be acquired, as against others entitled thereto, by taking and beneficially using the same adversely and continuously under a claim of right for a period of 5 years. But in such a case the right, with respect to the quantity of water therein, extends only to the quantity actually put to a beneficial use. The fact that one has a ditch running through his land which he keeps full of water diverted from a stream does not give him any right to such water against others who have rights therein. In order to gain a right to the water the diverter must actually use it and the quantity used measures the extent of his right. The use of all the water in the ditch, or a specific portion thereof, for only a part of the time, is not a sufficient use to give title to that quantity of water continuously. For example, if twenty acres of land requires irrigation once a month during the irrigating season and the entire flow of the ditch for two days is necessary to accomplish one irrigation, the fact that the claimant has used the water in that manner once a month during every irrigating season does not give him the right to the entire flow during the intervals of non-use. If others are using the water during such intervals of non-use by him, his right would include only one-fifteenth of the full flow of the ditch. We emphasize this point because we have found that in recent cases the question of the duty of water seems to have received very little attention. From comparison with many other cases on the subject, we are disposed to doubt whether the use of a continuous flow of seventeen and a half miner's inches of water for each acre irrigated can ever be necessary, or can ever be otherwise than excessive and wasteful. * * *"

[1] The water must not only be actually diverted and adversely used to give title by prescription, but such title extends only to so much of the water so used as is reasonably necessary for the purpose for which it is used. California etc. Co. v. Madera etc. Irr. Co., 167 Cal. 78, 138 Pac. 718.

[2] The briefs are largely devoted to a discussion of whether or not an uninterrupted and adverse use of water for the prescriptive period is shown by the evidence to the extent found by the trial court. We cannot consider the question of the weight of the evidence, and for that reason we might be compelled to the conclusion that the very general and very vague testimony of the defendants' witnesses, to the effect that the diverting ditches used by them were always running full, and that the water was actually and necessarily used, was sufficient evidence to support the findings of the trial court; notwithstanding more definite evidence as to the actual use and necessity therefor, contradicting such general and sweeping testimony was offered by the plaintiff.

We need not determine that question because the judgment must be reversed for other reasons. In view of a new trial, however, it is proper to say that it is much more satisfactory to establish the amount of land irrigated from time to time, and to ascertain the amount of water reasonably necessary for the irrigation of that amount of land, and allow the adverse claimant such necessary amount, than it is to rely upon general statements concerning the amount of water kept flowing in ditches and used, where such water has not been measured nor economically used, and where, as here, there has been a large amount of waste water from time to time. For instance, in this case the court found 80 inches of water had been used on the Larkin place for more than 40 years, while the evidence shows without dispute that up to 1893 not more than 5 or 6 acres of this land were irrigated, and up to 1898 not more than 20 acres were watered, all but 5 or 6 of which were covered with brush. In 1904 there were 10 or 12 acres in alfalfa. In 1905 and 1906, 50 or 60 acres were cleared and sown to alfalfa, and yet it is found that 80 inches of water was beneficially used for 40 years on this land; that is, that eighty inches of water, continuous flow, was necessary to irrigate, and was used for irrigating, less than six acres of land from 1881 to 1893.

[3, 4] In this connection, however, it should be said that an adverse user for 5 years only is required to establish title by prescription and that the finding need only be supported by evidence of 5 years' continuous user, and that the defendants rely upon evidence of such user from 1910 to 1917. Our reference to the finding of 40 years' adverse user is solely for the purpose of illustrating the unsatisfactory result of basing findings upon generalities, such as those testified to by the defendants' witnesses. It will be unnecessary for us to determine whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding of adverse user for the prescriptive period. The trial court evidently rendered its judgment on the theory that the use of water by an upper riparian owner was adverse to the lower riparian owner and that by the use of 80 miner's inches of water by the Larkins and 100 inches of water on Robnett's upper riparian land, the owners of these lands had acquired by prescription the right to such water and that this prescriptive right was a right over and above and in addition to the riparian rights to the waters of the stream. This position is untenable. An upper riparian owner who is using water from the stream is presumed to be doing so in the exercise of his right so to do, and consequently, if he has openly, notoriously, and continuously used a certain amount of water for the statutory period, this right to the extent that it is a mere exercise of the riparian right, has no effect on the riparian rights of the lower riparian owner, and title by prescription is only gained to the extent to which the rights of the lower riparian owner are interfered with. The rule on that subject is stated in Peake v. Harris, 192 Pac. 310, in an opinion denying a transfer from the District Court of Appeal as follows:

"It is also settled that the lower riparian owner, the plaintiff being such owner, cannot complain of the use by an upper riparian owner except by showing that the upper owner uses an unreasonable quantity of the stream, having regard to the needs of the lower owner, and, consequently, that the lower owner cannot enjoin the use by an upper owner unless he alleges such unreasonable use to his injury. Swift v. Goodrich, 70 Cal. 105; Hargrave v. Cook, supra; Heilbron v. Land, etc., Co., 80 Cal. 193; Anaheim W. Co. v. Semi-Tropic Co., 64 Cal. 192."

[5] The use of water by an upper riparian owner is adverse to the rights of the lower riparian owner only when it constitutes such an interference with the rights of the lower owner as would justify an action to restrain such interference. Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights (2d Ed.) p. 1861, § 1040. In so far as the use by the defendants Larkins and Robnett, of 80 and 100 miner's inches of water, respectively, was justified by their riparian ownership such use was not adverse to the plaintiff. The riparian rights of Oliver in the waters of the stream should be ascertained without regard to the amount of water actually diverted by the defendants Larkins and Robnett on their riparian lands. The riparian rights of the plaintiff would be diminished by such use only to the extent that the diversions above his riparian lands were adverse to such riparian rights.

The judgment of the trial court was erroneous in that it gave Robnett and the Larkins the full amount of water used by them for more than 5 years on the theory that they had a prescriptive title thereto, and then prorated the excess over that amount and over the amount of the other diversions, as an additional right belonging to the Larkins and Robnett by reason of their lands being riparian to the stream. The right of the appropriators to 170 miner's inches of water, that is, of Dick to 50 miner's inches and of Robnett to 120 miner's inches for the home place, established by the decree, might be affirmed, and the rights of Oliver, Robnett, and the Larkins alone left to be determined on a new trial, were it not for the fact that we are satisfied from an examination of the record that the whole case should be retried in the light of the legal principles laid down concerning riparian and nonriparian ownership, and the reasonable use of water, particularly as it appears that Robnett sometimes used the water diverted for his riparian lands on his nonriparian land.

Judgment reversed.

UNION IRON WORKS et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 10214.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1922.)

1. Master and servant ⟸346—Principle underlying Workmen's Compensation Act stated.

The underlying principle upon which the Workmen's Compensation Act rests is the providing of compensation to an employee for injuries resulting from his employment; the industry being made to bear the burden as part of the cost of production.

2. Master and servant ⟸348—Purpose of Compensation Act stated.

The primary purpose of industrial compensation provided for by the Workmen's Compensation Act is to insure to the injured employee and his dependents adequate means of subsistence while he is unable to work, and also to bring about his recovery as soon as possible in order that he may be returned to the ranks of productive labor.

3. Master and servant ⟸385(16)—"Medical treatment" required by Compensation Act.

The medical treatment required by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 15(a), to be furnished an injured employee by his employer is such as will reasonably and seasonably tend to relieve and cure the injured employee from the effects of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Medical Treatment.]

4. Master and servant ⟸385(16)—Refusal of employers' physicians to operate held refusal to furnish medical treatment within Compensation Act.

Where an employee who had suffered fractures of both legs and an arm was unsuccessfully treated by the employers' physicians for three years, their refusal to operate despite his repeated requests, extending over nine months, during which time he continued to suffer, and his condition apparently grew worse, was tantamount to a refusal to furnish the treatment seasonably required by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 15(a), so as to warrant recovery of expenses for subsequent successful operations by a physician of his own selection.

5. Master and servant ⟸385(16)—Elements of liability under Compensation Act for expenses of physician of employee's own selection stated.

Before an injured employee will be entitled to compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 15(a), for expenses incurred in the treatment of him by a physician of his own selection, it must appear that such treatment not only was a success, but that it was reasonably and seasonably necessary to cure and relieve the injured employee, taking all the circumstances into consideration.

6. Statutes ⟸224—When construction of intent of Legislature must be ascertained and applied.

That a word or phrase is common to two statutes will not suffice to make decisions as to one controlling as to the other, since in the construction of a statute the intention of the Legislature must be ascertained and applied pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1859.

7. Master and servant ⟸385(16)—Extension of time for furnishing medical treatment under Compensation Act held lawful.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 15(a), as amended by St. 1915, p. 1082, § 4, the Industrial Accident Commission may extend the right of an injured employee to medical services notwithstanding 90 days has elapsed since the injury, the length of time for which an employee is entitled to medical services being the length of time necessary to his complete recovery, and the Commission having continuing jurisdiction under section 20(d) as amended St. 1917, p. 850, over all awards for 245 weeks.

8. Master and servant ⟸385(16)—Objection to extension of time for furnishing medical treatment under Compensation Act held waived.

Where for three years after the injury the employers supplied, and expressed their willingness to supply, the injured employee with further medical treatment, such action was tantamount to a consent to an indefinite extension of the 90-day period limited by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 15(a), and constituted a waiver of the employers' right to object to the power of the Commission to proceed after such period.

9. Master and servant ⟸419—Successful operation held to justify amendment of compensation award.

Where an employee who had been unsuccessfully treated for three years by his employers' physicians employed a physician of his own selection, and underwent a successful operation, the Industrial Accident Commission was thereafter justified in amending its original award, performance of such operation constituting a new development arising after the date of the original award, sufficient to furnish the basis for the amendment.

10. Master and servant ⟸385(16)—Medical expenses held allowable under Compensation Act, although employee's union paid part.

It is proper to allow medical expenses under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 15(a), to an employee treated by a physician of his own selection after unsuccessful treatment by employer's physicians, although part of such expenses was paid by his union, where there is no showing that the money was voted as a gratuitous gift, or that the union undertook to become primarily liable for the expenses.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Thomas Henneberry, employee, by John W. Henneberry, his guardian ad litem, opposed by the Union Iron Works and its successor, the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, Limited, employers. Award of compensation was made to the employee, and the employers bring certiorari. Affirmed.

Thos. W. Slaven, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This proceeding presents the petition on certiorari of Union Iron Works and its successor in interest, Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, to have reviewed an award of the Industrial Accident Commission to one Thomas Henneberry of $1,446.90.

The facts upon which the award is founded, briefly stated, are these:

On September 14, 1916, said Thomas Henneberry, 16 years of age, hereinafter referred to as the injured employee, while employed as a rivet heater by the Union Iron Works, fell from a ladder, breaking both legs and an arm. It is conceded that his injury arose out of and in the course of his employment. The petitioners herein placed him under the care of Drs. Buell and Hunkin, but later removed him to their own private hospital, where he was treated by petitioners' own physicians. The injuries were severe, and for four years after the injury there was a continuous discharge of pus from one leg, due to necrosis of the bone and unhealed wounds. During that time the injured employee was obliged to go about on two crutches, and was wholly unable to work. During the entire period of four years after leaving the hospital he called daily at the hospital for medical treatment, which consisted largely in changing the dressing of the injured leg. His condition apparently growing worse, and having lost faith in the treatment administered him by the physicians at petitioners' hospital, he of his own accord, on February 18, 1920, consulted Dr. Hunkin, who advised an immediate operation to remove the diseased bone. This advice was reported to the petitioners' physicians, but it was their opinion that such an operation would not be opportune until the clearing up of a discharging sinus in the left leg, and in this conclusion they were confirmed by the opinion to the same effect of another physician and that of the medical director of the Industrial Accident Commission. Petitioners therefore refused to operate. After waiting nine months for petitioners' physicians to relieve his condition, the injured employee in November, 1920, abandoning the treatment of petitioners' physicians, placed himself under the care of Dr. Hunkin. Two operations were performed by Dr. Hunkin, one on November 22, 1920, and the other on January 2, 1921. The operations were a complete success. The flow of pus was stopped, the broken bones were united, the wounds were healed, and the injured employee discarded his crutches and again became self-supporting.

On May 17, 1918, nearly two years after the injury, a controversy having arisen as to the fixing of the injured employee's wages for the purpose of determining the proper rate of disability compensation payable to him, petitioners herein filed with the Industrial Accident Commission a petition setting forth, among other facts of the controversy, that the injured employee was still under medical treatment, and that the extent of his disability was still incapable of determination, and asking that an award be made as to the amount to which he was then entitled. A hearing was had thereon on July 1, 1918. The Commission made and filed its findings and award, allowing the injured employee the sum of $682.50 and the further sum of $15 a week, payable until the termination of the period for which permanent disability might be payable, or until the further order of the Commission. Upon the last-mentioned hearing it was agreed by all of the parties that the petitioners herein had continued to furnish medical treatment to the injured employee, and that they would continue to do so as long as it was needed. The Commission did not in its findings direct or provide for the furnishing by the petitioners herein of any further medical or surgical services, nor did it extend by formal order the 90-day period during which petitioners were required by the terms of section 15(a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act to furnish medical and surgical services. The Commission, however, by its findings in this behalf, reserved to itself the power to make a further award in the premises by declaring that—

"The extent of said permanent disability cannot be determined at this time, but will, upon request of any party in interest after such disability is in a condition to be rated, be determined and award amended accordingly."

In April, 1921, three months after the last operation by Dr. Hunkin, and nearly three years after the making of the original award, the injured employee applied to the Commission for an award of $1,446.90 for the payment of expenses incurred by him in having the said operation performed by Dr. Hunkin and for hospital fees and treatment attendant upon the operation. On May 17, 1921, the Commission made an order granting said application and further directing the petitioners' physicians "to furnish such further medical and therapeutic treatment as may be required to cure and relieve the employee from the result of said injuries," and providing further that "the time within which such treatments are required under the terms of the aforesaid act is * * * extended accordingly."

Section 15(a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, which governs and controls the jurisdiction of the Commission to allow an award for medical treatment furnished an injured employee, as originally enacted in 1913, read as follows:

"Where liability for compensation under this act exists such compensation shall be furnished or paid by the employer and be as provided in the following schedule: (a) Such medical, surgical and hospital treatment, including nursing, medicines, medical and surgical supplies, crutches and apparatus, as may reasonably be required at the time of the injury and within ninety days thereafter, to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury, the same to be provided by the employer, and in case of his neglect or refusal seasonably to do so, the employer to be liable for the reasonable expense incurred by or on behalf of the employee in providing the same." Stats. 1913, c. 176, p. 279.

In 1915 this section was amended to read as follows:

"Where liability for compensation under this act exists such compensation shall be furnished or paid by the employer and be as provided in the following schedule.

"(a) Such medical, surgical and hospital treatment, including nursing, medicines, medical and surgical supplies, crutches and apparatus, including artificial members, as may reasonably be required at the time of the injury and within ninety days thereafter, unless such time is extended by the Commission, to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury, the same to be provided by the employer, and in case of his neglect or refusal seasonably to do so, the employer to be liable for the reasonable expense incurred by or on behalf of the employee in providing for the same." Stats. 1915, c. 607, p. 1079.

The only difference between the statute in force in 1915, at the time of the accident, and the statute as originally enacted is the insertion of the italicized words, "unless such time is extended by the Commission." The statute was again amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 836, § 9) by eliminating the 90-day time limit, but leaving the statute in every other particular identical in its provisions as it existed in 1915. The accident, however, occurred in September, 1916, and therefore the power of the Commission to make the award in question must be found within the provisions of the statute as it stood in 1915.

The award was allowed by the Commission under the provisions of the statute as it existed in 1915, upon the theory that, even though it be conceded, as, indeed, it must be, that petitioners' physicians in refusing to operate acted in the utmost good faith, and upon what then seemed to them to be best for the injured employee, nevertheless the successful result of the operation performed by another physician demonstrated that, despite the opinions of petitioners' physicians, an operation was necessary to cure and relieve the injured employee, and that therefore the refusal of petitioners' physicians to operate seasonably was in effect the refusal of petitioners to furnish such medical and surgical treatment as was reasonably and seasonably required.

It is the contention of petitioners herein that the provisions of the statute in question renders the employer liable for expenses incurred by the injured employee for medical services only in the event of the employer's neglect or refusal to furnish competent physicians and proper medical services, and that, if, as in the instant case, the employer offers to or does furnish competent and skilled physicians, he cannot be held liable for the expenses incurred by the injured employee in procuring another physician. It is insisted that this must be so even though while under the care of the employer's physician the injured employee's condition does not improve. In other words, it is one of the contentions made in support of the writ that the duty of the employer is not to furnish services which will cure the employee, but to furnish in good faith the services of a competent physician.

It may be conceded that, if this were an action for malpractice, or one founded upon the old common-law liability of the employer, the time to determine whether a surgical operation was reasonably required would be before the operation, and that, if, at that time, there was a difference of opinion among competent physicians as to the necessity of an operation, no liability could be predicated upon a failure to operate. The proceeding before the Commission, however, was not an action for damages, nor was it based upon the idea of fault on the part of the employer. It is founded upon the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, from which the theory of fault is wholly eliminated.

[1] The underlying principle upon which the Workmen's Compensation Act rests is, as its title indicates, the providing of compensation to an employee for injuries resulting from his employment. It emanates from the economic thought that personal injury losses incident to an industry is a part of the cost of production, to be borne, just as the depreciation and replacement of a machine is borne, by the industry itself, which compensation will be included in the cost of the product of the industry. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 Pac. 398.

[2, 3] The primary purpose of industrial compensation is to insure to the injured employee and those dependent upon him adequate means of subsistence while he is unable to work, and also to bring about his recovery as soon as possible in order that he may be returned to the ranks of productive labor. By this means society as a whole is relieved of the burden of caring for the injured workman and his family, and the burden is placed upon the industry. That the injured workman and his dependents may be cared for, compensation in the form of disability benefits is provided for by the act approximating the wages earned by the employee, and varying with the degree of disability and dependency. And, to secure the speedy return of the workman to productive employment, it is provided that medical and surgical services shall be furnished by the employer. This liability for medical and surgical services is not, therefore, a burden placed upon the employer as a penalty for any failure of duty on his part, but is merely a part of the whole compensation due the employee as the result of his injury. It therefore follows that the medical and surgical services contemplated and called for by the statute in question should be such as will tend to secure the return of the workman to productive employment. In other words, and perhaps more precisely stated, the treatment required by the statute is such as will reasonably and seasonably tend to relieve and cure the injured employee from the effects of the injury, and, manifestly, if the treatment practiced and persisted in by physicians furnished by the employer, even though they be conceded to be skilled and competent in their profession, does not within a reasonable time effect a cure, and thereafter a course of treatment prescribed by other physicians procured by the injured employee does in fact seasonably effect a cure, then it cannot be said that the employer has furnished such medical and surgical treatment as was reasonably and seasonably required.

[4] The successful result of the operation in the instant case demonstrated, we think, that it was the treatment reasonably required to cure and relieve the injured employee from the effects of his injury, and, that being so, the refusal, after more than three years of unsuccessful treatment, on the part of petitioners' physicians to operate, despite repeated requests to do so, which refusal extended over a period of nine months, during which time the injured employee continued to suffer, and his condition apparently grew worse, was tantamount to a refusal to furnish the treatment seasonably required by the statute.

[5] It is insisted by the petitioners that the award cannot be allowed to stand without giving to the injured employee not only the absolute right to refuse such medical services as may be tendered and furnished to him by his employers, but the right as well to seek and secure the services of other physicians and surgeons at the expense of the employer if, perchance, a physician or surgeon can be found who will prescribe and advise a treatment different from that prescribed by the physicians furnished by the employer. In other words, it is contended that an employer will be required to pay any and all doctor bills which an employee might at his whim incur. No such result, however, follows from the view which we have taken of the situation presented in the instant case. Before the injured employee would be entitled to compensation for expenses incurred in the treatment of him by a physician of his own selection, it would have to be shown that the treatment not only was a success, but that it was reasonably and seasonably necessary to cure and relieve the injured employee. Moreover, all the circumstances attending the treatment by the employer's physician would have to be weighed by the Commission in order to determine whether or not the treatment prescribed by the employer's physicians would, if it had been persisted in, have produced as speedy and as satisfactory a cure as did the treatment of the physicians resorted to by the injured employee. And, of course, in coming to a conclusion in this behalf, the Commission would necessarily take into consideration the period of time covered by the treatment of the employer's physicians and the results obtained during that time. In other words, the injured employee will be permitted, at the peril of having himself to pay the expenses of medical treatment, to secure the services of physicians other than those provided by his employer, and this peril will attach unless it can be shown from all of the circumstances of the situation, including the success of the operation, that his desire and decision to secure the services of other physicians was warranted.

On the other hand, if we were to hold, as petitioners contend, that the only duty of the employer is to provide competent physicians who prescribe a particular course of treatment, it would mean that, if the physicians of the employer, even though they in good faith persisted in a course of treatment manifestly ineffective, and demonstrated ultimately to be wrong and ineffectual, the employee, nevertheless, would be compelled to continue under such treatment or secure at his own expense effective surgical treatment. This cannot be so. In Mass. Bonding, etc., v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 767, 770, 151 Pac. 419, this court held that, although in the first instance the employer had a right to designate the physician who should attend the injured employee, nevertheless, if, becoming dissatisfied, the injured employee was directed to another physician who was out of town, the injured employee was not bound to wait indefinitely for his return, but could seek the advice of his own physician, and the employer would be liable for the expense so incurred. So in the instant case the injured employee became dissatisfied with the course of treatment. The employer, however, instead of directing him to another physician, as in the former case, absolutely refused to change the treatment, whereupon the injured employee sought the services of a physician of his own selection. The award was upheld in the former case upon the ground that the injured man acted upon reasonable and proper grounds in seeking the services of his own physician. In view of all of the circumstances, including the successful result of the operation, it cannot be denied that the injured employee in the instant case likewise acted reasonably and upon proper grounds in seeking the services of Dr. Hunkin. The opinion in the case above cited, while not definitely deciding the point here involved, strongly supports the conclusion arrived at in the instant case.

[6, 7] It is the contention of petitioners that, in any event, the right of the injured employee to medical services was limited to 90 days. And in this behalf it is argued that section 15(a) as amended in 1915 limited the right of an injured employee to medical services to a period of 90 days after the injury was received, unless such time was extended by the Commission prior to the expiration of the 90 days, or, in other words, that the Industrial Accident Commission could in its award, if made within 90 days after the injury, or by a separate order made within such time, have extended the time for the furnishing of medical and surgical treatment to an injured employee, but that, the Commission having failed within such 90 days by formal order to grant such an extension of time, its power to grant compensation for such services rendered to the employee after the expiration thereof ceased, and was as if it had never existed.

As previously indicated, the section last above referred to, as originally enacted in 1913, merely provided that, as part of his compensation benefit, the injured employee should be entitled to medical services for 90 days. Under the statute as then worded, the employer could, therefore, at the expiration of the 90 days, cease entirely to furnish any and all medical services regardless of the nature or the seriousness of the injury, and notwithstanding the fact that further medical attention was necessary to effect a cure. This would be so although the prolongation of the recovery of an injured employee beyond the 90-day period might be due to the mistake or wrong diagnosis of the physician furnished by the employer and the Commission, because of the arbitrary limitation imposed by the statute, would be powerless to compel the employer to furnish further medical attention. In 1915, however, the section was amended to render the employer liable for the medical services required "within ninety days thereafter, unless such time is extended by the Commission." Whether or not it was within the power of the Commission to make the award in the instant case, therefore, depends upon the purpose and intention of the Legislature in so amending the statute.

The argument in part advanced by petitioners in support of their contention is that this section of the Workmen's Compensation Act is analogous to section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in that both contain a reference to an extension of time, and that, inasmuch as it has been held that the extension of time allowed by section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure must be granted within the time allowed by the Code for the doing of the act, and that an order made after the expiration of the Code time or of a prior order extending the time is void, we must, in the instant case, so interpret section 15(a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The fact that a word or phrase is common to both statutes will not suffice to make those decisions a controlling criterion for the construction of the statute before us. In the construction of a statute the intention of the Legislature is to be ascertained and applied. Code Civ. Proc. § 1859. The rule and reason for the rule enunciated in the decisions referred to, that an extension of the statutory time to do the things covered by section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure may not be had unless made within the time originally designated, do not apply with equal force to the statute in question here. The two sections are, we think, dissimilar in purpose and effect, and wholly unrelated in principle. The extension of time involved in section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure relates to purely procedural acts, which, pursuant to the provisions of other sections of the same Code, must be performed by one of the parties to pending litigation within a designated time. The nature of the acts to be performed in the first instance, considered in conjunction with the condition that good cause must be shown as a prerequisite to an extension of the designated time, indicates that it was the legislative intent that the time within which the acts should be performed was intended as a limitation of the power of the court to grant an extension of time. In other words, the provisions of the Code sections which designate the time within which the procedural acts covered by section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure are to be performed are mandatory, and the fact that an extension of time within which to do any of the enumerated procedural acts may be had under the provisions of section 1054 only upon application of the party desiring it, and upon good cause shown, carries with it the necessary implication that the application and order for the extension of time must be made within the time fixed by the statute in the first instance for the performance of the act. On the other hand, section 15(a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act neither in terms nor by necessary implication places a limit upon the time within which, nor does it prescribe the method by which, an extension shall be made. Obviously the statute gives to the Commission the power of determining of its own motion whether, under all the facts of any individual case, further medical treatment is necessary, and the authority of the Commission to extend the period of liability carries with it, no limitation to the contrary appearing in the statute, the power to make the extension during or after the expiration of the 90-day period. Hart v. Plum, 14 Cal. 149. This is so because of a rule of statutory construction which, generally and substantially stated, provides that, in the absence of a good reason why the statutory grant of a right may not be exercised beyond as well as within the limits of a designated time, and nothing appearing, either in the statute granting the right or in other statutes creating and controlling the same subject-matter, indicating that the Legislature did not intend that the right granted should be exercised beyond the time designated in the first instance, rather than not exercised at all, it may be assumed that it was the legislative intent that, if the right granted be not exercised within the statutory limit, it might be exercised after the expiration of that time. Black on Interpretation of Laws (2d Ed.) § 155; State ex rel. Cothren v. Lean, 9 Wis. 279.

In the instant case no good reason appears why the Commission should be compelled to make an extension, by formal order, within the 90-day period. Clearly the amendment conferring the power of extension was enacted by the Legislature solely for the benefit of the injured employee. And it must have been the intention of the Legislature that the right to medical services so conferred for a period longer than 90 days should depend upon the necessity for such services. The primary purpose of the act being the payment of compensation in avoidance of the possibility of pauperism, often attendant upon the loss of earning power of the wage earner, and thus relieve society of a consequent burden, the amount of compensation to accomplish this result would be that which would preserve to the workman practically the same economic status which he held prior to the injury—that is, the amount necessary to save his family from dependency during his period of unemployment plus the cost of his own rehabilitation. It follows that the length of time for which the employee should be entitled to medical services is the length of time necessary to his complete recovery. Otherwise, if he be required to pay his medical expenses after a certain time, by just so much is the compensation for the support of his dependents lessened. If, therefore, his right to services be construed to depend upon the fact of whether or not an order was made by the Commission within a certain time, the purpose of the statute is defeated. The statute imposes a duty on the Commission, but, as the injured employee has no control over its conduct, it would be a harsh construction which would deprive him of the benefits of the statute merely because the Commission had neglected or failed to properly and promptly perform a duty.

Furthermore, the interpretation of the statute contended for by petitioners would place upon the Commission the duty of following one of two impractical courses. Thus, before the expiration of the 90 days, it would be necessary for the Commission to hold a hearing to determine in advance whether or not the necessity for medical services would continue longer than 90 days. Unless such hearing were held just immediately prior to the 90-day expiration it would in some cases be impossible to determine the necessity for further medical services. Again, other cases might arise in which, even though the hearing were held just before the expiration of the statutory time, the employee would lose the right to such services because of the difficulty, if not impossibility, of determining in advance the necessity for such services. As the only alternative the Commission would, in order to avoid this result, be forced to make an order extending the time automatically upon the report of the injury.

The power of the Commission being then the determination and declaration of whether an employee reasonably required further medical or surgical treatment after the expiration of the 90-day period, there is no reason why such determination should not be made after the 90-day period. Indeed, in most cases this would seem, as a practical matter, to be the better if not the only, course. Under section 20(d) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, the Commission is given continuing jurisdiction over all its orders and awards for 245 weeks, and the Commission, therefore, had the power at any time within that period to make an award determining that further medical services were necessary after the expiration of 90 days from the injury.

[8] Aside from the foregoing considerations, the record before us shows, as has been previously indicated, that for three years after the expiration of the 90-day period the petitioners here not only continued to supply, but expressed their willingness to supply, the injured employee with further medical treatment. This was tantamount to a consent to an indefinite extension of the 90-day period, and, the petitioners having, by word and conduct, acquiesced in a course of procedure which was in fact an extension of the statutory period of liability for medical services, will not now be heard to complain of the manner in which such extension was made, and will be held, by reason of such word and conduct, to have waived their right to object to the power of the Commission to proceed in the premises.

[9] It is the further contention of petitioners that, conceding the power of the Commission to make an extension after the expiration of the 90-day period, nevertheless the Commission had no jurisdiction or authority to amend the original award made in July, 1918. This contention is based upon the decision in the case of Georgia Cas. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 289, 293, 170 Pac. 625, which held, in effect, that the continuing jurisdiction of the Commission to rescind, amend, or alter its own orders, decisions, and awards for a period of 245 weeks was limited to making such changes as were required by the occurrence of new facts arising after the date of the original decision. In this behalf it is insisted that there are no new facts arising after the date of the original decision, inasmuch as the necessity for a surgical operation existed at the time of the original award. The power of the Commission to make the amended award was denied in the case above referred to, and relied upon by petitioners upon the express ground that no evidence was presented as to any new facts occurring, and the award had been based solely upon a reconsideration of the facts upon which such former award was made. While it may be conceded that all the conditions as to the necessity of medical and surgical services to the injured employee which existed at the time of the amended award existed at the time of the original award, the amended award in the instant case was not based solely, or at all, upon a reconsideration of the facts upon which the former award was made. The award was based upon the fact that an operation had been performed subsequent to the original award, and this was, in our opinion, a new development sufficient to justify the Commission in amending its original award.

[10] Concerning the contention of petitioners that the allowance to the injured employee was improper, inasmuch as part of the expenses for the operation had been paid by the Boilermakers' Union, it will suffice to say that there is nothing in the record to show that such money was voted by the union as a gratuitous gift to the injured employee, or that the union undertook to become primarily liable for the expenses so incurred by the injured employee for such medical treatment. In the absence of such showing, the defense necessarily fails.

The award is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ella Hubbard Franck. Application by Mary Ray Spencer, a minor, by Rose A. Bernard, Guardian, for distribution to her of property to which she was entitled under the will, to which Al. J. Franck, as executor, etc., filed objections. From an order of partial distribution, Al. J. Franck, as executor and as residuary legatee, appeals. Affirmed.

M. B. Moore, of Reno, Nev., and Tobin & Tobin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ralph H. Wight, of Martinez, and Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, J. This is an appeal from an order of partial distribution. Ella Hubbard Franck died testate on the 20th of February, 1917, being at the time of her death a resident of Reno, Nev. She left an estate in California, a considerable portion of which was in the city of Richmond, and her will was duly admitted to probate in the superior court in and for Contra Costa county. Letters testamentary were issued to the appellant, who was named in the will as executor, and also as the residuary legatee and devisee.

The portions of the will germane to this appeal are as follows:

"Fifthly. I give and bequeath to Mary Ray Spencer, aged about thirteen years, now an inmate of Notre Dame Academy, Alameda, California, all the net profits or net income that may be derived from those certain premises situate, lying and being in the city of Richmond, State of California, and particularly described upon that certain map entitled 'Nicholl Macdonald Avenue Civic Center, Richmond California,' said bequest being controlled by the following conditions, to wit: That my executor hereinafter named keep an accurate account of the net profits or net income from said above described premises, and from the moneys so derived pay for the care, custody and proper education of the said Mary Ray Spencer until she shall have reached the age of twenty years, and when she shall have reached the said age of twenty years then whatever of said moneys there may be remaining in the hands of said executor shall be paid and turned over to the said Mary Ray Spencer. I further direct that when the said Mary Ray Spencer shall have reached the age of thirty-five years, the said above described real property is hereby bequeathed to her as her property."

"Fourteenthly. I give and bequeath to the aforesaid Mary Ray Spencer all my cut glassware, china dishes, crockery and jewelry.

Fifteenthly. I give and devise all the rest, residue and remainder of any real or personal property, of every name, nature and kind whatsoever owned by me, at the time of my death, to my most trusted friend Al. J. Franck, of the city of Reno, county of Washoe, state of Nevada."

Mary Ray Spencer, through her guardian, applied to the court for distribution to her of the property to which she was entitled under the will. Appellant, as executor, filed an objection to the petition. At the hearing it was established by competent evidence that the real property devised by the fifth paragraph of the will to Mary Ray Spencer was improved; that the building erected thereon was known as the "Raymond Apartments," and that said apartments were "rented furnished, and that the furniture, fixtures, and other personal property situated therein had at all times been used as a part of the apartments." By its decree the court ordered distributed to Mary Ray Spencer all the net profits or net income that might be derived from "those certain premises situate in the city of Richmond," the description being the same as in the will, and, "also all the personal property, furnishings and fixtures contained in or about the building situated thereon and which building is known as 'Raymond Apartments.'" It was further ordered that possession of the personal property and the residue from the rents and income due therefrom be given to appellant until Mary Ray Spencer shall attain the age of 20 years, namely, August 20, 1922, and upon the trust that he manage, control, maintain, rent, and keep the premises in good repair, collect the rents, keep an accurate account of receipts and disbursements, and pay Mary Ray Spencer such sum monthly as might be necessary and proper for her support, maintenance, care, and education until she should reach the age of 20 years, which sum was fixed by the court at a minimum of $100, and upon her attaining the age of 20 years to pay over to her whatever money remained in his hands or should be chargeable to him from such rents and income, and to surrender possession of the personal property to her.

The appellant appeals from the decree of distribution, but objects only to that portion distributing the personal property in the apartment house to Mary Ray Spencer and ordering that its possession be surrendered to her upon her attaining the age of 20 years. He contends that, under the provisions of the will, no disposition was made of the personal property comprising the furniture and equipment of the apartment house, and that, under the residuary clause of the will, that property vested in him upon the death of the testatrix.

[1-5] Particular words are not requisite to create a legacy or devise. It is essential that the intention of the testator to make the gift be shown. Estate of Barclay, 152 Cal. 753, 757, 93 Pac. 1012. The cardinal rule for the construction of wills is to ascertain the intention of the testator, and this is determined from the words of the will, considering the circumstances under which it was made, if there is any uncertainty in its language. Estate of Budd, 166 Cal. 286, 292, 135 Pac. 1131; Estate of Henderson, 161 Cal. 353, 357, 119 Pac. 496; Estate of Mitchell, 160 Cal. 618, 117 Pac. 774; Estate of Carothers, 161 Cal. 588, 119 Pac. 926; Estate of Spreckels, 162 Cal. 559, 123 Pac. 371. The will and its entire scheme, the property disposed of, the persons named as devisees and legatees, the words and the context should be considered together, and words used in the will should be construed according to their surroundings. Estate of Koch, 8 Cal. App. 90, 96 Pac. 100. It is equally well settled that a devise or bequest may arise by implication. To warrant the court in so declaring there must be something more than conjecture. The probability of an intention to make the gift implied must appear to be so strong that an intention contrary to that imputed to the testator cannot be supposed to have existed in his mind. Bishop v. McClelland, 44 N. J. Eq. 450, 452, 16 Atl. 1, 1 L. R. A. 551; Estate of Blake, 157 Cal. 448, 468, 108 Pac. 287. It is also equally well settled that the unqualified gift of the rents, issues, and profits of a fund or property, real or personal, amounts to a gift of the fund or property itself. 1 Schouler on Wills (5th Ed.) §§ 507, 610; Page on Wills, § 491; Jennings v. Conboy, 73 N. Y. 230, 236; In re Sproul's Appeal, 105 Pa. 438, 441; Gulick v. Gulick's Executors, 27 N. J. Eq. 498, 500.

[6] Appellant contends that the rule last stated should not apply to the present case. He argues that—> "it is far from true that a devise of the rents and profits of real property will carry title to the personal property contained in or about said devised real property."

In making this contention the appellant does not appreciate the full effect of the fifth clause of the will. Not only does the testator thereby devise the real property to Mary Ray Spencer, but she also gives to her the net profits, or net income (the words are there used in the same sense), that may be derived from "those certain premises," of which the real property was but a part. If it be claimed that the word "premises" should be held to only apply to the real property devised, it sufficiently appears from the will, the circumstances under which it was made, the persons named as devisees and legatees, and the properly itself, that Mrs. Franck intended to make no subtle distinction between the realty and the personalty, which, by unity of use, comprised the apartment house premises. She was providing for the education and support of one to whom, if we may judge by the identity of names used in the will, she was closely related, and for whom the provisions of her last testament indicate she had more than ordinary affection. It seems clear that she intended the object of her benefaction to have sufficient funds to insure her education, and to provide for her maintenance until she arrived at an age of discretion, at which time the corpus of the fund should become hers absolutely. The testator may have attempted to define the day when the devisee shall fully enjoy possession of the real property, but we are not now concerned with that phase of the situation. It is hardly to be thought that she intended to segregate realty from personalty in making the gift. She made no specific disposition of the personal property, comprising the furniture and equipment of the Raymond Apartment House, nor bequest over in the event of Mary Ray Spencer's death. Her's was an absolute gift of the income arising in part from personal property, and in so far as the personalty was concerned, making no direct mention of the principal. It amounted to a general gift of the personalty itself. Hatch v. Bassett, 52 N. Y. 359, 362. The fact that there is a general residuary clause in the will in favor of appellant does not militate against this construction. Sproul's Appeal, supra.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

WESTERN FUEL CO. v. SANFORD G. LEWALD CO. (S. F. 9783.)

(Supreme Court of California. October 30, 1922.)

1. Payment ⊂⊃17—Execution of notes for a debt not a discharge of it, but precludes action on it until default on notes.

Where notes are executed by debtor for the amount of the debt, the indebtedness is not paid in the sense that it is absolutely discharged, unless it is distinctly so understood by the parties, and, if debtor defaults in payment of notes, an action can be maintained upon the original debt as if the notes had never been given.

2. Mortgages ⊂⊃218—Creditor to whom debtor gave mortgage for debt must foreclose before suit on original debt.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, a creditor to whom debtor had given a note for the amount of indebtedness secured by mortgage on real estate could not sue on original debt, but must first exercise his remedy by foreclosure of mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Henry M. Owens, Judge.

Action by the Western Fuel Company against Sanford G. Lewald Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ira S. Lillick, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Lucius L. Solomons and Walter H. Robinson, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $8,000, as a balance due on a book account. The complaint alleged that on November 30, 1916, the defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $13,513.15 for coal sold and delivered; that on the 2d day of December, 1916, the defendant made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff two promissory notes for $3,750 and $8,000, respectively, payable one day after date; that the note for $8,000 was secured by a mortgage upon real property, of even date, and duly recorded; that the full face value of said notes was credited to defendant on said book account on the date of their execution, and the balance of $1,763.15 was carried forward on said book account, and was thereafter paid by the defendant; that no part of the principal of said $8,000 note has been paid; that on or about the 26th of November, 1920, plaintiff canceled and offered to redeliver said $8,000 note to defendant, and at said time offered to defendant to redeliver the mortgage securing the same, together with the release thereof, duly executed, but the defendant refused to accept said offer of plaintiff, and said note and mortgage, together with said release, are now held by plaintiff for defendant, subject to his directions. A demurrer on general and special grounds was interposed. It was sustained without leave to amend, and from the judgment which followed plaintiff has appealed.

[1, 2] On the face of the complaint no question can be raised but that the amount of the original indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff, represented by the book account, was covered by the two notes executed by the defendant on December 2, 1916. It is not alleged in the complaint that the notes were taken in payment. The situation is therefore governed by the well-established rule that in such a case the indebtedness for which the notes are taken is not paid, in the sense that it is absolutely discharged. If default be made upon the notes, an action can be maintained upon the original debt, as if the notes had never been given. Ellison v. Henion, 183 Cal. 171, 174, 190 Pac. 793, 11 A. L. R. 444. The taking of a note for a pre-existing debt is not payment, unless it is distinctly understood that the note is taken as such. The note only postpones the time of payment of the old debt until default is made in payment of the note. Guarini v. Swiss-American Bank, 162 Cal. 181, 184, 121 Pac. 726. It was the contention of the plaintiff, therefore, that as the complaint does not show that the unpaid portion of the original debt was extinguished by the acceptance of the secured note, he may sue on the open book account as if the note and mortgage had not been given, and the complaint states a cause of action. In making this contention appellant overlooks the rule of law in this state that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt or the enforcement of a right secured by mortgage. Section 726, Code Civ. Proc. The plaintiff cannot waive the security and sue on the indebtedness, but must bring his action of foreclosure. The statute is imperative. Barbieri v. Ramelli, 84 Cal. 154, 156, 23 Pac. 1086; Gnarini v. Swiss-American Bank, supra. Under the Code sections an independent action at law cannot be maintained for a debt whatever the form, if it is secured by a mortgage. Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 358, 30 Pac. 609. This is so even where a mortgage is given to secure a debt already secured. The Code provides, in effect, that whenever a mortgage is given to secure a debt there can be but one action for its recovery or enforcement. After it is given, the law steps in and limits the action to foreclosure proceedings to enforce the debt. Commercial Bank v. Kershner, 120 Cal. 495, 498, 52 Pac. 848. We find nothing in Martin v. Becker, 169 Cal. 301, 146 Pac. 665, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 171, so much relied upon by appellant, to militate against the application of section 726 to the facts in this case. The court was there dealing with the question of liens, and it was held (169 Cal. 317, 146 Pac. 672, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 171) that a materialman, in taking mortgage security from the contractor for the value of the material which he might sell to him, did not lose his right to a mechanic's lien. The court said (169 Cal. 305, 146 Pac. 667, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 171):

"That the law never contemplated that because a man had taken a mortgage he could not take other independent security for his debt, and, if the contract for such security permitted it, enforce such contract without recourse to the mortgage debt."

That case points out that section 726 is designed for the protection of the primary debtor, and in the action to foreclose the materialman's lien, the plaintiff was not proceeding against the mortgagor, who was not even a necessary party to the action. 169 Cal. 309, 146 Pac. 668, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 171.

It is clear under the facts alleged in the complaint that the promissory note taken by the plaintiff from the defendant was but the evidence of the debt represented by the pre-existing book account. The mortgage was taken as security for the payment of that indebtedness. No waiver by respondent is pleaded, and the security is not shown to have become valueless. Appellant has not therefore brought himself within a statement of facts sufficient to state a cause of action; it not being shown that he has exhausted the remedy provided through foreclosure of the security taken by him for the payment of the original indebtedness.

The demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained.

FREIDEN et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(L. A. No. 7362.)

Master and servant ⊂⊃367—Party unloading automobile shipment held an "independent contractor" whose assistant was not consignee's "employee" within Compensation Act.

One furnishing his own appliances and selecting his own assistants, sharing in his pay for the work of unloading automobiles from a freight car for a dealer who exercised no control over the work paid for at the regular rate of $1.50 for each machine, held an independent contractor, whose assistant injured in doing the work was not the dealer's "employee" within Workmen's Compensation Act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Independent Contractor.]

In Bank.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 83) by Jim Caldwell, employee, against J. W. Freiden, employer, Howard Harper and the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, of London, England, insurer. From an award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission, employer and insurer bring certiorari. Award annulled.

George W. Moore, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. On November 12, 1921, Caldwell, one of the respondents herein, and the applicant before the Industrial Accident Commission, was engaged with two other men in unloading automobiles from a box car in the city of San Diego. The automobiles were consigned to J. W. Freiden, the defendant before the Commission and one of the petitioners here, who was in the business of selling automobiles in said city. While unloading the car Caldwell suffered an injury, and it was to recover compensation for the period of his disability that the proceedings were inaugurated before the Industrial Accident Commission. At such hearing an award was made in his favor, which is the subject of the review here. The sole question presented is whether or not Caldwell was an employee of J. W. Freiden at the time of the injury.

It appears from the record that Howard Harper, a longshoreman, had for a period of approximately 10 years previous to the date of the injury been engaged during the greater part of his time in unloading automobiles from cars for various dealers in San Diego. It was his custom to ascertain when shipments were due and had arrived, whereupon he would notify the dealers, and they would let him know when to start in to unload them. He looked after that work alone, hiring such assistants as he required. He collected the pay from the dealers at the rate of $1.50 for each machine unloaded, and divided the money with his assistants. In unloading the machines from the cars Harper and his fellow workers used three chain falls, made fast to the roof of the car. By this means and with chain slings the automobiles were lifted out onto the unloading platform. The appliances used were furnished by Harper; they having been found by him on the railroad property and being used by him. While one of the automobiles was being "slung up to the rafters of the car with the chain fall" the supports under it were taken out. "The chain carried away," and the automobile toppled over and fell on Caldwell, inflicting the injuries for which he seeks compensation. From these facts the Industrial Accident Commission found that Caldwell was injured while employed as a laborer by J. W. Freiden, the petitioner here. We are unable to agree with this conclusion.

While the testimony as to the nature of the alleged employment of Harper and the others by Freiden relates more to the general custom followed in such matters than to the particular instance which we are considering, it sufficiently appears that Harper was the only person with whom Freiden dealt in the matter, and was the only one with whom he made any arrangements concerning the matter. The transaction, reduced to simple terms, was that for the sum of $1.50 each Harper agreed to unload the machines and place them on the platform. Travers, who had been helping him on previous occasions, secured the assistance of Caldwell on this particular occasion. It does not appear that Freiden exercised the slightest control over either Harper or his assistants in the matter of unloading the machines from the cars. He did not know either of Harper's assistants, and did not authorize Harper to secure the services of either of them. He merely gave the usual direction to Harper to unload the cars. Nothing appears to have been said in this particular instance as to the price, but it was understood to be at the regular rate of $1.50 for each automobile removed to the platform. Harper testified that the arrangement that he had with Freiden was "just to unload the cars at $1.50 a machine."

When Harper had placed the automobiles on the platform his connection with the transaction ceased and he had no longer any interest in the matter and no further relations with Freiden until another shipment of automobiles arrived.

We are unable to arrive at any other conclusion from the facts in this case than that Harper was an independent contractor in the matter of unloading the automobiles for the petitioner. He furnished his own tools and implements for the unloading, selected his own assistants, directed the work at his own pleasure, and was not under the authority or direction of Freiden in any way. It follows, therefore, that Caldwell was not in any sense an employee of the petitioner. We are unable to differentiate the facts in this instance from those considered by this court in other cases where it was held that under such circumstances the injured party is not entitled to look to the owner of the property on which the labor was bestowed for compensation. Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Brush, 176 Cal. 448, 168 Pac. 890; Donlon Brothers v. Industrial Accident Comm., 173 Cal. 251, 159 Pac. 715; Pryor and Globe Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm., 186 Cal. 169, 198 Pac. 1045.

It follows that the award must be annulled; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. LAUMAN. (Cr. 879.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 22, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 20, 1922. Dissenting Opinion. Dec. 8, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⊂=976, 1083—Granting motion in arrest and appeal by people suspended statute as to pronouncing sentence.

The granting of defendant's motion in arrest of judgment and appeal therefrom by the people suspended Pen. Code, § 1191, providing that the court must pronounce sentence in not less than two days nor more than five days after verdict has been rendered.

⊂=For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

2. Criminal law ⟸1190 — Determination of people's appeal from an order granting motion in arrest of judgment revived verdict.

Determination of the people's appeal from an order granting defendant's motion in arrest of judgment and the sending down of the remittitur revived the verdict, which in law should be considered as being given new life as of the date of the filing of the remittitur.

3. Criminal law ⟸1192—Defendant entitled to new trial where seven days elapsed between filing of remittitur and day of sentence.

Where at the filing of the remittitur after determination of the people's appeal from an order granting defendant's motion in arrest of judgment defendant was out on bail, and from the day he appeared in court after the filing of the remittitur and until the day of sentence seven days had elapsed, he was entitled to a new trial under Pen. Code, §§ 1191, 1202, providing that sentence must be pronounced in not less than two nor more than five days after the verdict has been rendered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Roy R. Lauman was convicted of presenting false proofs of loss under policy of fire insurance, and he appeals. Reversed.

LAWLOR, J., in Supreme Court, dissenting to ruling on motion for hearing.

Davis, Rush & MacDonald, John L. Richardson, T. E. Parke, and Chandler P. Ward, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman and Erwin Widney, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. [1, 2] Appellant was convicted of a felony; it being charged that he presented false proofs of loss under a policy of fire insurance. He presented a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and then made a motion in arrest of judgment, which motion was granted. Upon an appeal taken by the people the Supreme Court reversed the order arresting the judgment. People v. Lauman, 187 Cal. 214, 201 Pac. 459. Remittitur certifying the judgment of the Supreme Court was received and filed in the trial court on the 14th of November, 1921. Defendant had been released on bail, and a bench warrant was issued to bring him into court. Upon information received by his attorney that such warrant had been issued, defendant surrendered himself into custody, and appeared before the court on November 21st with his counsel. At that time his counsel presented the objection that, under the provisions of sections 1191 and 1202, Penal Code, no sentence could be pronounced, but a new trial should be ordered, because more than five days had elapsed from the date of the verdict of the jury. The court stated that he could not hear the argument at that time, owing to the fact that another cause was on trial, and continued the hearing until the next morning. At that time defendant's counsel presented a written demand for a new trial. The hearing was continued until 2 o'clock of the same day, and the court said: "I want to think about this for a little while. I will continue the matter until Friday." Friday was the 25th of November. On the latter day, the matter being called again, the court stated that he would take further time to consider the questions presented, as he was not ready to decide them, whereupon a further continuance was ordered until November 28th; that being Monday. At the last-named time the court denied the application for a new trial, and overruled an objection to rendering of judgment, and proceeded to sentence the defendant to a term of imprisonment in the penitentiary. This judgment appellant contends was erroneous. He first insists that the provisions of section 1191, requiring that judgment must be pronounced within not less than two or more than five days after the verdict, are mandatory, and that, where there are no proceedings pending on a general motion for a new trial or for probation, as was this case, if the judgment is pronounced after the five days have elapsed, it must be reversed. The motion in arrest of judgment and the ruling of the court granting the same, and the subsequent appeal by the people, must be held to have suspended the requirements of the statute as to the passing of sentence until the appeal had been determined. When the appeal was determined and the remittitur sent down, it revived the verdict, which in law should be considered as being given new life as of the date of the filing of the remittitur.

[3] There was a condition attending this case which extended the date when the court was required to act further, to wit, the condition that the defendant was out on bail, and was not available for the purpose of having sentence imposed upon him. The court could not legally sentence the defendant for a felony in his absence; hence was powerless by reason of the law itself to do the very thing that would have been required of him where the person of the defendant could be produced at any time upon the order of the court alone. From the record then it appears that the first day after the filing of the remittitur when the defendant was available for the purpose of being sentenced was the 21st of November, 1921. Under the terms of the statute as they have been construed, it was the court's duty, within a period of time not to exceed five days from that date, to pronounce judgment. Had appellant rested alone upon his contention first made, that sentence could not be pronounced at any time after the filing of the remittitur because more than five days had elapsed from the date when the verdict was returned by the jury, his plea would have been insufficient for reasons already stated. But he particularly specified the objection against the pronouncement of the judgment that more than five days had elapsed after filing of the remittitur, and asked for a new trial. In Rankin v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 192, 106 Pac. 719, the court said:

"If judgment was not pronounced within the time limited, a new trial was made imperative if the defendant so desired; he became 'entitled' to it."

"The delay beyond the time specified for pronouncing judgment renders it imperative that defendant have a new trial if he asks for it." People v. Winner, 31 Cal. App. 352, 160 Pac. 689.

In People v. Okomoto, 26 Cal. App. 568, 147 Pac. 598, the court said:

"It appears that the defendant was entitled to a new trial; but it further appears that a new trial was not refused, inasmuch as he did not ask for it. * * * It has been held by this court that, in the absence of any objection made by the defendant at the time of pronouncing judgment, and in the absence of any demand made by him for a new trial upon the ground that the legal time limit had expired, the court might rightfully enter the judgment. People v. Polich, 25 Cal. App. 464, 143 Pac. 1065."

From the day the defendant appeared in court after the filing of the remittitur, until the day of sentence, seven days elapsed, which brought the date of sentence outside the period prescribed by the statute. A new trial should have been ordered. See the further cases, People v. Boling, 32 Cal. App. 42, 161 Pac. 1169; People v. Gilbreth, 33 Cal. App. 23, 164 Pac. 18.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

SHAW, C. J. The petition to have the above-entitled cause heard and determined by this court, after judgment in the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 1, is denied.

All Justices present concur, except LAWLOR, J. I dissent. I agree with the contention of the Attorney General that sections 1191 and 1202 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1909, have no application, so far as the time within which judgment must be rendered after the reversal of an order arresting judgment is concerned. It is true that the purpose of the amendment is to secure expedition in the disposal of cases, and that the conclusion announced by the District Court of Appeal would tend to expedite proceedings after reversal; but as the provisions refer specifically to the remedies, and the sequence of and the time within which they may be availed of after plea or verdict of guilty, and no reference is made to proceedings after reversal, I think there is no statutory warrant for the construction given to the amended provisions.

The remedies provided in section 1191, which have any pertinency here, are the motions for a new trial and arrest of judgment, which must be decided within 15 days after plea or verdict, and an application for probation for the determination of which the court is allowed 20 additional days, and, on motion of defendant, this may be extended to 90 days. In this case the first two of the remedies were exhausted. The defendant was still entitled to apply for probation. It is for this reason the order of reversal in the first appeal did not direct the superior court to proceed to judgment, but remanded the cause for further proceedings in contemplation of sections 1191 and 1202.

But, even if the time schedule prescribed in the statute does apply after reversal of an order arresting judgment, the decision of the District Court of Appeal is based on an erroneous theory. It is because of the confusion to which this case may hereafter give rise that I deem it advisable to state my views on the subject.

It appears from the record on the original appeal that the verdict was rendered on November 25, 1919. On that day the case was set down for November 28 for judgment and sentence. When the case came up on November 28, defendant interposed his motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. The case was thereupon continued to December 1, then to December 5, and finally to December 6, each time for the hearing of said motions and for judgment and sentence. On the latter date the motion for a new trial was denied, and the motion in arrest of judgment granted. This consumed 11 out of the 15 days which might have been appropriated under section 1191; but, as the trial court did not find it necessary to use the 15 days, no time remained, so far as those two remedies were concerned, after the order appealed from was made. The appeal from the order granting the motion in arrest of judgment was taken on December 6. This, of course, had the legal effect of suspending jurisdiction in the superior court until the remittitur was filed.

It follows that, when the remittitur was filed and the court acquired jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, and relief was not sought by probation, judgment should have been rendered forthwith. Hence, since judgment was not rendered on the first day the defendant appeared after the filing of the remittitur the court was without jurisdiction to pronounce judgment and should have granted a new trial. The theory of the District Court of Appeal is that on the filing of the remittitur the verdict "should be considered as being given new life as of the date" of such filing and that a new period of 5 days within which the case must be set down for judgment thereby created under section 1191.

I find no warrant for this interpretation in the statute. Not only the verdict, but all the proceedings subsequent to verdict, including the motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, were revived on the filing of the remittitur and determined the course the court should pursue. The maximum of 5 days referred to in the first paragraph of section 1191 fixes the time the court must appoint for pronouncing judgment after a plea or verdict of guilty or a plea of former conviction or acquittal, or once in jeopardy. That time may be extended for the indicated purposes and no other. Except for probation the time provided in section 1191 had been exhausted when the appeal was taken. There was no more authority under that section to allow 5 days for rendering judgment after the filing of the remittitur and the appearance of the defendant than there would have been for granting any other number of days. To hold there was such authority is to add to the terms of the statute.

It seems to me the proper procedure would have been to arraign the defendant, review the proceedings up to date, and then inquire of him whether he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be rendered. In that situation he might have asked for probation, in which event the case would probably have been continued. But, as he did not, judgment should at once have been pronounced.

BROWN v. CHOWCHILLA LAND CO. et al.

(Civ. 2446.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 26, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 23, 1922.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟸101—Notice of cancellation held not operative as restoration of right to declare forfeiture.

Where vendor's notice of cancellation contained no demand for payment of what was due nor afforded intimation that vendor would insist upon prompt payments in the future, it could not operate as a restoration of the right to declare a forfeiture for failure to pay what was due, nor be considered as notice that vendor would insist on prompt payments in the future.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟸101—Requirement of notice of intention to forfeit, after receipt of overdue payments without objection, based on equitable estoppel.

The requirement of notice to forfeit, after receipt of overdue payments without objection, is based upon the equitable consideration that vendor by his conduct has led purchaser into the belief that he will continue to waive strict performance, but where parties have provided that acceptance by vendor of payments overdue should not be deemed waiver of the provision that time was of the essence of the contract, and should not be a relinquishment of vendor's right to claim forfeiture for any subsequent default, it would not be illegal for vendor to insist on forfeiture for any subsequent default.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action for specific performance by R. C. Brown against the Chowchilla Land Company and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fee & Ring, of Madera, for appellant.

Butler & Van Dyke, of Sacramento, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought for specific performance of three separate contracts for the purchase and sale of different pieces of real estate. The contracts provided for monthly payments of interest and part of principal on the first day of each month, extending over a period of 7½ years, although the purchaser had the privilege of paying the full amount sooner. The contracts contained these covenants:

"And it is further agreed that, in case of a default in the payment of any of said sums, or any installment or interest due thereon, for the period of two months after they become due, all money previously paid by the purchaser shall, at the option of the seller, become forfeited to the seller and retained as settled and liquidated damages and rent for the use and occupation of the property as herein permitted, and thereupon the seller shall be released from all obligation in law and equity to convey said real property, and the purchaser shall immediately deliver possession thereof to the seller, and herein it is agreed that time is of the essence of this contract.

"The purchaser covenants and agrees that a breach or violation on his part of any of the conditions, restrictions, or covenants contained in this indenture shall immediately terminate all rights and interests of said purchaser thereunder, and all rights, title, ownership and interest whatsoever in and to said real property, and every portion thereof shall immediately, without notice or entry or compensation or obligation of any kind to said purchaser, revert to and become absolutely vested in the seller, its successors, and assigns.

"The waiver by the seller of any breach of any covenant or agreement herein contained on the part of the purchaser shall not be deemed or held to be a waiver of any subsequent or other breach of said covenant or agreement, nor a waiver of any other covenant or agreement herein contained."

The contracts also provided that the purchaser should have the privilege of entering into possession of the premises and continuing therein "unless forfeited by the nonpayment of the purchase money or any installment thereof," but in consideration of said right of possession he should pay all taxes levied against the property. The contracts were executed on October 1, 1913, and the first seven payments were made within a few days after the time when they were due. The June and July payments of 1914 were made on August 20, leaving the August payment in arrears, but this was paid September 25. Two more monthly installments were paid on January 3, 1915, two on March 11, and two on August 6, following, leaving plaintiff at that time six months in arrears on each contract. For nearly three years thereafter plaintiff paid no other installment on the property in controversy herein. In April, June, and July, 1918, he made payments aggregating $120 on one of the contracts. No other payments were thereafter made or offered to be made on any of the contracts until January 9, 1920, other than the small amount for taxes paid for the use of the property, the last payment therefor having been made in December, 1918. On February 5, 1919, plaintiff received three letters from defendant, all substantially alike but referring separately to the three lots of land, as follows:

"Please be advised that we have this day canceled the contract between this company and yourself, covering block 130, because of your failure to make the payments due thereon. This cancellation is in accordance with the provisions of said contract."

On January 9, 1920, the plaintiff wrote defendant as follows:

"Please prepare deeds as per contract in blocks 129, 130, 131, money for same at Chowchilla National Bank."

To which, on the next day, defendant replied as follows:

"We are very much surprised at your letter of January 9th requesting deeds covering blocks 129, 130, and 131. As you were notified over a year ago, your contracts covering these lots were canceled because of your failure to make the payments provided for thereunder."

Suit was then brought to compel defendant to convey to plaintiff said blocks, and, after the cause was argued and submitted, the court rendered judgment for the defendant for costs, from which judgment the appeal has been taken.

One of the main controversies relates to the question of waiver. As to this the trial court found:

"That defendant has never waived the provision in said contract that time was of the essence thereof, nor waived nor agreed to waive its right to cancel and terminate said contract for failure to make the payments therein agreed to be made as and when agreed to be paid, or the right to keep and retain upon such cancellation the moneys theretofore paid by it pursuant to said contract."

Plaintiff's theory and contention was and is:

"That the power of the Chowchilla Land Company to forfeit his rights under the contract was temporarily suspended by reason of its accepting payments thereunder long after the same were due, and its course of dealing with him which evinced a purpose to permit him to meet his obligations as best he could; that the right to forfeit could only be revived by a demand upon plaintiff to make up his past delinquencies, and that in the future it would exact and expect a strict compliance with the contracts by him, and because such demand was never made, the notices of cancellation of February 5, 1919, were legally insufficient to forfeit his rights, notwithstanding the provision" in the contracts that "time is and shall be of the essence of this agreement."

In support of the legal doctrine thus stated, many cases are cited, but we may notice only the leading California decisions. In Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126, the whole question was exhaustively considered with the citation of many authorities. The action therein was by the purchaser, Boone, for specific performance, and it appears that, during the entire period in controversy, he was in possession and in actual use of the land. After reciting the facts showing that many payments were accepted without protest by the vendor long after they were due, the Supreme Court said:

"We think from these facts a court might infer a waiver of the conditions regarding forfeiture and time, and that they supported the general allegation of the complaint that Templeman had waived those conditions. The authorities with practical unanimity so hold."

And the court quoted with approval the following from Monson v. Bragdon, 159 Ill. 66, 42 N. E. 385:

"While * * * not necessarily an absolute permanent waiver, yet in a court of equity there was at least such a temporary suspension of the right [of forfeiture] as could only be restored by his giving a definite and specific notice of an intention to that effect."

It is to be observed that Templeman did not exercise his option to declare the whole price due upon the default for 60 days in paying any of the installments, but permitted all to become due by lapse of time. In that respect the case differed from this, as herein some of the installments did not become due until after the suit was brought.

In Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751, the action was brought by the vendor to quiet his title to a parcel of land and to enjoin the vendee from removing therefrom a building which the latter had erected thereon. Therein also numerous payments were made by the vendee and accepted by the vendor, after the time provided for their payment by the contract, and the Supreme Court reiterated the rule stated in the Templeman Case, supra.

In the Stevinson Case, supra, it is worthy of note that the contract provided that "no waiver of times of payments for continuance of option shall be valid in favor of the first party, unless reduced to writing and subscribed by the second party thereto." No comment was made by the Supreme Court as to this provision, but, as it simply referred to the manner in which the waiver was to be expressed, it might properly be held that this was waived by the conduct of the vendor in receiving the overdue payments without executing said written testimonial. Arnold v. American Ins. Co., 148 Cal. 660, 84 Pac. 182, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 6.

In Hayt v. Bentel, 164 Cal. 680, 130 Pac. 432, the action was brought by the vendee to cancel the contract and to recover the moneys paid thereunder by the plaintiff, the vendor being unable to convey a good title. The main contention of appellant was that respondent was not entitled to recover by reason of the fact that the latter had made default in the payment of the installments as they became due, but the Supreme Court held that the vendor, by accepting the payments after they became due, had waived the delay, and that to put the vendee in default he would be required to tender a deed. The last expression of the Supreme Court on the subject is found in Bairos v. Barlin, 46 Cal. App. 665, 190 Pac. 188, wherein it was said:

"Acceptance of overdue installments of the price, on an executory contract for the sale of land, waives any right to declare a forfeiture on account of the previous failures to pay when due. But such acceptance alone does not change the terms of the contract as to forfeiture for future failures, nor eliminate the provision that time is of the essence of the contract. There may be conduct and acquiescence by the vendor sufficient to justify the inference by a court as a matter of fact that the vendor has waived the conditions of a contract regarding a forfeiture, which he afterward claims the right to enforce, and when, in such a case the waiver has continued until after all installments are due, the condition cannot be revived, except by notice to the vendee."

If that decision is to be construed as holding that notice to the vendee to revive the right of forfeiture is required only when all the installments have become due, then manifestly no such notice was required herein, since the installments were not all due at the time the action was brought.

However, it is the claim of respondent that if notice was required, it was furnished by the service of the so-called notice of cancellation, and Pearson v. Brown, 27 Cal. App. 125, 148 Pac. 956, is cited as authority for that position. Therein the notice was:

"This is to advise you that I have on this day canceled your contracts for lots in the Brown Andrade tracts on account of nonpayment of installments, as you are now delinquent 10 months, and I feel that I have carried this account long enough," etc.

After citing Boone v. Templeman, supra, and other authorities as to waiver by reason of accepting overdue payments, the court said:

"This statement of the rule accurately defines what the rights of the respondent in this case were on December 5, 1911, the date of his letter to the appellants, in which he assumed to cancel the appellant's contracts by reason of their default in making payments according to their terms. The respondent was not entitled to work such cancellation, and his said letter could not be given that effect. The utmost effect under the foregoing rule which would be given to it would be that of a notification to the vendees that the vendor intended thereafter to insist upon a strict compliance with the terms of the contracts; and that, unless within a reasonable time the vendees paid up their deficiency, and thereafter made their payments strictly in accordance with the time conditions of their contracts, the forfeiture clauses would be enforced."

The court did not decide that this was equivalent to a notice, but declared simply that such was the utmost effect that could be given to it. Besides, the vendees did not, as does the vendee herein, question the sufficiency of the instrument to constitute such notice, but they responded immediately with an offer of payment of all that was due.

Moreover, the decisions are to the effect that where notice is required it must contain definite and specific warning of an intention to enforce the forfeiture. In Stevinson v. Joy, supra, the court said that in case of waiver the right of forfeiture could only be restored "by giving a definite and specific notice of an intention to enforce it."

In Hoppin v. Munsey, 32 Cal. App. Dec. 468,[1] it was said that—

"where a vendor has waived his right to a forfeiture given him under a contract of sale of real estate it cannot be deemed revived except upon a notice to the vendee that if he does not comply with the terms of the contract as to payments called for by the same

[1] Superseded by opinion of Supreme Court on hearing. See 198 Pac. 398. Superseded opinion not published in official reports or Pacific Reporter.

within a time specified therein, which as fixed must be reasonable, the right to forfeiture would then be exercised."

In that case, the notice which was held sufficient, stated:

"Unless you pay up the interest, amounting to $87.00, before the 10th of March, 1917, I will have to cancel deal with you on lot."

In Hill Co. v. Pinque, 179 Cal. 759, 178 Pac. 952, 3 A. L. R. 669, it was said:

"It was the settled rule at common law that a demand for payment of the exact sum due was a necessary prerequisite to a forfeiture of a lease for nonpayment of rent. 24 Cyc. 1355. The same rule was laid down in this state at an early date (Gage v. Bates, 40 Cal. 384; O'Connor v. Kelly, 41 Cal. 434), and these decisions have never been questioned (Mossi v. Fairbanks, 19 Cal. App. 355, 125 Pac. 1071)."

The same rule of waiver and the suspension of the right to forfeit, according to the authorities, applies with equal force to contracts of sale as to indentures of lease.

[1] Said notice of cancellation contained no demand for the payment of what was due nor did it afford any intimation that the vendor would insist upon prompt payment in the future. In fact, it was equivalent to a declaration that the contract was at an end and that no further payments would be accepted. It could not therefore operate as a restoration of the right to declare a forfeiture for failure to pay what was due, nor could it be considered as notice that the vendor would insist upon prompt payments in the future.

[2] But we are satisfied that, by the terms of the contract, the parties expressly covenanted that no such result as claimed by appellant would follow the acceptance of overdue payments. That the parties had the legal right to so provide is not and cannot be disputed. If the parties had expressly provided that the acceptance by the vendor of payments after they were due should not be deemed a waiver of the provision that time is of the essence of the contract and should not be considered a relinquishment of the vendor's right to claim a forfeiture for any subsequent default on the part of the vendee, then it would not be illegal or inequitable for the vendor to insist upon forfeiture for any such subsequent default. The requirement of notice after the receipt of overdue payments without objection is based upon the equitable consideration that by his conduct the vendor has led the vendee into the belief that the former will continue to waive the strict performance of the contract. The principle of equitable estoppel is involved. But the reason for the rule does not exist where the parties have expressly agreed that such waiver shall not affect any subsequent breach or relinquish the right of the vendor to insist thereafter upon a strict observance of the terms of the contract. We think the parties could not have more effectually provided that a waiver of a breach of the contract should not be held to have occurred by reason of the forbearance of the vendor to take advantage of any prior default.

The parties could not fail to understand from the particular covenant in question that the acceptance of any overdue payment or payments was to be regarded as an indulgence to the vendee, but as to the future the whole contract remained in full force and effect and rendered the vendee subject to the penalty of forfeiture for any default thereafter. We may repeat that the right to declare a forfeiture for the failure to pay on time is one of the covenants of the contract and hence it is a part of the agreement which the parties have in effect declared shall not be deemed waived or affected by any previous default. The case therefore stands as though there had been no belated acceptance of payments, and since there were several installments long overdue at the time the action was brought, plaintiff was clearly in default, and the right of forfeiture existed in behalf of defendant, no affirmative action being required on his part to work a cancellation. Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Fresno Irrigated Farms Co. v. Canupis, 39 Cal. App. 184, 178 Pac. 300.

Plaintiff also claims that there was a subsequent oral agreement by which he was granted the privilege of paying as he could on one block at a time. As to that he testified:

"I went to Mr. Coombs (respondents' agent) and asked permission to pay one at a time. He never did make a reply. I think he told me he would write to Sacramento. I understood the reply was favorable because he accepted the money. I did not go to Mr. Coombs to ascertain what kind of a reply he received, because when I went to him first I told him I wanted to pay one at a time. There was no other reply I can remember that was made."

Conceding, for the purpose of the case, that the foregoing would support a finding that such agreement existed, it is sufficient to say that the finding to the contrary is amply supported by the testimony of Mr. Coombs.

As to the question of waiver, the trial court further found:

"It is untrue that by any act or course of conduct of defendant, plaintiff was led to believe that defendant did not intend to insist on the provision of said contract relative to forfeiture or that it had waived the provision in said contract relative to forfeiture."

This is a finding of fact, as we understand it, and not a mere legal conclusion as claimed by appellant (Bairos v. Barlin, supra), and we regard it as justified by the evidence. That respondent treated appellant with great indulgence and extended him every opportunity to make the payments is quite apparent from the record. He was notified by letter on July 12, 1917, that there were 29 delinquent installments, and was requested to call at respondents' office and give information as to what he intended to do about it. But he did nothing until 9 months thereafter, as we have seen when he made a small payment on one of the lots, followed in June and July of 1918 with other payments on the same lot, aggregating $120, and nothing else was done by appellant except the payment of the small amount for taxes, until this suit was brought, nearly a year after he received said notice of cancellation, appellant thereby committing 12 other breaches of the contract before he offered to make any further payment. As suggested by respondent, plaintiff seems to have assumed that—"he could wait for as long a time as he pleased and make payment whenever the spirit moved; and that in the meantime he could stand by, watching the market, and determine, according as values increased or decreased, whether he would thereafter compel the company to convey the property."

We may add that when he did finally demand a conveyance, he could expect no more favorable treatment than the offer he received from respondent to credit him with all that he had paid in as payment on one block, and upon receipt of the balance due to execute to him a conveyance of said block.

We think there is no merit in the claim that the findings do not support the judgment. They show the execution of said written contracts, that they were not superseded or modified by any other agreement, that plaintiff had failed to make payments as claimed by respondent, that there was no waiver of any of the terms of said contracts, and that plaintiff was in default, and had been for months at the time the suit was brought. It is true that there was no specific finding that such notice as to the amount due and demand for its payment within a specified time, and notice that defendant would thereafter insist upon prompt payment, as appellant insists upon, was given, but, as before indicated, we deem this immaterial under the contracts of the parties. The forfeiture followed as a consequence of plaintiff's default, and it was sufficient to claim it in the answer.

We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

HELMUTH et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

(Civ. 4314.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 26, 1922.)

1. Master and servant ⊂⊃401—Variance between application for compensation and proof held not prejudicial.

Where an application for compensation for injuries to an employé blasting holes alleged that he was paid 1¼ cents per hole, and blasted about 400 to 450 holes a day, and the Industrial Commission found in accordance with the proof that his average daily earnings at said rate equaled $4, the employers were not prejudiced by any variance; the finding being substantially in accordance with the allegations and within the liberal rule provided in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470, for pleadings in ordinary actions.

2. Master and servant ⊂⊃367—One paid under piecework system for blasting holes held an "employee" within the Compensation Act, and not an independent contractor.

One employed to blast out holes who was paid at the rate of 1¼ cents per hole, and furnished nothing but his labor, and who was not required to work any certain number of hours, being free to come and go as he wished, and free to discontinue his work at any time without legal liability, held to be an employee within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act and not an independent contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employee.]

3. Master and servant ⊂⊃363—Blasting holes in farm land not employment excluded by Compensation Act.

One employed to blast holes for his employers, having a contract for drilling and blasting holes in farm land as a preparation for planting vines and trees, is not excluded from the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, as being engaged in an employment under the classification of agriculture.

Application by George H. Helmuth and another, copartners, doing business under the firm name of Helmuth & Stuckert, for certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Henry Hettinger. Award affirmed.

A. M. Drew, of Fresno, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a writ of review, and we are asked to annul the award of the Industrial Accident Commission granting to Henry Hettinger $50.64 for medical service and indemnity for temporary disability at the rate of $14.82 a week until the termination of the disability or the further order of the commission.
